That is, which divine wisdom, neither Caiphas, nor Herod, nor Pontius Pilate, nor any of the Jewish or Gentile rulers, did understand. Where note, The apostle calls the learned Rabbies, The admired philosophers among the Heathens, the celebrated doctors among the Jews' princes, but presently adds a diminutive term, which darkens all their glory: he styles them the princes of this world, utterly unacquainted with the wisdom of the other world. Observe farther, What a clear and full proof the apostle gives of their ignorance of this divine wisdom which the gospel reveals: Had they known it, that is, practically known it, so as to believe it, to be influenced and persuaded by it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory. Note here, 1. A royal title given to Christ, The Lord of Glory. There belongs to him, 1. An essential glory, as God, which is unspeakable, yea inconceivable, Phil. ii. 6. He thought it no robbery to be equal with God; that is, to have a peerage or equality with his Father in glory. 2. A mediatorial glory, as head of the church, which consists in that fulness of grace which is inherent in him, and in that dignity and authority which is put upon him. 3. A passive glory (as some divines call it) or a glory which shall to all eternity be given to him by his redeemed ones, by saints and angels, upon the account of his mediatorial work, Rev. v. 12. Worthy is the Lamb to receive glory and honour, and worship, for he hath redeemed us, &c.—Note, 2. The indignity offered to his glorious person, they crucified him, they nailed him to an ignominious cross, and put him to death, as the vilest criminal, as the greatest malefactor. Note, 3. The cause of this indignity, and that was ignorance: Had they known, they would not have crucified, &c. that is, had the princes of this world known, either who Christ was, or the work which he came about, they would not have crucified him, but adored him. But was their ignorance of Christ a sufficient excuse for crucifying of him? In no wise, because it was not an invincible, but a wilful ignorance: They had sufficient means of instruction, by which they might have come to the knowledge of him, and of their duty to him; but they closed their eyes, and would not see.

9 But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.

10 But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God.

11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so, the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God.

These words, Eye hath not seen, &c. do not immediately respect the happiness of heaven, and a future state, though very often they are so applied, but they are primarily spoken of the gospel state, and of the blessings to be enjoyed by them that love God here: From whence a good argument may be drawn to prove the inconceivable happiness of the saints hereafter. Though they have felt and tasted joys unspeakable and full of glory, in the actings of their faith and love upon God at present, yet all that they have seen and heard, all that they have tasted and felt in the way to heaven, falls infinitely short of the perfection and blessedness of that place and state. Lord, how will thy immediate presence, when we come into it, be a great surprise to those of us that have now the greatest acquaintance with it! Observe farther, The care and kindness of God towards his servants, in revealing to them by his Spirit, those great and good things prepared for them which surpass man's understanding. Though "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor heart conceived, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him," yet God has revealed them to us by his Spirit." There is a twofold revelation of the happiness of a future state. Revelatio fidei, and revelatio visionis, a revelation of faith, and a revelation by vision and sight; the former, believers have by the help of the Holy Spirit in this life, as pilatores; the latter they shall ere long enjoy in heaven, as comprehensors, where they shall see as they are seen, and know as they are known. Observe, lastly, That the Holy Spirit, which thus revealeth hidden counsels to man, and searcheth the deep things of God, is omniscient, and really God. Mark, 1. He searcheth deep things; he is not only acquainted with, and privy to the surface and outside of things, but searcheth things to the bottom. And, 2. He searcheth not only the deep things of man, as of kings and princes, whose hearts are a great deep, but the deep things of God; therefore the Spirit is God; for as the apostle argues, ver. 11. "No man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man, that is in him; even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God," or be that is with God, in God, yea, God himself, as intimate with him as the soul is in the body. If the spirit that is in man were not man, it could never know the deep things of man; and if the Spirit of God were not God, he could never search and know the deepest things of God.

12 Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God: that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.

13 Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual.

Observe here, 1. The apostle declares what spirit they had not received, namely, the spirit of the world; We have not received the spirit of the world; that is, the spirit which suggests worldly wisdom, and savours only worldly things, which acts and influences only worldly men. In the whole generation of worldly men, there is the same worldly spirit, and this spirit of the world is an earthly spirit; it is a low, a little, and narrow spirit: Earthly things, which are present and visible, such a soul gazes after, and grasps hard; but future and invisible things, which are far off, and out of sight, are neither believed nor sought after. Observe, 2. The apostle declares what spirit they had received, namely, the Spirit which is of God; and of what use that Holy Spirit is unto them: It teaches them to know the things which are freely given them of God; that is, the Holy Spirit sheweth us, both what God is, and what the things of God are; we are enlightened with the knowledge of that grace and goodness of God which is discovered to us in the gospel; we know both divine mysteries and divine mercies, both what God hath done for us, and that he hath wrought in us, which are the things that are freely given us of God. Observe, 3. The apostle declares, how he preached these spiritual things after a spiritual manner, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; that is, not in the words, and after the manner now counted by the Gentile philosophers to be learned and wise, but in the very words, and after the very manner which the Spirit of God teacheth us. Where learn, That the holy apostles spake and writ by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as well as the prophets of old time, and delivered nothing as from God, but what God revealed to them by his Holy Spirit; and accordingly, some interpret those words, Comparing spiritual things with spiritual; that is, say they, comparing the things which were writ by the Spirit in and under the Old Testament, with what is now revealed to us under the New.

14 But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.

Observe here, 1. The subject spoken of, the natural man; not sapientior, the sensual, but animior, the animal man, who acts only by the principles of human reason, and worldly wisdom; who, though well furnished with intellectual and moral improvements, is yet destitute of the enlightening Spirit, and the renewing grace of God. Observe, 2. What is here affirmed of the natural man, with reference to spiritual things. 1. That he receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God. 2. That he cannot know them. Where note, That it is not said, that he knoweth not the things of God, but the things of the Spirit of God; for there are some things of God, which a natural man may know, but the things of the Spirit of God, as truths purely evangelical, these he receiveth not, neither in his understanding, nor his will. Note further, It is not barely said that he doth not, but that he cannot know them. Natural reason alone, by what helps soever assisted and improved, is altogether insufficient, without spiritual illumination, to apprehend supernatural and evangelical truth; not but that the Spirit of God, in the work of illumination and conversion, makes use of our reason; that flower of the soul is not blasted, but more open by the blowing of the blessed Spirit. Christianity doth not command us to throw away our reason, but to subjugate it; not to deny or disown our reason, but to captivate it to the obedience of faith: But the sense of the apostle is, that a person of the most exquisite natural accomplishments, and one that has improved his reason to the highest pitch, cannot behold evangelical mysteries in their proper light, or embrace them in their verity and beauty, without the superadded aids and assistances of the Holy Spirit. Observe, 3. The reasons declared, why the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit, Because they are foolishness unto him; that is, he accounts them foolishness when propounded to him, because he doth not see them proved from principles of natural reason, and by philosophical deductions, which is the only wisdom that he seeks after. The reason also is added, why he cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned; that is, the natural man cannot know divine things by that wisdom which he alone will be conducted by; and spiritual things must be spiritually discerned; for being mysteries, they are not knowable by human reason, but by spiritual revelation. And if the wisdom of the world, that is, the learned and wisest men in the world, were thus unable, by the sharpest light of reason, to discover evangelical mysteries. Lord! how en-dearing are our obligations for the benefit of supernatural revelation, whereby the hidden wisdom of God is made known unto us?

15 But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man.

As if the apostle had said, "Although the natural man who acteth only by the principles of human reason, receiveth not the things of the Spirit, nor can know them by any study of his own, because they are spiritually discerned; yet he that is spiritual, that is, who hath the revelation and illumination of the Spirit of God, judgeth, or discerneth, and trieth all things, that is all spiritual matters; yet he himself is judged of no man, that is, discerned by none who hath no higher principle, than that of nature to discern things by." Learn hence, That such Christians as are enlightened and renewed with, guided and conducted by, the Holy Spirit of God, are the only proper judges of spiritual matters, able to understand their duty, and to discern between good and evil. He that is spiritual, judgeth all things.

16 For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ.

That is, "What man, without divine revelation and spiritual illumination, ever knew or understood the mind of God so well, as to be able to instruct, direct, and inform the spiritual man about it? But we who are spiritual, have the mind of Christ, and so are able to discern and direct, to guide and instruct others about it." Learn hence, That none are fit and sufficient to interpret the mind of God unto others, who are not acquainted with it themselves: We have the mind of Christ, saith the apostle of himself and his fellow-labourers in the gospel: His meaning is not only this, that they had the mind of Christ written in a book, but that they had a clear understanding of it, and so were fitted to interpret it to others. There is no such knowledge, as the knowledge of experience, no teaching like unto experimental teaching.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle having, in the first chapter of this epistle, reproved the Corinthians for their contentions and divisions, for the factions and parties, which were found amongst them; in this chapter, he returns to his former argument, and shews what a scandal their dissensions were to religion, and a reproach unto themselves.

AND I, brethren, could not speak unto you as unto spiritual, but as unto carnal, even as unto babes in Christ.

As if the apostle had said, "My brethren, although I speak the highest wisdom amongst them that are perfect, yet could not I speak to you as unto spiritual persons, but as unto carnal, because the works of the flesh are found with you, and at the best you are but babes in Christ." Learn hence, That even amongst those who are the true and real members of the visible church, some are spiritual, some are carnal, some are men, some are babes. The apostle doth not call them absolutely carnal, as if they were wholly given up to the works of the flesh; but comparatively so, having too much carnality and corruption in them, savouring too much of the flesh, though for the main truly pious: and therefore he uses the word as, for mitigation sake: I could not speak unto you but as unto carnal.

2 I have fed you with milk, and not with meat; for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able.

With milk, that is, with easy and common truths; not with the mysterious part of gospel-knowledge; with the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, and not with the higher doctrine of Christianity, which neither then, nor now, are ye able to bear. Learn hence, That it is great prudence and wisdom in the ministers of Christ to instruct people in the first principles of religion, in order to their regular advancing higher in Christianity. Ministers are spiritual nurses; they first must feed with milk, then with meat, otherwise they will not nourish, but destroy.

3 ¶ For ye are yet carnal; for whereas there is among you envying and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men?

That is, "Ye are in a great measure carnal; for your envy, strife, and divisions, prove you to be so, and that you live according to the corrupt nature of man." They had the seed and root of grace abiding, and yet the relics of corruption remaining in them. There is a vast difference between weak grace, and no grace: between the presence of sin, and the power of sin. But how could the apostle here call the Corinthians carnal, and babes in Christ, when in chap. 1. ver. 5. he affirmed, and they were enriched with all knowledge and utterance? Ans. That might be true as to some particular persons amongst them, who had those extraordinary gifts of tongues and miracles given them for the confirmation of the gospel; and yet what is here said, be true as to the generality of them, that they had too much carnality and unmortified corruption remaining in them: Ye are yet carnal. Observe next, What proof he gives of it, namely, ocular demonstration; for, says he, there are among you envying, strife, and divisions. Envy, as the root, bears strife, and strife breeds divisions and factions. Envy is a pestilent lust, yea, a devilish lust: it makes another's good our grief. The devil envies God and man their happiness; he rejoices at the destruction of sinners, though he has no advantage by it; nay, though it increaseth his torment, because they were tempted by him to sin. There is nothing so like the devil as an envious man, with his cloven foot, to make division wherever he comes. Learn hence, 1. That envy is the cause and companion of strife. Learn, 2. That strife and contention, differences and divisions, are often found in the churches of Christ, and among particular Christians. Learn, 3. That so far as these prevail in and among any, it evidences that they are carnal, and walk as men.

4 For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal?

That is, one saith, in opposition to another, I am the disciple of Paul; and another, I follow Apollos: and thus, probably, they call themselves after the names of their admired preachers, factiously crying up one minister above another. Hence learn, That although it be a people's duty to have a great and high esteem of the ministers of Christ, yet must not their respect degenerate into a sinful admiration of their persons: for the factious affecting of one minister above another, is both sinful and dangerous. When the gift and abilities of one minister cried up to the contempt of others, it occasions enmity and dissention amongst ministers themselves and their people also: Are ye not carnal, when one saith, I am of Paul, and another, I of Apollos? It is added, chap. i. 13. And I of Christ: That is, they factiously said they were of, or for Christ, in opposition to his ministers. They pretended to the immediate teachings of Christ, and had no need of the ministry, either of Paul or Apollos. Learn hence, That although Christ only is to be relied upon, as head of his church, yet it is not his will we should despise his ministry, or condemn his ministers under that pretence.

5 Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?

As if the apostle had said, "Neither Paul nor Apollos were the authors of your faith, but only ministerial helpers of it, as God is pleased to furnish them with gifts, and to give a blessing to their ministerial endeavours." Your ministers give out to you as God gives in to them: and therefore you ought not factiously to boast of their gifts, nor to make parties upon that account. Learn hence, 1. That the ministry of the word is the instituted mean and instrumental cause, which God hath appointed for working faith in the hearts of men. 2. That God has furnished his ministers with variety of gifts and abilities; all which he makes use of, in order to that end. 3. That, therefore, the ministers of Christ ought neither to be deified nor nullified, neither to be cried up, nor trodden down; we are not efficient causes, but only instrumental means of faith. Render, therefore, unto God the glory of the author, and unto ministers the honour of the instrument. "Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers?"

6 I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase.

I planted: That is, I first preached the gospel among you, and first instructed you in the principles of Christ: I converted you to Christ. After me came Apollos, and watered the seed which I had sown; but God it was, and God alone, that caused the seed which I sowed, and Apollos watered, to fructify and increase. Learn, 1. That it is an act of discriminating grace and favour in God, to send out his ministers to plant the gospel amongst a people that never before heard of it. 2. That it is an act of farther favour and grace in God, to follow a people with a succession of ministers, in order to the watering of the seed formerly sown amongst them. Learn, 3. That all that ministers can do, is but to plant and water; they cannot give increase, nor procure the success of their ministerial endeavours. Blessed be God, that he doth not require the success of our labours at our hands. Woe unto us, should we say, "Either reconcile my people to me, or I will never be reconciled unto you. Diligence and endeavour is our's, the blessing and success is God's: He will never blame us for not doing his work."

7 So then, neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth; but God that giveth the increase.

The sense is, "Neither is he that planteth to be esteemed as any thing, nor he that watereth as any thing, but the glory of all must be ascribed to God that giveth the increase." Yet must we understand the apostle speaking thus not absolutely, but comparatively: "They are not any thing, that is not any thing of themselves alone, without the concurrence of the Spirit; what excellent gifts soever they have, they cannot of themselves make the word they preach effectual." Lord! how many souls do find both ministry and ministers to be nothing as to them? If it be any thing to purpose to any soul, it is God, and not his ministers, that make it so. The best and ablest ministry is nothing to any saving purpose, without God's power giving the increase.

8 Now he that planteth, and he that watereth, are one: and every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour.

*He that planteth and he that watereth are one: that is, in their design and scope, in the aim and end of their ministry: therefore, they should not be factiously divided, either among themselves, or by their hearers. Although there is a variety and diversity in the gifts of Christ's ministers, yet the intent and design of their ministry being one, they all ought to agree as one. They should be one in doctrine, and one in affection, aiming at one and the same mark; namely, the glory of God and men's salvation, as they are one in their office, institution and end. It follows, "Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour." Thence learn, That every man, especially every minister, is sure to receive a proportionable reward hereafter, according to his labour and working for God here. Learn, 2. The appropriation and distinction of this reward: He shall receive his own reward; implying that there are degrees of reward and glory in heaven, according as men have laboured more or less for God here on earth: According to this gradual diversity shall be gradual degrees of glory. Learn, 3. The measure and rule of this reward; according to his labour, not according to his success; according to his industry, not according to the fruit of his ministry: If he labours faithfully, God will reward him proportionably, though few or none have believed his report.*

9 For we are labourers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building.

Observe here, 1. The honourable title put upon the ministers of God; they are labourers, or workers together with God. But in what sense are they so? Ans. Not so by any power of their own, to produce any spiritual effect, as if they without God could work faith and repentance in the hearts of sinners; but they work only by an external application of the ministry of the word, and the means of grace to the souls of men. They are under-labourers to God, and God honours them by working by them, and working with them, for the conversion of men. Observe, 2. The honourable relation in which the church stands to God: The church and people of God, are his husbandry, and his building: Ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building. Which phrase implies, 1. Power and goodness in making them so: A building is not of itself, nor is a field clothed with goodly corn of itself. 2. It implies dominion and absolute sovereignty: The master is the orderer of the house, and the husbandman the disposer of his ground. 3. It denotes propriety and interest, that we are not our own, but God's. The house is the owner's, not its own. God is theirs, and all that God has is theirs also.

10 According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise-master-builder I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.

Observe here, 1. The character which St. Paul assumes to himself, namely, that of a master-builder, yea, of a wise master-builder. But was it not vain-glorious in the apostle thus to describe himself? Is not Christ the great and wise master-builder of his church? Yes, undoubtedly: But the apostles were instruments in his hand, which he honoured with success; for which reason, St. Paul thus speaks. Learn hence, That in some cases it is not vain-glory, but a necessary duty, for the ministers of Christ to magnify their work and office received from Christ. Observe, 2. The special work performed by St. Paul, the wise-master-builder, he laid the foundation: that is, he first acquainted them with the rudiments and fundamental principles of the Christian religion, which they had never heard of before. Learn thence, that it is a special part of divine wisdom in a minister to lay at first a good foundation of scripture knowledge in the minds and understandings of his people. Unless we have a knowing people, we are not like to have a gracious people. All our sermons will be dashed to pieces upon the rock of our people's ignorance, if they be not well catechised and instructed in the fundamentals of Christianity. Observe, 3. How very careful our apostle is to ascribe all his strength, his assistance and success as a master-builder to the grace of God: According to the grace of God given to me. Learn thence, That it is the property of every godly man, much more of every gracious minister, to attribute all that good which is either received or done by him, to the grace of God. What man ever received more grace from God, or did more service for God, than St. Paul? And so enlarged is he upon all occasions in magnifying the grace of God, that he is never satisfied in exalting of it; Not I, but the grace of God that was with me, &c. Observe, 4. The cautionary direction given by St. Paul to all succeeding ministers of Christ, to take heed that they lay no other foundation than what was laid by him: and that they build suitably upon that foundation; Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereon. Learn hence, That the ministers of Christ are to take especial care that they preach no other doctrine than what Christ and his apostles preached, and laid as the foundation of Christianity; and that they do not build upon that foundation any doctrine which may endanger their own or their people's salvation: I have laid the foundation, and let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon."

11 For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

That is, no other true foundation can any man lay, than that which is already laid by me; namely, the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and faith in him. The ministers of Christ ought to lay no other foundation than Christ: They are to lead their people to, and build them upon, no other rock but Christ. All threatenings, promises, commands, duties, privileges, are to be preached, and pressed with respect to Jesus Christ; he is to be laid as the only foundation in respect of knowledge, in respect of faith, in respect of justification, in respect of intercession and acceptance with God. The minister's great work is to set Christ forth in all his glorious fulness, to represent him in all his offices, as a glorious object for the eye of our faith to look into, and fix upon.

12 Now if any man build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble;

13 Every man's work shall be made manifest. For the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is.

14 If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward.

15 If any man's work shall be burnt, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.

In these words the apostle speaks of two sorts of preachers under the metaphor of builders. 1. Some that are sound and orthodox, who hold the foundation, and build upon it gold, silver, and precious stones; that is, such sincere and wholesome doctrine as will bear the touch-stone and trial. 2. Others that are unsound and erroneous, who hold indeed the foundation of Christianity, but build upon it such doctrines as will not bear the trial, expressed by wood, hay, and stubble, which are not proof against the fire. Learn hence, 1. That the doctrine of Christ and the truths of the gospel, are very excellent, and exceeding precious; compared to gold, silver, and precious stones, for their usefulness and preciousness. Learn, 2. That all errors and falsehoods in religion, all erroneous and false doctrines, though not fundamental, are yet no better than hay or stubble, vain and unprofitable, vile and contemptible. Observe, 3. As a two-fold builder described, so a two-fold event declared. Some men's works, that is, their doctrines and practices, will abide the fire, others will be burnt up, and suffer loss; where, by the fire, understand the word and Spirit of God. A probatory, not a purgatory fire, is here intended; because it is said to burn not the person, but the action, and every action too of every man. Now the popish purgatory fire ties not all persons, some are exempted as martyrs; and not all actions neither, but wicked ones only; whereas this fire shall try every man's work. The meaning is, that the light of God's word and Spirit will manifest the verity or vanity, the soundness or falseness of doctrines delivered by all preachers. Sound doctrines, that, like good metal will endure the furnace, shall be rewarded; but such doctrines as will not endure the trial, shall miss of the reward. Learn hence, 1. That all the ways and works of wickedness in general, and all hidden and secret ways of false doctrine in particular, God will one day reveal and make manifest; "Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it." Learn, 2. That the true and sincere doctrine of the gospel is firm and durable, and such as will abide the closest trial; yea, and will grow more illustrious and glorious thereby. Learn, 3. That men may hold the foundation, and maintain the fundamentals of Christianity, and yet may so superstruct upon it, and superadd so many things unto it, whereby they may greatly endanger their own and others' salvation: They shall be saved, yet so as by fire; that is, with great difficulty, having exposed themselves to the utmost hazard and danger. The speech is proverbial, and signifies both the greatness of the danger, and the difficulty of escaping it; intimating, that errors in judgment endanger a person's salvation, as well as ungodliness in practice. He that has a due care of his soul's salvation, will be as well afraid of erroneous principles, as he is of debauched practices: For error is as damnable as vice: The one is an open road, the other a by-path to hell and destruction.

16 ¶ Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?

17 If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy: for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

Our apostle here, in the judgment of some interpreters, makes use of a farther argument to convince the Corinthians of the evil of their divisions. They are the church and temple of God, themselves not to be profaned by divisions: Know ye not that ye are the temple of God? as if the apostle had said, "You Corinthians, by being converted to Christianity, are become a christian church, an holy temple, in which the Spirit of God doth dwell, and where the Spirit of division ought not to dwell; for if any man defile the temple of God by dividing the church into factions and parties, him will God destroy; for the temple of the Lord is holy, and not to be profane, by your dividing lusts, which temple ye are." Learn hence, 1. That the people of God, met together to worship him, are the church or spiritual temple of God. 2. That the Spirit of God dwells in the church, or temple of God: and this dwelling implies propriety, familiarity, authority, residency, and fixedness of abode. Learn 3. That such as defile the holy temple of God, either by factious divisions, or erroneous doctrines, do provoke God to destroy them; that is, to punish them with temporal destruction, and, without repentance, with eternal damnation: "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy."

18 ¶ Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise.

19 For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God; for it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness.

20 And again, The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain.

Observe here, 1. A word of caution; Let no man deceive himself. Self-deceit is the ground of all other deceit. Whatever deceit is abroad, it begins at home. A deceitful heart will not spare so much as itself; although this self-deceit be most unnatural and monstrous, most fatal and pernicious. Observe, 2. A word of exhortation, If any man seem to be wise, let him become a fool, that he may be wise: that is, "If any man seems to be wise in the wisdom and learning of this world, let him embrace the doctrine of Christ, which the world calls foolishness, and so become a fool to them, that he may be wise according to the wisdom of God." Learn hence, That all human and worldly wisdom cometh far short of, and is but a mere shadow and appearance, compared with the wisdom of God manifested in the gospel. Observe, 3. A word of enforcement: For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. It is so in God's opinion and estimation; he accounts it so. If we compare wit with grace, learning with religion, a rational head with a gracious heart, the latter infinitely transcends the former in the account of God. All the admired wisdom of worldly men, is nothing but contemptible folly in the esteem of God. The world's wise man, is God's fool. Observe, 4. A double testimony which the apostle produces out of the Old Testament to prove his assertion, that the wisdom of the world is foolishness with God. The first is out of Job v. 13. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. Learn hence, That no wisdom or craftiness of man can stand before the wisdom and power of God. The second testimony is taken out of Psalm xciv. 11. "The Lord knoweth the thoughts of men, that they are vain;" that is, the choicest and best thoughts of the wisest man are vain, yea, vanity.

21 Therefore let no man glory in men:
For all things are yours:

22 Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours;

23 And ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's.

Here the apostle closes his discourse with an inference not to glory in any teacher whatsoever, either in Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, seeing they were all theirs; that is, all the apostles and ministers of Christ, from the highest to the lowest, from the greatest to the least, and all their ministerial gifts and labours, are all obtained and appointed by God for their use and service: All things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas. Learn hence, That all ministers, and ministerial abilities, are wholly for the church's service, and spiritual advantage: all their power is for the church's preservation, all their gifts are for the church's edification. Their message is for the church's comfort and consolation: Thus all things in and belonging to the church, are ours. Next he mentions the things of the world as ours. Or the world; that is, all the good things in the world are ours, houses, lands, honours, friends, relations, so far as God sees them good for us. But are there not many that are Christ's, who want houses and friends, and other comforts; how then can they be said to have them? Ans. 1. They have all things eminently and transcendently in God and Christ, by whom they have a title to all things, Rev. xxi. 7. 2. They have all things virtually, in that contentment and satisfaction of mind which they do enjoy. 3. They have all things eventually; they have the good of all things, when they have not the actual possession of all things, their very wants, in the event, work for good. Or life; this is our's two ways: The comfort of life is ours, and the end of life is ours, with the true use of it; for the sincere Christian only lives to purpose, by answering the great end of life, which is the promoting God's glory, and securing his own salvation. Or death; that which is in itself so terrible is for the believer's advantage, their friend, their privilege, their passage to heaven, their deliverer from sin, the perfecter of their grace; when we come at heaven, and not till then, we shall fully understand what this meaneth, Death is ours. Or things present; that is, all the events of providence which befall us, whether prosperity or adversity, health or sickness, riches or poverty, they are all sanctified to us, and are instrumental for the sanctifying of us. They are covenant-blessings, and dispensed in love to us. Or things to come; that is, all future things which may befall us in this world, and in the world to come, shall be to our abundant advantage, whether they be merciful or good things, or grievous and sad things: particularly, death is to come, but to die is gain: Christ's death was the death of death; he has disarmed death of its sting: the believer fears not its dart; it is not an hurting, but an healing serpent: There is no venom or malignity in it: but that which was before in the number of threatenings, is now brought within the compass of the gospel-promises; all things are ours, life or death, things present, and things to come. And ye are Christ's: that is, not Paul's or Apollos' disciples or servants, but only Christ's, therefore glory only in him. Consecrate all to the service of Christ, and resign up all to the will of Christ; ye are Christ's by donation, ye are Christ's by redemption, ye are Christ's by conquest; ye are therefore to glory in him and in him only. And Christ is God's: that is, as you are Christ's, and for his glory; so Christ, as Mediator, is God's, and for his glory. He is God's servant, to do his will, to execute his pleasure: He was begotten of his Father before all time: He received his doctrine from the Father in the fulness of time: He sought not his own, but his Father's glory, in the doctrine which he preached, in the miracles which he wrought; but lived in an entire resignation to his Father's pleasure. Lord! how will it shame us, thy servants, to follow thy servant Christ, and to be called by his name, if we seek not his glory, and exalt not his will, and live not to his praise, who died for us and rose again.

CHAP. IV.

There are two extremes which persons are very apt to run into, with reverence to the ministers of Christ; namely, to extol, admire, and even idolize some; and to depress, undervalue, and even vilify others. To cure the former evil, was the great design and endeavour of St. Paul in the foregoing chapter: To prevent the latter, and to preserve that due honour, and keep up that just esteem which is payable to all ministers of Christ, it is the design and scope of the apostle in the chapter before us : and accordingly, thus he speaks :

LET a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God.

2 Moreover, it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful.

As if the apostle had said, " Although I warned you in the foregoing chapter, against an undue esteem of your pastors, and against a factious preference of some before others, to the great scandal of religion, and the prejudice of the gospel; yet I speak not this to draw you off from paying that due honour and deserved respect which belongs to their character: but I desire you to account them all, neither more nor less, but as ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God." Here observe, 1. A double character given of an evangelical pastor. He is, 1. A minister of Christ; that is, a person deputed by the command, and invested with the authority of Christ, to administer in holy things, to preach the word, administer the sacraments, execute church-censures; being in all things an example to the flock: And the people are to account the office and work of the ministry, as a divine institution and appointment of Christ in his church: Whoever slights or opposes the ministry, flies in the face of Christ himself. 2. He is a steward of the mysteries of God; and that in a twofold respect. 1. He is a steward of the truths of God. 2. Of the ordinances of God. Of the truths of God he is a steward, to open and explain them for the spiritual edification of all Christians, and to defend and maintain them against the opposition of all adversaries; God's steward must not suffer villain to destroy the provision of God's household. He is a steward of the ordinances of God also; which he is obliged to dispense in all faithfulness to his congregation: 1 Pet. iv. 10. "As every man hath received the gifts, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God." Observe, 2. As the ministers of Christ are described, they are stewards; so the qualifications of a steward is declared, and that is faithfulness: It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful. What ground is there for trust, when there is no truth! Now this faithfulness in our stewardship, includes, 1. Purity of intention: A pure end in all our services will give us abundance of comfort at the end of our service. 2. Sincerity and integrity of heart: A faithful minister is a sincere hearted minister, who preaches his sermons first to himself, and then to his hearers. 3. Ministerial diligence: A slothful minister can never be a faithful steward: We must study the truths of God to paleness, preach them to faintness, maintain and defend them with steadfastness: We look for happiness from God, as long as he is in heaven, and he expects faithfulness from us as long as we are upon earth. 4. Faithfulness in stewardship, includes impartiality in all the administrations of Christ's house: We must take the same care of, manifest the same love unto, attend with the same diligence upon, the poorest and meanest in our congregations, as we do the rich, the great, and the honourable: For all our souls are of one price, and rated at one value in our Lord's book. Oh! let us take care we be impartial stewards; for we must shortly give an account of our stewardship before an impartial God.

3 But with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment: yea, I judge not mine own-self.

Not as if the apostle was unconcerned, whether the Corinthians had a good esteem of him or not; or were regardless of his reputation among men: but the meaning is, he did not much value himself upon the opinion and judgment which any persons had of him; knowing that his case would not be finally determined by any man's judgment, nor yet by his own. Therefore, says he, I judge not myself; that is, definitively, so as to acquiesce in that judgment: For I may be deceived in my judgment of myself, therefore I leave myself to the judgment of God. It is a singular support to all the members, but especially the ministers of Jesus Christ, that they and their actions have a more righteous judge to be examined and tried by, than either the world or themselves: The world's judgment may falsely condemn them, their own judgment may flatter and deceive them; but the judgment of God will deal impartially with them.

4 For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but he that judgeth me is the Lord.

These words are not to be understood absolutely and universally, but relatively, and respectfully; not as if the apostle knew no sin in himself, (for he went groaning under a body of sin to his grave) but with respect to his ministry; his conscience cleared him of all unfaithfulness and neglect of duty: Though I know nothing of unfaithfulness by myself, yet am I not thereby justified at God's tribunal, for he that judgeth me is the Lord. Note here, 1. St Paul's justification of himself before men, he knew nothing by himself; that is, in general, his conscience did not accuse him of any gross prevaricating with God, and in particular did not charge him with any negligence or unfaithfulness, in respect of his office; he had not been an unfaithful steward of divine mysteries, nor guilty of any crimes that his adversaries could charge him with. Note, 2. His disclaiming all justification thereby in the sight of God; yet am I not thereby justified; his sincerity did comfort him, but could not justify him:—The righteousness of the holiest and best of men, is not pleadable before the righteous and holy God for justification. The reason given why the apostle did not, durst not, plead his own righteousness before God for justification; For he that judgeth me is the Lord; as if he had said, "Were I to appear at man's bar, I doubt not but to come off well enough, for none knows me so well as myself; but I have to do with an heart-searching God, who knows me better than myself; and when God comes to look over my work, he will spy that which the most eagle-eyed person cannot spy. Therefore, there is no standing for me, a creature, before God, in any creature-purity. Angelical perfection is imperfect in his sight. Angels, though they have not the least spot of sin in their natures, yet are they chargeable with folly; their nature being potentially sinful; and the heavens themselves are not clear in God's sight."

5 Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God.

Our apostle's design in these words, is not to condemn all judgment of persons, words or actions, or to oblige us to suspend our judging till the day of judgment; but only forbids rash-censuring, unadvised, uncertain, and unseasonable judging of the hearts, and final states of men. We may judge what appeareth, but not what is hidden and unseen; for the judging of hidden things is referred to him from whom nothing is hidden. Learn hence, That to take upon us to judge the heart, or to judge that which doth not appear, is to assume the office, and to take upon us the place of God; only he that is invisible can look into that which is invisible. Observe farther, The person spoken of, "who makes manifest the counsels of the heart, and brings to light the hidden things of darkness; it is Jesus Christ: Judge nothing till the Lord come," the Lord Jesus Christ. A strong argument to prove the divinity of our blessed Saviour: He that has knowledge of the heart, of the secrets of the hearts of all men, and has all these subject to his judgment, is undoubtedly God. But Christ ascribes all this knowledge to himself, Rev. ii. 23. "All the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give to every one according to his works;" therefore he is essentially and really God. Observe, lastly, What will be the issue and consequence of our Lord's knowing and judging the secrets of men; Then shall every one have praise of God; that is, every one shall have praise, that is praise-worthy; every good man, though now dispraised and despised, though censured and condemned, though loaded with scandals and false reports, yet then every righteous man shall have praise from Christ the righteous Judge.

6 And these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and to Apollos for your sakes; that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written, that no one of you be puffed up for one against another.

Here the apostle prosecutes his former argument afresh, that neither the Corinthians, nor any other Christian, should so overvalue and magnify some ministers of the gospel, as to undervalue and despise others, making men of eminency the heads of factions and parties; but that they esteem all ministers as instruments only in Christ's hand, doing nothing of themselves, but assisted by the grace and strength of God, to whom, therefore, the success and entire praise of all their labours is due. This is to think of them according to what is written, chap. iii. 6, 8. "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers?" Learn hence, That it is too usual, when people have a very great and high esteem of the ministers of Christ, to overvalue themselves by reason of their relation to them and dependence upon them; and whilst they honour and magnify some, to vilify and disesteem others. This is the fault which all along our apostle has been condemning since he began this epistle, and he has not yet done with it: for thus he proceeds:

7 ¶ For who maketh thee to differ from another? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as thou hadst not received it?

As if the apostle had said, "Who is it that maketh one minister to differ from, and excel another? Is it not God? If so, then, let those ministers that have received the greatest gifts from God, whom the inspiration of the Almighty hath made most wise and understanding, be most humble themselves; and let none take occasion from hence, to despise others who have received less." Learn hence, That ministers of great abilities, eminent for gifts and graces, are in great danger of being puffed up themselves, and their people also too prone to glory in them: There is a temptation in good things, yea, in the best things, to pride; the best men on earth may be overheated by what they have received from heaven; and Satan may take occasion, even from our raptures in spirit, to puff us up with spiritual pride: therefore our apostle puts forth his soul-humbling and pride-mortifying expostulation, "What hast thou that thou hast not received? Who made thee to differ?" There is nothing wherein one minister, or indeed one man, differeth, or is distinguished from another, or wherein he excelleth another, but it is given him from God; it is God, and not himself, that makes him to differ; it is an high degree of pride for any man to say, Ego discrevi meipsum, I of myself have made myself to differ.

8 Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye have reigned as kings without us; and I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you.

9 For I think, that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were men appointed to death: For we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men.

10 We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised.

These words are looked upon by interpreters as an ironical reproof given by St. Paul to the Corinthians, in which, with an holy derision, he rebukes the overweening and high opinion which they had of their present attainments and spiritual perfections. Now ye are full, &c. As if he had said, "Now you think yourselves so full and rich in all kinds of knowledge, that you despise your spiritual fathers, myself and Apollos, who first converted you to the faith: we are looked upon as dull fellows, not worthy to be named in the same day with your new-admired teachers. You advance yourselves as much above us, as a king above his own subjects. I wish with all my heart your happiness were real, that we might be sharers in it; but verily I fear that you are only puffed up with notions; I fear ye have little except in conceit, and there you have a great deal too much. Learn hence, That spiritual pride, that is, boasting of, and glorying in the gifts, graces, or privileges which are conferred upon us, is a sin which the devil strongly tempts, and professors are extremely prone to the practice and commission of. "Now ye are full, now ye are rich." Observe next, As the flourishing condition of the Corinthians is ironically described, so the afflicted and persecuted condition of the apostles is plainly declared: "We are a spectacle to the world, and appointed to death." The original word is, We are set as upon a theatre or stage, in public view; heaven, earth, and hell are spectators; God, angels, and men, wait to see the glorious triumphs of our faith and fortitude. What a great solemnity is there at the sufferings of a saint! Bloody persecutors are for making all the members, especially all the ministers of Christ, a spectacle to the world; an allusion to the Roman spectacles, who carried those persons about for a sight that were to fight with wild beasts; and if they escaped, were only reserved for slaughter another day: Thus the apostles in their martyrdom conflicted with all sorts of misery, and with death itself at last. Observe, lastly, How the false professors of christianity branded the apostles with folly, for exposing themselves thus to sufferings and death for the sake of Christ: "We are fools for Christ's sake, but we are wise in Christ; that is, in your account we are fools, because we run so many hazards for the sake of Christ; but you are wise in your profession of Christ, because you have an art to profess him, and yet enjoy outward prosperity with him. The wisdom of suffering Christians, in hazarding all for Christ, and laying down their lives in the cause of Christ, has been always accounted weakness and folly by the men of the world: "We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ."

11 Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place;

12 And labour, working with our own hands. Being reviled, we bless: being persecuted, we suffer it:

13 Being defamed, we entreat: we are made as the filth of the world, and are the off-scourings of all things unto this day.

Observe here, 1. The several kinds of sufferings which the holy apostles were exposed to, and exercised with, namely, hunger and want, poverty and reproach, persecution and death. They suffered in their bodies by hunger and nakedness, and stripes; in their names by scandals and reproaches, being accounted the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things. The word, say some, signifies that dirt and filth which scavengers do rake together in the streets, and to carry the dunghill. Others think it an allusion to the sacrifices which the heathens used for the lustration of a city, who when their city was under any great calamity, chose out some very base, vile, any nasty person, and burnt him in a ditch, and cast his ashes into the sea, as a sacrifice unto Neptune, saying, "Be thou a purgation for us." Such a base and vile esteem had the world of the holy apostles and messengers of Christ. Lord! to see such a man as St. Paul going up and down the world with a naked back and empty belly, without an house of settled abode to hide his head in; one that did more service for God in a day, than perhaps we have done him in all our days; can we, the ministers of Christ, complain of hard usage from the world, when we consider what this great apostle suffered in the world? Observe, 2. The duration and continuance of the apostles' sufferings, even unto this day, and unto this present hour. It was not only at their first entrance upon the apostolical office, when all the world was set against Christianity, that they met with this usage, but all along, from the first hour they began to preach the gospel, even unto this hour, did they meet with opposition and persecution. As long as there is a devil in hell, and wicked men upon the earth, all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution: But surely the dregs of this cup have in all ages been reserved for the ministers of Christ Jesus; as if to preach were nothing else but to stir up the rage, and be blotted with the obloquies of men. Observe, 3. The holy and humble behaviour, the meek and patient carriage and demeanour of the apostles, under all this load and burden of reproach and scorn, disgrace and shame, persecution and ill-usage: Being reviled, we bless. When we meet with opprobrious words, we are so far from rendering evil for evil, or railing for reviling that we speak well of, and wish well to, the persons that are thus injurious to us: Being persecuted by them, we suffer it patiently from them: Being defamed by any of them, we entreat God for them, to pity and pardon them; and we entreat them to pity themselves. To publish invectives against those, though the worst of men, who reproach and persecute us, is a modern piece of zeal which the blessed apostles and holy sufferers in the primitive times were little acquainted with, but perfect strangers to.

14 I write not these things to shame you, but, as my beloved sons, I warn you.

15 ¶ For though ye have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye, not many fathers; for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel.

16 Wherefore I beseech you, be ye followers of me.

Observe here, 1. The holy ingenuity of the apostle discovered in the sharp reproofs given to the Corinthians: It was to warn them of their duty, not to reproach them for their crimes; "I write not these things to shame, but warn you." The ministers of God take for greater pleasure in exhorting people to be good, than in complaining of their badness. Observe, 2. The relation which St. Paul stood in to the Corinthians; he was their spiritual father, and they his children. He first converted them to Christianity, by his ministry amongst them. "In Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." In Christ Jesus; that is, by the gracious influence of the Spirit of Christ, accompanying my preaching, I have turned you from idols to serve the living and true God. Hence it is, that I have such an endeared affection for you, and challenge a deserved respect from you. Learn from hence, That persons may and ought to have a great value for, and bear a tender respect towards, those ministers whom God hath honoured, by making them instruments of their first conversion, and bringing home to Christ. These are in a proper sense their spiritual fathers: and verily there is no greater love, no stronger affection betwixt any relations upon earth, than between the ministers of Christ, and such of their beloved people, as they have been happily instrumental to bring home to God. Observe, 3. The apostle having asserted his relation to them, that of a spiritual father, challenges from them their duty of obedient children: namely, to follow him in the steps of holiness, and sincere obedience; "Wherefore, I beseech you, be ye followers of me." Lord! what holiness of life, and exactness of conversation, ought to be found with the ministers of Christ, seeing they are to be patterns as well as preachers; and their people not only to be their hearers, but their followers! We are to tread out before them the steps which they are to take towards heaven; and it will be found at the great day as dangerous to have misled them by our example, as by our doctrine. Happy those ministers that can safely say to their people, Be ye followers of us.

17 For this cause have I sent unto you Timotheus, who is my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord, who shall bring you into remembrance of my ways which be in Christ, as I teach every where in every church.

No sooner had St. Paul planted a church in Corinth, but by the envy and malice of Satan, most notorious disorders, and scandalous abuses crept into it. To obviate which great and growing mischief, he writes them his mind in this epistle. But lest this method should prove ineffectual, because writing at a distance is not so moving as conferring face to face, he sends Timotheus unto them, to excite and persuade them to their duty, by bringing to their remembrance his ways which were in Christ, both what he had formerly taught, and did yet continue to teach in every church: "I have sent unto you Timotheus, my beloved son, and faithful in the Lord." Here note, 1. The messenger sent to them, described by his name, Timotheus, or Timothy; by his relation, his beloved son: that is, his son in the faith, his spiritual son, possibly converted, undoubtedly instructed by him in the principles of Christianity. He is farther described by his zeal and diligence in the work of the gospel: Faithful in the Lord; that is, faithful in the work of the Lord. A noble character of a gospel-minister, faithful to God, faithful to souls, faithful in his intentions, faithful in his endeavours, faithful in all the administrations of Christ's house, faithful and affectionate towards the poor of the flock, remembering that all souls are rated at one value in his Master's book; faithful in public preaching, faithful in private inspection. Happy are the people who have such faithful persons for their spiritual guides and pastors. Note, 2. The message and errand Timothy was sent upon; namely, to acquaint the Corinthians with St. Paul's doctrine and practice, and to excite and persuade them to their duty, by bringing his ways to their remembrance. Where observe, That St. Paul had led so holy and unblameable a conversation in every place where he had lived, that he is neither afraid nor ashamed that his course of life should be discovered and made known to all the world. A great example for our imitation, to walk before God and our people with such care and caution, with such heedfulness and circumspection, that we need not blush, when either our doctrine or practice are published before all the churches of Jesus Christ. Timothy shall acquaint you with my ways, and with what I teach every where in every church.

18 Now some are puffed up, as though I would not come to you.

19 But I will come to you shortly, if the Lord will, and will know, not the speech of them which are puffed up, but the power.

20 For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power.

Observe here, 1. The advantage which the height and haughtiness of some envious teachers took, upon St. Paul's absence from Corinth; they entertained low and contemptuous thoughts of him, and vaunted that he durst not come before them, nor stand among them. Observe, 2. St. Paul's positive resolution to come again to Corinth with God's permission, with the reason for that resolution: "I will come and know, not the speech of them that are puffed up, but the power;" that is, I will certainly come and try your boasting envious teachers, not by their plausible words, and fine talk, discovering who hath the smoothest tongue; but I will examine the power; that is, first their authority to preach; and next what power and efficacy there is in their preaching; and lastly, what power and influence their preaching has upon their own practice; I will find out what real good they have done among you, after all their ostentatious braggings. Behold here, the true and great end of episcopal visitation, "For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power;" that is, Christianity doth not consist in talking, but in doing; not in vaunting, but performing great things. But by power, here may be understood, a power of working miracles for confirming and propagating the gospel, which the apostles had, but these teachers at Corinth had not. To convince men at first of the truth of Christianity, the dead were raised, the devils cast out, and many mighty wonders wrought by the apostles; by all which the gospel-doctrine was planted, propagated, established, and confirmed. The kingdom of God, or the gospel-church, was not raised at first, or carried on since, by the wisdom of words, by the charms of popular eloquence, and rhetorical flourishes, but by a plain way, and familiar manner of preaching the doctrines of the gospel, attested by miracles, and accompanied with works of divine efficacy and power. Thus the kingdom of God was not in word, but in power.

21 What will ye? Shall I come unto you with a rod, or in love, and in the spirit of meekness?

As if the apostle had said, "Come I will among you, to regulate disorders, and to rectify abuses: Now, chuse you how I shall come; whether in the milder way of kindness, love, and meekness towards you, or exercising the power God had given me, of inflicting corporal punishments on offenders, by delivering them to Satan as God's executioner upon their bodies." Note here, 1. A power which the apostle intimates himself to have in the Christian church; namely, the power of the rod, that is, a power of inflicting the severest of corporal punishments, even death itself, upon notorious offenders. Thus Elymas, the sorcerer, was smitten with blindness by St. Paul, Acts xiii. Annanias and Sapphira, struck dead by St. Peter, Acts v. Hymenæus and Philetus delivered unto Satan, 1. Tim. i. 20. It was usual with God in the earlier days of his gospel, to give Satan leave to seize the bodies of such as were for their obstinate perseverance in sin, cut off from the communion of the church; who plagued them with diseases, and sometimes with death, which is called the destruction of the flesh, 1 Cor. v. 5. Note, 2. The necessary reason for investing such a power, so great a power as this, in the apostle; because then there being no civil power of the magistrate on his side, had he been destitute of this extraordinary power, to punish bold and hardened transgressors, he could never have vindicated Christianity from contempt, much less have conciliated any tolerable respect either to himself or it. People would have despised his person, and made a mock of his new religion; whereas finding him clothed with this power, great fear fell upon the church, yea, on as many as heard these things, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified, Acts v. Note, 3. How loath and unwilling the apostle was to exercise this power of his, and to come unto them with a rod, desiring rather to use fair and gentle methods, and to come unto them in love, and in the spirit of meekness. His paternal tenderness and fatherly affection, prompted him to menace and threaten punishment, but only to the end that he might not execute and inflict it, provided they would be but obliged by kindness, and reclaimed by candid usage. Note, 4. That the apostle was sometimes forced, out of mere pity, to take his rod into his hand, to use sharpness, though with great reluctance; scourging them, to shew his compassion to them. In like manner must ecclesiastical rulers, to the end of the world, in order to maintain the church's purity and peace, by church censures, chastise that vice which doth deface the one, and those divisions that do disturb the other.

CHAP. V.

The apostle in this chapter, doth sharply rebuke the church at Corinth for their great negligence in punishing scandalous offenders, directing to excommunication, as the proper remedy for redressing such offences, and declaring the end and intention of that ecclesiastical censure to be the destruction of sin, and the salvation of the sinner. For thus he writes,

IT is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named amongst the Gentiles, that one should have his father's wife.

Observe here, 1. The persons, or the people blamed. The famous church of Corinth has fornication, nay incest charged upon her. Heinous sins may creep into the best and purest churches, yet doth not a church presently cease to be a true church; nor are Christians presently to separate from the communion of a church, because heinous crimes and scandalous offences are found in it. This church of Corinth was a true church, and it was schismatical to separate from her communion, although erroneous principles and scandalous practices were found amongst the members of it. Observe, 2. The crime charged upon them; namely, that fornication was found amongst them, yea the highest degree of fornication, to wit, incest. By the general name of fornication, all uncleanness is forbidden, all unlawful conjunctions and sinful mixtures are condemned. By incest, is to be understood the uncleanness of a person with some near relation, as a mother, a sister, &c. Observe, 3. The crime of incest is not barely expressed, but amplified and aggravated by its heinousness, such as was not named amongst the Gentiles. Not but that many of the more brutish Gentiles were guilty of this sin, but the more civilized amongst the Gentiles did, by the light of nature, detest and abhor it, condemn and forbid it. Lord! how sad is it, that what is not so much as named among the Heathens, should be practised amongst Christians; whereas such sins ought not to be so much as named among Christians, which are practised among the Heathens. Observe, 4. The notoriousness of the crime; It is commonly reported: the fame, or rather the infamy of the fact spread far and near; the sin became so public, that it could not be coloured, much less concealed. All sin is a work of darkness. Uncleanness, particularly, delights in darkness; therefore the notoriety of the act bespoke the impudence of the agent. Ah, sad day! when men declare their sin like Sodom, they hide it not. When both shame and fear are cast off, sin hath an hard forehead, a brazen brow.

2 And ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you.

Here note, 1. The fault charged upon the church, they did not censure this offender, therefore the apostle censures them. The tolerating of scandalous sins, in particular members of the churches, is a thing very displeasing to Christ, and offensive to his ministers. Note, 2. As they did not censure the offenders, so neither did they mourn for the offence, as they should and ought to have done. Learn, That the falls of particular members of churches are a just cause of mourning to the whole church: As members of the same body, we should sympathize with one another; what the natural members do, the mystical members ought to do. Note, 3. The cause of both, why they did neither censure the offender, nor mourn for the offence; they were puffed up; partly with pride of their own gifts, and partly with vain glory, upon account of the admired teachers. Now, this pride hindered their sorrow; a proud man is seldom a compassionate man: True humility will teach us to lament and bewail others' frailty. Ye are puffed up, and have not mourned: The original word to mourn, seems to refer to a custom in the primitive times, when Christians put on so-lemly mourning attire, and bewailed excommunicated persons as those that are dead. These Corinthians being puffed up with pride, were so far from their compassionate mourning over this incestuous person, that they rather rejoiced at it, and insulted over that party to whom this person belonged. So prone are persons to rejoice at the downfall of others, either by sin or by affliction.

3 For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present; concerning him that hath so done this deed;

4 In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ.

5 To deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

As if the apostle had said, "Although I am absent from you in body, yet in mind and consent I am present with you, and also by my discerning spirit, by which I am enabled to discern things done at a distance; and accordingly, by the authority and power given me by our Lord Jesus Christ, I have already determined, that when you are solemnly gathered together in the name of Christ, and have my spirit concurring with you, and the power of Christ confirming the sentence pronounced by you, that you deliver this incestuous person unto Satan, by casting him out of the church, and leaving him to God's executioner, to inflict destructive punishment on his body, to bring him to repentance, for the saving of his soul. Here note, 1. The censure and sentence pronounced, excommunication, which consisteth of two parts: 1. Private, in a separation from the communion of saints. 2. Positive, which is here expressed by delivering unto Satan, who had then a power over the excommunicated person's body, to torment it with diseases: which power, though now ceased, yet the Christian church has at this day, a power to exclude enormous offenders from the ordinary means of grace and salvation, and to expose them to the malice and temptations of their grand adversary the devil by depriving them of church communion, which is a more dreadful punishment than persons are sensible of. Note, 2. The person inflicting this censure, St. Paul: I have judged already: he pronounced it judicially and requires the Corinthians, to denounce it solemnly. I have judged already: implying, that he did not determine rashly and suddenly, but advisedly as became a judge. And mark, They must denounce solemnly what he had determined judicially, and this in the face of the whole church, when ye are gathered together; that is, in the presence of the chief pastor, and all his flock at Corinth. A public crime must have a public doom, that others may hear and fear: Yet remark, the congregation or church were witnesses of the censure, but they did not judge and determine it. The apostle did that. The power of the keys is in the hands of the church, only, quoad xpm quoad sinum: That the church may have the benefit of them, not the managing of them, for that is committed to the pastors only, as appears, Matt. xvi. John xx. Note, 3. The solemn and awful manner, in which the censure and excommunication was and ought to be pronounced. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: that is, having first, in a solemn manner, called upon the Lord Jesus Christ for his direction and benediction: or in the name of our Lord Jesus: that is, according to the command of Christ, by the power and authority of Christ, and with an eye to the glory of Christ. This should be the manner, and these should be the ends in denouncing church censures: And then Christ will be at the consistory, and his co-operation will make good the censure, as his commission was our warrant to pronounce it; and then the penitent may and ought to dread the sentence, as coming out of Christ's own mouth, and to be inflicted by Christ's own hand. Note, 4. The miserable case and state which the person that is duly excommunicated is in. He is then delivered unto Satan, as God's executioner, to inflict severe punishments on the person's body, now cast out of God's special protection, deprived of the church's communion, and exposed to the temptations and snares of our grand adversary, Satan. St. Austin, in his time, declared, that it was then thought gravius quam gladio feriri, much more grievous to be excommunicated, than to be beheaded. But, Lord, where are the persons, at this day, who tremble when their sins have brought them into this miserable case and state? Note, 5. That persons ought not to be in this severe and solemn manner proceeded against, but for notorious scandalous sins. To denounce this awful censure upon every slight and trivial occasion, is to prostitute one of the most venerable ordinances of Christ to contempt and scorn. Note, 6. The greatest and special end for which this ordinance of excommunication was instituted by Christ in his church, and executed by his apostles; namely, to recover the fallen person by repentance, and to be a warning to others. The reforming, and not the ruining of men, was the intention of this ordinance: The censure is not mortal, but medicinal. It is, 1. For the destruction of the flesh, so lascivious in him; for the mortifying his lusts, by afflicting him with grief and sorrow. 2. For the saving of his spirit, that is, his soul, that this may be recovered out of the snare of the devil. Lastly, The time is expressed, when the penitent person shall find the benefit of this painful ordinance; namely, in the day of the Lord Jesus: not but that a penitent in this life, shall find some ease in his conscience, and satisfaction in his spirit; but the full benefit of ecclesiastical censure is reserved to the day of the Lord, The day of judgment: Then will Christ manifest to the church triumphant, the good effect of the power of the keys, which he hath committed to his ministers, to be exercised publicly in the church militant: He will then reveal how all stand bound in heaven, whom his church never loosed on earth; and all whom his church hath loosed on earth, shall then appear to be loosed in heaven.

6 Your glorying is not good. Know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump?

7 Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened.—

As if the apostle had said, "You Corinthians are prone to pride yourselves in the numbers of wise and wealthy men, that are found among you; you glory that Corinth is the eye of Greece, and Greece the eye of the world; but what do you glory in this for? When you have such a scandalous person among you (the incestuous man) who is a blot and blemish to your whole society, know ye not, that as a little leaven leaveneth and soureth the whole lump; so such a member, continued among you, will defile the whole body or society of Christians with you? Therefore purge out this old leaven (cast this scandalous person out of your communion) that ye may be a new leaven (your whole church an holy society) as ye are unleavened; that is, forasmuch as ye are, by your profession of Christianity, obliged to be unleavened, that is, separated from sin and sinners." Learn hence, 1. That all sin, in general, but the sin of uncleanness in particular, is as leaven in regard of its spreading and diffusive nature: Old leaven it is here called, because the Corinthians had been long infamous for this sin of uncleanness, even to a proverb. Observe next, That the apostle having used this similitude of leaven, he pursues it, in allusion to the Jewish custom, before the celebration of the passover, who were to cast all leaven out of their houses with detestation and cursing, upon penalty of being cut off from the congregation of Israel. Thus the holy profession of Christianity obliges every one of us to cut off every notorious sinner from our society, every lust from our hearts, every member of the old Adam, that we may be a new lump, answering our holy and heavenly calling.

—For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us.

8 Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.

Observe here, The apostle's reason, why the old leaven of uncleanness and malicious wickedness should be put away by us; namely, because Christ our passover is sacrificed for us. We should therefore be as careful to put away sinful leaven out of our hearts, as the Jews were to cast the material leaven out of their houses. Learn hence, 1. That Christ is our passover, or paschal lamb; in allusion to which, he is often called a lamb in the New Testament: We do not find him expressed in the New Testament by the name of any other animals, which typified him, but only this of a lamb, this being more significant of his innocency and sufficiency, than any other. St. John i. 29. He is called God's lamb: here he is called our passover, or paschal lamb: God's, in regard of the author; ours, in regard to the end; God's, in regard of designation; ours, in regard of acceptance. Learn, 2. That Christ is our sacrifice. A sacrifice was necessary for a sinful creature to atone divine displeasure: A sacrifice for sin, must be pure and sinless; no such sacrifice could be found but the eternal Son of God; for whatever any creature could do or suffer, had been but a debt or duty, and that could never have made compensation or satisfaction for a debt or rebellion. Learn, 3. That Christ was a sacrifice for us, not for himself; for being perfectly sinless, he needed no sacrifice. Now, the notion of all sacrifices, both among Jews and Heathens, was this, That they were substituted in the room and place of the offender, to appease an offended Deity, and exempt the guilty person from punishment. Accordingly our sins were imputed to Christ, and he died under the imputed guilt of them, as a reputed sinner; for we cannot conceive how divine justice should inflict the punishment upon Christ, had it not first considered him under guilt. The weight of all our sin was laid upon his innocent shoulders: our guilt became his by a voluntary susception of the punishment: and consequently, the sufferings of this sacrifice are imputed to us. He took our sins upon himself, as if he had actually sinned; and gave us the benefit of his suffering, as if we had actually suffered and satisfied. Observe, next, The inference drawn by the apostle from Christ's dying as a sacrifice for us. Therefore let us keep the feast: not an anniversary, or yearly, but a daily feast, even all the days of our Christian life; let the whole of our lives be as the Jewish feast of passover was, free from leaven, from the leaven of malice and wickedness, and full of sincerity and uprightness, both towards God and man. Learn hence, the duty of every particular and individual Christian; seeing Christ has died as a sacrifice for his sin, his duty is to live unto Christ, by living up to the rule which Christ has given him, abhorring all malice, abandoning all wickedness, acting all that sincerity towards God, and exercising that truth and uprightness towards man, which will be an ornament to our profession whilst we are upon earth, and will bring us at length to the fruition of God in heaven.

9 I wrote unto you in an epistle, not to company with fornicators.

10 Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; for then must ye needs go out of the world.

11 But now I have written unto you, not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner: with such an one, no not so eat,

Here our apostle tells them, that he had writ to them in this or some other epistle, before he was fully acquainted with their affairs, not to company with fornicators; that is, to shun all intimacy and familiarity with infidels; but he did not mean or intend that they should have no converse or commerce with them because they lived among unbelievers, and could not go out of the world. But now, since, he heard of the miscarriage of this incestuous person, who was certainly a Christian, and probably a doctor or teacher among them; he warns them to avoid all brotherly intimacy and familiarity with scandalous Christians, lest the church be thought to favour such: with such an one, says he, no, not to eat; admit not such to your own table, much less to Christ's. Learn from hence, 1. That all unnecessary society and intimate familiarity with scandalous professors, ought to be avoided, that religion may not be thought to favour them, and the church may not suffer by them. Learn, 2. That as it ought to be the church's care to purge out such, and separate them from her communion; so it is every private Christian's duty to avoid that familiarity with them, which is in their power, even that which lieth in friendly eating with them. Learn, 3. If civil eating with scandalous professors of religion, be forbidden at our own table: much less ought any church to permit and suffer them a religious eating at the Lord's table, which was never spread for such guests.

12 For what have I to do to judge them also that are without? do not ye judge them that are within?

13 But them that are without, God judgeth. Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person.

As if the apostle had said, "My jurisdiction extendeth not to Heathens, I have nothing to do to judge and censure them that are without the church; but such as are within the pale of the church, your own members, who own your jurisdiction, these you have an undoubted right and power to judge, leaving the other to the judgment of God: therefore I advise, nay charge you, To put away from yourselves that wicked person, by excommunicating and banishing him from your communion." As banishment is a civil excommunication, so excommunication is a spiritual banishment: Magistrates must drive malefactors out of civil societies, and church officers must expel enormous offenders out of their religious societies; for they who are unfit for civil converse, are much more unfit for spiritual communion. The last words, Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person, help us clearly to understand the former precept, ver. 7. Purge out the old leaven, &c. that they are not in their first and proper sense to be interpreted of particular persons purging out their lusts, and mortifying their corruptions, though that be a very necessary duty; but it is to be understood of every Christian church's duty to purge out from among them, all flagitious and enormous offenders.

*Cuncta prius tentanda, sed immedicabile vulnus
Ense recidendum est, ne pars sincera trahatur.*

CHAP. VI.

The holy apostle having in the former chapter taxed the Corinthians, for their great negligence in not judging the incestuous person in a case ecclesiastical; in this chapter he blames them for their too great forwardness in going to judgment in a matter civil and political.

These Corinthians, who were converted by the apostle to the Christian faith, went to law with and impleaded one another before Heathen judges; whereas they ought to have submitted their differences to be heard before, and decided by the saints, that is, their brethren and fellow Christians.

Now this mighty scandal to Christianity, our apostle upbraids them with, and sharply reproves them for, in this chapter, in which he thus bespeaks them:

DARE any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints?

2 Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world, and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters?

3 Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life.

Observe here, 1. That it was not simply and absolutely their going to law which the apostle condemns, but their impleading one another at Pagan tribunal, and before Heathen judges; The law is good if used lawfully; but the best thing may be abused; so is oft the lawful itself: Most evident it is, that the apostle, who was offended at their using the law before Infidels, allows it before Christians, as the first verse implies. Observe, 2. The title given to the Corinthian converts, they are all called saints: because they were all so by outward profession, and many of them so by inward sanctification. Whence learn, 1. That all those who take upon them the profession of Christianity, are obliged to be saints, and may be so called, being such by visible profession. 2. That the true and real Christian is a true and real saint: his heart is inwardly renewed and sanctified, his life thoroughly reformed and changed. Observe, 3. The several errors enumerated by our apostle, in the Corinthians going to law. 1. In regard of the adversary. Brother going to law with brother; not Infidel with Infidel, nor Infidel with Christian; but Christian with Christian, brother with brother: which seems both unnatural and unchristian. 2. In regard of the judges chosen to decide and umpire their controversies; they were Infidels and unbelievers, not saints: If brother will go to law with brother, let them make choice of Christian judges; but for Christians to refuse Christians, and to chuse to be judged by Infidels was highly scandalous. What will Heathens say, when Christians are together by the ears, and Infidels live in unity? Observe, 4. The great argument used by the apostle to dissuade them from this practice: he argues a major ad minus, from the greater to the less. The saints shall judge the world, the wicked world: yea, the apostate angels in another world: Are they not fit then to judge and determine trivial matters between man and man, between one Christian and another, here in this world? Learn hence, That the saints, as assessors with Christ, and approvers of his righteous judgment, shall at the great day judge the wicked world, and the apostate angels. Oh ye wicked world! you that now revile and scorn, that injure and wrong the saints and servants of the most high God, know, that they shall one day be your judges. O ye saints! who shall be judges of the world, know that our time of judging in this world, is not yet; do not anticipate your work, nor antedate your commission; Judge nothing before the time, till the Lord comes.

4 If then ye have judgment of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church.

5 I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man amongst you? No, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren?

6 But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers.

7 Now, therefore, there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?

8 Nay, ye do wrong and defraud, and that your brethren.

It must be still observed, That the apostle doth not go about to abolish the use of secular judgments, or condemn going to law; but only reproveth the abuses that were found among them therein: Brother going to law with Brother; that is, one Christian with another: And this is not before a Christian, but an Heathen magistrate; by means whereof the Gentiles became acquainted with the covetousness, ambition, and revenge, which was among Christians, to the dishonour of God and the discredit of the gospel. More particularly, the apostle farther censures and reproveth them, first, for going to law about trifles, and small matters: Are ye unworthy to judge the least matters? Should Christians thus implead one another before Infidels for mere trifles? It seems it has been an ancient and too common fault, that every petty difference has pestered the tribunal. Secondly, For the manner of their impleading and persecuting one another: It was with heat and passion, with impatience and impetuous anger: Going to law is one of those duties which is difficultly managed without sin; it is an hard matter for a man to right his estate, and not wrong his soul. Thirdly, He reproveth them, because they did not chuse rather to put up some wrongs than right themselves by going to law: Why do ye not rather take wrong? Why do ye not suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Teaching us that something should not only be hazarded, but parted with for peace-sake. Peace is a jewel worth our buying at a dearer rate than most men are willing to give for it; and a peaceable Christian will put up many injuries patiently, rather than use extremity, referring his cause to him that judgeth righteously; who very often in this life repays us what we part with for peace-sake twice over: Blessed are the meek, they shall inherit the earth. Fourthly, The apostle blames them for their precipitation and haste, in going to law one with another; the law should have been their last refuge after trial of all other means: First they should have referred it to their brethren; if they could not end it, then the law was open: But instead of this, as soon as any difference arose, they sent presently for a writ to the Heathenish courts of judicature. Fifthly, He blames the ignorance which was found amongst them, that there was no wise person found with them which could compromise and compose differences, before they went too far: Ver. 5. "I speak it to your shame. Is it so that there is not a wise man among you that is able to judge between his brethren?" As if he had said, "What, will ye all stand and look on these unkind bickerings? and is there not one among you, that has so much skill as to quiet and compose them? I am really ashamed of it." Sixthly, He rebukes their slothfulness, together with their ignorance, that they were lazy as well as unskilful, and unwilling to interpose for the composing of their brethrens' differences: A little pains, timely taken by us, may prevent abundance of strife and dissention between contending brethren. These are the principal faults which the apostle condemns in these Corinthians going to law; it is not the action, of the thing itself, but the circumstances attending it, and the mismanagement of it, that is here condemned; which being rectified, law is no doubt lawful, whatever some erroneous persons have affirmed to the contrary.

9 Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind.

10 Nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God.

Observe here, 1. Our apostle's positive assertion, and categorical proposition, "That the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God;" where, by unrighteousness, is meant injustice and injuriousness towards our neighbour, as appears by the context, which speaks of defrauding; unrighteousness will as certainly shut out of heaven as ungodliness. Observe next, The large catalogue of sins which the apostle reckons up, that will shut persons out of heaven; uncleanness, idolatry, inordinate love of this world, drunkenness, &c. For the confirmation of this proposition, he proceedeth to this enumeration of the several sins destructive of salvation: which are not to be understood copulatively, but disjunctively; not as if he only who is guilty of all these shall miss of heaven, but he that lives in any one of these unrepented of: If he doth not forsake his wicked course of life he shall never see the kingdom of God; whoever allows and tolerates himself in any one sin, is certainly in a state of damnation. Lord, how many thousand vain hopes are laid in the dust? And how many thousand of impenitently wicked souls are sentenced to hell, by this one scripture? Observe, lastly, The caution or cautionary direction given by St. Paul to the Corinthians, not to deceive themselves with a contrary expectation; (though one would think men could hardly be deceived in so plain a case) as if their bare profession of Christianity would save them, whilst they allowed themselves to live in the practice of any of the aforementioned wickedness: Be not deceived. Learn thence,

That men are very prone to deceive themselves in this, that though they live wickedly, yet they shall die happily, and go to heaven gloriously. They have such unlimited apprehensions of the pardoning grace and mercy of God, that they bound it not to faith and repentance, and an holy life ; never considering whether they are qualified subjects or no, for that grace and mercy. God is a merciful God, says the wicked man, therefore I shall not go to hell ; God is a merciful God, saith the devil, therefore I hope to come out of hell : No, say you, that doth not follow, for God has decreed and declared the contrary. And has he not decreed and determined, has he not said and sworn, that the impenitent sinner shall never enter into his rest ? Be not then deceived, O sinner ; whilst thou continuest unreformed, thou canst not "inherit the kingdom of God."

11 And such were some of you : but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God

Here we have another argument which our apostle uses to dissuade them from all gross wickedness in general, and from such unchristian behaviour, one towards another, as he had before reproved, in particular ; namely, that great and mighty change which had been wrought upon several of them by means of their conversion to the Christian religion, or the faith of Christ : Such were some of you ; but ye are now washed. As if the apostle had said, "You are no longer swine, but sheep, and therefore must not wallow in the mire of sin, as you formerly did." Note here, 1. The black and filthy condition of a sinner, before conversion ; the apostle had reckoned up the vilest and worst of sins that could be mentioned ; and then says, Such were some of you. The original word is in the neuter, not in the masculine gender : not erói, such persons, but tauta, such sins ; as emphatically demonstrating their wickedness, that they were not so much peccatores, sinners, as ipae peccata, the very sins themselves. Learn hence, That the converting grace of God is sometimes vouchsafed to the vilest and worst of men ; and where it is vouchsafed, makes a very great and mighty change. Note, 2. The particular expressions by which this change is represented ; Ye are washed, sacramentally washed in baptism ; Ye are sanctified, purified in your hearts and natures, by the sanctifying influences of divine grace ; Ye are justified, that is, acquitted from guilt and approved as righteous. Note, 3. The means by which this change was wrought and effected in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of God : In the name of our Lord Jesus ; That is, through the merits, and for the mediation of the Lord Jesus, and by faith therein : And by the Spirit of our God ; that is, through the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. 1. Here we have the defiling nature of sin supposed ; all men by nature are polluted and defiled, and stand in need of washing. 2. Our Lord Jesus Christ will not disdain or refuse to justify by his blood, and sanctify by his Spirit, the greatest sinners, and the filthiest souls, that apply unto him by faith, for pardoning mercy, and sanctifying grace : Such were you, but ye are washed : 3. Though justification and sanctification are distinct and different in their nature, yet are they always inseparable in their subject : No person is justified but he that is sanctified ; Christ justifies none by his blood whom he doth not sanctify by his Spirit. Though justification and sanctification are not the same thing, yet are they always found in the same person : By the former, there is a relative change in our condition ; by the latter, a real change in our conversation.

12 All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient : all things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any.

13 Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats : but God shall destroy both it and them.—

Our apostle still proceeds in the reprehensory part of his epistle, and begins here to reprove the growing heresy of the Gnostics and Nicolaitans among them, who allowed the eating of things sacrificed to idols, and fornication, as things indifferent. The apostle grants that all indifferent things are lawful, and may be used first, when they are expedient, that is, when they may be used without hurting ourselves, and others : And secondly, when they do not get such a dominion over us, as to enslave us to an intemperate use of them : He instances particularly in meats ; and grants, that it is lawful to use any kind of meat, because God hath ordained it for the good of man's nature ; meats are ordained for the belly, and the belly at present ordained for the reception of meats ; but as God will destroy meats, so will he destroy the belly also, as to the use it now hath ; for the resurrection, men shall neither hunger nor thirst any more. Learn hence, That Christianity doth not barely restrain us from the doing of what is unlawful, but from doing what is inexpedient also ; an action in itself lawful, may by circumstances become sinful, and it is both wise and safe to forbear the use of our Christian liberty, when it becomes an occasion of offence unto our neighbour.

— Now the body is not for fornication but for the Lord ; and the Lord for the body.

From this verse to the end of the chapter our apostle labours by sundry arguments, to convince the Corinthians of the exceeding sinfulness of the sin of fornication : partly because they reckoned it amongst the number of indifferent things, and also because the Corinthians, before their conversion to Christianity, were so notoriously addicted to this sin, that they consecrated a temple to Venus, at which a multitude of virgins prostituted themselves ; for which reason St. Paul makes use of a six-fold argument here, to prevent the Corinthians' relapse into sin of fornication after their conversion, which they had been so notoriously guilty of before conversion. The first argument is in the words before us, "Now the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord ; and the Lord for the body." As if he had said, "You put the body to a use for which it was never intended : the belly was made for meats, but the body was not made for fornication, but for the Lord ; that is, for the Lord's use and service ; and the Lord is for the body, that is, for the good and salvation of the body." Whence note. That such is the wonderful goodness of God towards us his creatures, that look in whatsoever we are for him, he is for us ; as our bodies are for the Lord's service as well as our souls, so the Lord is for the good of our bodies as well as our souls ; and therefore our bodies ought to be employed for his glory in every thing ; This is the apostle's first argument against fornication.

14 And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise us up by his own power.

Here a second argument against fornication is taken from the body's resurrection : Our bodies are to be raised, therefore not to be defiled ; to be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body in heaven, therefore not to be defiled with lust here on earth : As if the apostle had said, " Were your bodies to be finally lost in the dust, then were it no great matter how you used them, or abused them ; but as God hath raised up Christ's body, so he will raise up your body ; and seeing your body is the garment which your soul is to wear to all eternity in heaven, keep it pure and undefiled here in earth."

15 Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ ? Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them the members of an harlot ? God forbid.

A third argument here follows : " Our bodies are the members of Christ, as well as our souls ; that is, the union is made between Christ and us, consisting of soul and body both. Now shall we dispose of our bodies, the members of Christ, to so base an use ? shall our bodies, which are joined to Christ, ever condescend to so base a conjunction, as that of being joined to an harlot ? God forbid that such an indignity be done by us."

16 What ! know ye not that he which is joined to an harlot is one body ? for two, saith he, shall be one flesh.

17 But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit.

The sense is, " That as wedlock makes man and wife one body lawfully, so fornication makes the man and the harlot one body sinfully : All the difference is in the morality of the act, but the species or kind of act is the same ; thus the fornicator and the harlot are one flesh ; but he that is joined to the Lord : namely, by faith and love, hath a nearer and more noble union, than that of flesh, for he is one spirit with Christ, not essentially and substantially one, but mystically and spiritually : Christ and the sincere believer are led and guided, acted and influenced by the same Spirit, therefore take heed what you do, for in making your bodies the members of an harlot, you dissolve the union betwixt Christ and them." Learn from hence. How closely and intimately believers are united unto Jesus Christ : they are nearer than one flesh, they are one spirit with him, they have one Father, one house, one home, one heart, one interest, one acquaintance : Happy they who are thus joined to the Lord, for they are one spirit.

18 Flee fornication. Every sin that a man doeth is without the body : but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body.

Flee fornication. Note here, 1. The apostle's advice to escape fornication, and that is, to flee it, namely, by shunning all occasions of it, all temptations leading to it, all incentives and provocations of it, not suffering our eye to wander, or our thoughts to muse, much less to dwell upon any unlawful or ensnaring object. Flee fornication. Note, 2. The argument the apostle uses to flee fornication, because other sins are without the body, but this against the body. Quest. But how is the apostle understood, when he says, all other sins are without the body ? Ans. Thus, though all other outward sins, as drunkenness, murder, theft, &c. have the body as an instrument for committing them, yet in this sin of uncleanness, the body is not only the instrument, but the object also ; for the unclean person doth not only sin with his body, but he sins against his body : Uncleanness leaves that blot and brand of ignominy and baseness upon the body, which no other sin doth, degrading it from that excellent honour whereunto God advanced it in its natural condition, by making it the member of an harlot.

19 What ! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own ?—

Here we have the apostle's fifth argument against fornication and uncleanness, and it runs thus : " Temples which are peculiarly consecrated unto God and his service, ought not to be profaned or polluted : but the bodies of Christians are the temples of God, the Holy Spirit dwelling in them, and therefore they ought to be kept pure and undefiled. " Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost," as well as your souls ? " Our bodies are called temples of the Holy Ghost, because he hath sanctified them for himself, for his habitation, and for his service. From whence the divinity of the Holy Ghost may strongly be inferred ; a temple always supposes some deity to dwell in it : the tabernacle and temple are called God's habitation : Now if the Holy Ghost dwells in good men as a temple, he is truly and really God. In fine, since all Christians are become the temple of God, by virtue of his Holy Spirit sent into their hearts, consecrating their bodies to his sacred service ; let us not desecrate or pollute this temple by defiling it with filthy lusts, but make chastity the keeper of this sacred house, and suffer nothing that defileth to enter into it, lest that God who dwelleth in it being offended, should desert his house thus defiled.

—And ye are not your own ?

20 For ye are bought with a price : therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's.

Here we have the sixth and last argument which the apostle makes use of to flee fornication : Our bodies are not our own, but God's, they are his by creation, his by preservation, his by purchase and redemption: We are bought out of our own hands, as well as out of the hand of divine justice: therefore we sacrilegiously rob and wrong God, when we alienate any part of his own from him, and glorify him not, whose we wholly are, by the faithful service both of our souls and bodies which are his. Learn, 1. That Christians are not their own but God's; not their own, and therefore not in their own power, not at their own disposal, not to live after their own will, or by their own lusts, but according to the will and to the ends and uses of their principal Lord, whose they are. Learn, 2. That as Christians are not their own, so they must not act and live, and dispose of themselves, of their souls and bodies, as if they were their own, as if they had an original propriety, a plenary possession, and a full dominion over themselves; a Christian must not make his own reason his supreme rule, nor his own rule his chief law, nor his own interest his ultimate end, for he was neither made by himself nor made for himself. Learn, 3. That all of us are God's, and therefore, we cannot without great sacrilege, invade his right, and give that body to an harlot which is consecrated unto him. Learn, 4. That though we are all God's, yet we have alienated ourselves from God, and withdrawn ourselves from his disposal. Learn, 5. That being thus alienated from God, he has once more bought us, bought us with a price, a great and full price, the blood of his Son; and we are now God's own again by redemption and purchase. Learn, 6. That our bodies and spirits being thus the Lord's, we should glorify him both in our souls and bodies, which are his; glorify him in our bodies by eternal purity and exemplary sanctity, glorify him in our spirits by internal purity of heart. Thus if we glorify him in our body, and in our spirits, in a way of obedience, he will at last fashion our vile bodies like unto his glorious body, and make our spirits as the spirits of just men made perfect, in that great day, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believe.

CHAP. VII.

Our apostle having finished the reprehensory part of this epistle in the foregoing chapters, he comes in this chapter to resolve divers cases of conscience about which the Corinthians had written to him, particularly concerning marriage; not about the lawfulness of marriage, for that was out of dispute, but about the expediency of it at that time, whether it were advisable in that afflicted state of the church.

NOW concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me; It is good for a man not to touch a woman.

The first scruple or case of conscience which the Corinthians wrote to the apostle about, was concerning marriage. Amongst many other wicked opinions, which the Gnostics, those ancient heretics, maintained, this was one, that marriage was from the devil. Our apostle elsewhere, Heb. xiii. 4. asserts marriage to be holy and honourable; here he determines first in general, that such as have the gift of continency, and can live chaste in a single state, do well; and, in particular, that a single life at that time was most advisable, and most agreeable to the calamitous and afflicted state of the church: So that when the apostle says, in this verse, "It is good for a man not to touch a woman," his meaning is, it is more agreeable to the present necessity, more convenient in regard of the persecuted state of the church, as being a condition less distracted with cares, and less troubled with distraction: for marriage plunges men into an excess of worldly cares, it multiplies their business, and usually their wants, and those wants are harder supplied than in a single life, and more difficultly bore; it is much easier to bear personal wants, than family wants: With respect to all which, says the apostle, especially as the present state of the church stands, "it is good for a man not to touch a woman:" not that it is at any time simply unlawful, but at sometimes manifestly inexpedient.

2 Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband.

As if the apostle had said, "Such are the inclinations of human nature, that every man cannot always do that which is most for his own quiet and ease, but men find the strength of lust and the power of concupiscence so strong in themselves, that marriage, which is God's ordinance for avoiding fornication, and for the propagation of mankind, is of absolute necessity in some persons; therefore, for avoiding fornication and all sorts of uncleanness (which was so common at Corinth) let every man retain his own wife, and every woman her own husband." Here observe, 1. The apostle's expression, he says, Quisque et quaque, not quidam et quadam; let every man and every woman marry, not some men and some women only: He excepts none, neither priest nor nun, but every one is here permitted, yea, for avoiding fornication, commanded to marry. Observe farther, How the apostle directs every man to have his own wife, and every woman her own husband; more than one is forbidden, and polygamy, or the sin of having either more wives or more husbands at a time than one, is here condemned: To bridle and restrain men's extravagant lusts, the wisdom of God has directed every man to enjoy his own wife, and every woman her own husband. Let the church of Rome consider how she will answer at the bar of God, for the spitting in the face of this ordinance of God, for denying the lawfulness of marriage to her priests and nuns, when God has told her, Heb. xiii. 4. "That marriage is honourable in all; and that all unclean persons God will judge;" and such too often have their priests and nuns been one with another.

3 Let the husband render unto the wife due benevolence; and likewise also the wife unto the husband.

4 The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband: and likewise also the husband hath not power of his own body but the wife.

5 Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may Give yourselves to fasting and prayer: and Come together again, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.

Observe here, 1. That matrimonial conversation, or the husband's and wife's performing towards each other all the duties of marriage which they promised, is an act of justice which they owe to one another: This is intimated in the word render, and consequently to deny the same is injustice and fraud; defraud not one another. Marriage takes away from persons that power which they had over themselves and their own bodies, and transfers it in some sort to the person they are married to. Yet observe, 2. That persons in a married state may, and in some cases ought (namely, for religious ends and purposes) by mutual consent, to abstain from a conjugal duty for some time. "Defraud not one another, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer." Observe, 3. The apostle lays no obligation upon any single persons to take upon them a vow for a single life, nor doth he direct married persons to those perpetual divorces from the marriage-bed, which the papists practice, under pretence of religion: For the apostle admits of no perpetual separation between husband and wife, upon any pretence whatever; no, not that they may give themselves to prayer and fasting, but only permits it for a time upon condition that they come together again. So far was this holy man from laying a snare upon the consciences of any person, either in a single or married state.

6 But I speak this of permission, and not of commandment.

7 For I would that all men were even as I myself: but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that.

8 I say, therefore, to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I.

9 But if they cannot contain, let them marry: for it is better to marry than to burn.

As if the apostle had said, "Mistake me not, as if I imposed marriage upon all persons as a duty; No, but I declare it is permitted to all as a remedy against fornication: for so far am I from that, that I could wish all men were unmarried, even as I myself am, and that they had the gift of continence with myself; but God, who will have the world yet farther continued and increased, hath not given this gift to all, nor to all alike in the same measure. Therefore to the unmarried I say, that so many are the advantages of a single life, that if they can abide chaste and single, as I do, it will be many ways for their advantage: But if they cannot, let them use God's remedy, which is marriage; for it is better to marry, than to burn in lust, to be perpetually assaulted with unclean desires, and subject to the ravings and insults of lust." Learn hence, 1. That marrying or not marrying, is, according to several circumstances, matter of advice and counsel, but neither of them absolutely of precept. 2. That second marriages are not only lawful but an incumbent duty, if persons cannot contain themselves within the bounds and rules of chastity. "To the widows I say, if they cannot contain, let them marry."

10 And unto the married I command, yet not I, but the Lord, Let not the wife depart from her husband;

11 But and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled unto her husband: And let not the husband put away his wife.

As if the apostle had said, "Although it be no sin to marry, yet it is a sin to depart, when married; herein I lay the authority of God's command upon you, that you agree together, and that no difference which may arise between you, cause you to separate and live asunder. But to marry upon departure is a double sin. Therefore if any disagreements and discontents between husband and wife cause you to live asunder for a time, think not either of you of marrying to another person; but be reconciled to each other, and live together in love, as becometh persons professing godliness." A civil war in families is fatal as well as in the commonwealth. Domestic contentions, especially betwixt husband and wife, are dangerous and destructive of love and peace. If at any time they arise to that height as to cause a separation betwixt the two, who are one flesh, yet nothing of that nature can warrant their divorce: nothing but death or adultery can untie the marriage knot, and release them from their obligation to each other.

12 But to the rest speak I, not the Lord, If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away.

13 And the woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him.

14 For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband: Else were your children unclean: but now are they holy.

1. Here we have another case of conscience put by the Corinthians to the apostle; namely, whether such husbands as had Heathen and Infidel wives might put them away; and whether such wives as had Infidel husbands, might not, and ought not to depart from them? The apostle resolves the case, That they ought according to the intent and end of marriage, cohabit and dwell together; and he assigns the reason for it, because the unbelieving or infidel wife is sanctified to the believing or Christian husband. How sanctified? not in her nature, but in her use: so that they might lawfully cohabit and converse together; being by marriage made one flesh with him or her that is holy; "And for you" children says he, they "are not seminally unclean, like the children of Heathens, but "federally holy." How are they holy? Not with an inherent, internal, personal holiness; for the holiest man's child is born in sin, and by nature a child of wrath; but with an external, relative, and federal holiness; they are not common and unclean like the children of Infidels, but fit to be partakers of the privileges of the church, to be admitted into covenant with God, as belonging to his holy people; Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy. Observe, He doth not say, Else were your children bastards, but now are they legitimate, as the enemies of infant baptism, those duri infantum patres, would make him speak: but else were they unclean, that is, Heathen children, not to be owned as an holy seed, and therefore not to be admitted into covenant with God, as belonging to his holy people. If by holiness here the apostle means a matrimonial holiness, as the anabaptists dream, then according to their interpretation of the word holy, the apostle speaks neither pertinently, nor truly: Not pertinently, 1. For then the answer had been nothing to the purpose. The case put, was concerning husbands and wives, not concerning men and whores: and the question propounded by the Corinthians, was not whether a believing husband, and an unbelieving wife, were lawful man and wife together? nobody questioned that; but whether the Christian husband might put away his Heathen wife? The apostle answers, He ought not, if she were willing to dwell with him, for she is sanctified to him; not sanctified in respect of her personal condition, but in respect of her conjugal relation, otherwise their children would be looked upon as unclean, like the children of Heathens; but now are they holy, that is, to be accounted visible saints, and, as such, to be admitted to church privileges. 2. According to his interpretation of the word holy, the apostle had not spoken truly; for the children of Heathens, born in lawful wedlock, are no more bastards than the children of Christians; for their parents marriage frees them from the charge of illegitimacy as well as others. Add to this, that in all the New Testament, though the word holy, be used above five hundred times, yet it never once signifies legitimacy, but is always used for a state of separation to God; Therefore, to make it signify so here, is a bold practising upon scripture, a racking and wresting of the word of God to maintain a private opinion, to make the text speak what they would have, and not what the apostle intends. But the argument for infant baptism from this text, runs thus: "If the holy seed among the Jews were therefore to be circumcised, and made federally holy, by receiving the sign of the covenant, and being admitted into the number of God's holy people, because they were seminally holy; for the root being holy, the branches were also holy: Then, by like reason, the holy seed of Christians ought to be admitted to baptism, and receive the sign of the Christian covenant, the laver of regeneration, and so be entered into the society of the Christian church."

15 But if the unbelieving depart, let him depart. A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases: but God hath called us to peace.

16 For what knowest thou, Oh wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? Or how knowest thou, Oh man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

17 But as God hath distributed to every man, as the Lord hath called every one, so let him walk. And so ordain I in all churches.

Here another doubt is resolved by the apostle, in case the unbelieving party, either husband or wife, depart, that is, refuse to co-habit and dwell with their believing yoke-fellow, and so make void, as much as in him or her lieth, the marriage-bond, out of hatred to the faith; in that case, if they will go, let them go; you are not bound to leave your family to follow them. However, let every Christian husband or wife omit nothing, but endeavour every thing to the utmost to oblige and win, to incline and engage to their unbelieving yoke-fellows, to live quietly with them; for God hath called us to peace; and therefore we must give no occasion of quarrel with, or separation from, so near a relation: And besides, by the peaceable dwelling together, there is hope of, and a fair opportunity for, the gaining and bringing over the unbeliever to the faith of Christ, and of being the instrument of his or her salvation; But however that may be, let every Christian discharge his duty in every relation in which God has set him. This order I appoint in all churches converted to Christianity, knowing it to be agreeable to the mind of God, "That no Christian should pretend his profession of religion, to excuse him from the duties of any relation."

18 Is any man called being circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? Let him not become circumcised.

19 Circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the commandments of God.

Here the apostle proceeds to exhort the Corinthians to be content with the lot and condition which God had distributed unto them, and to frame themselves to walk Christianly in it. Particularly he shews, That if any person amongst them were a native Jew, and so circumcised, and afterwards converted to Christianity, he should neither trouble himself to get off that mark from his flesh, nor affect the state of him, who being a Gentile, had never been circumcised. On the other side, if any of them were native Gentiles, and never circumcised, but now converted to Christianity, let him not affect the state of one who was a native Jew, and circumcised; for circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision is nothing; that is, nothing now available to salvation, nothing that renders persons more or less acceptable in the sight of God; but the keeping of the commandments of God, this is all in all: For God regards not men's outward conditions, but obedience to his commands. Christianity consists not in a warm zeal, either for or against outward ceremonies, but in positive holiness, and a strict conformity to divine precepts.

26 Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

21 Art thou called being a servant? care not for it; but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather.

22 For he that is called in the Lord being a servant, is the Lord's free-man; likewise also he that is called being free, is Christ's servant.

23 Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men.

24 Brethren, let every man wherein he is called, therein abide with God.

The apostle seems to intimate from these words, that some persons converted to Christianity in the primitive times, apprehended, that thereupon they must leave their worldly callings and employments, as if they were shares to them, or unnecessary diversions from better things. No, says the apostle, Let every one, in his calling wherein he is called, therein abide with God; that is, look in what honest civil calling they were found, when they became Christians: let them keep to that calling still: For God doth not call us from our worldly employments and business, but calls us to be holy in them; nor doth our serving God any whit acquit or discharge us from serving one another. But particularly it was the opinion of some servants converted to Christianity, that their spiritual freedom by Christ exempted them from all civil service to their masters. The apostle therefore tells them, they are indeed freed by Christ from sinful slavery, but not from civil servitude and subjection; from Jewish bondage, but not from Christian obedience. Learn hence, That Christianity doth not free men from any civil obligations which before they lay under. Our advantages by Christ are spiritual, and not secured; no man's outward condition is changed by his becoming a Christian; though he be now the Lord's free man, yet he is a servant still, if he was so before; nay, their Christianity did not exempt them from their secular relation to their Heathen and Infidel masters: As service to man doth not exempt us from, nor is inconsistent with, the service of God; so our spiritual calling doth not make void our civil: Therefore let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

25 Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful.

26 I suppose, therefore, that this is good for the present distress; I say that it is good for a man so to be.

27 Art thou bound unto a wife? seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? seek not a wife.

28 But if thou marry, thou hast not sinned: And if a virgin marry, she hath not sinned. Nevertheless, such shall have trouble in the flesh: but I spare you.

The next case which our apostle comes to resolve, is concerning virgins; whether they being at their own disposal, should marry, or keep themselves single. He tells them first, that he had no special command, whereby the state of virginity was either enjoined or prohibited, but he would faithfully give his advice, according to the best of his judgment: And this he doth in two particulars: First, That by reason of the present distress, and danger of persecution, which threatened the church, it was most convenient, that such as were single should continue so, if it might lawfully be done. Yet, secondly, He declares, that if they marry, they do not sin; only they will be exposed to more troubles, as the church's troubles do increase. Here note, 1. That the apostle pronounces marriage lawful in all persons, of both sexes, and not sinful at any time or in any state and condition whatsoever. Note, 2. That he signifies to all persons, that the troubles of a married life are more than those which attend a single state; Such shall have trouble in the flesh. Marriage plunges men into an excess of worldly cares; it multiplies their business, and usually their wants; and these wants are far harder borne than in a single life. Note, 3. That besides the ordinary inconveniences of a married life, which all persons are to expect, such as enter the married condition, when the church is under persecution, must prepare to meet with more than ordinary troubles. Such, that is, in those times of persecution, shall have trouble, that is, more trouble, in the flesh: But I spare you, that is, "I forbear to speak any more of that matter, lest I should seem to dissuade you from marriage, which is the ordinance of God, more than is fit, and be thought by any, to lay the yoke of celibacy, or a single life, upon you. I only tell you, that when Christians are under persecution and distress, it is much more for their ease and quiet to be single, than to have a wife and children to care for in poverty or flight."

29 But this I say, brethren, the time is short. It remaineth, that both they that have wives be as tho' they had none;

30 And they that weep, as though they wept not: and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not;

31 And they that use this world, as not abusing it. For the fashion of this world passeth away.

As if he had said, "Let all persons, both married and unmarried, consider that the time of this life is short and passing; it is but a point of time we have to live, and shortly it will not be a pin to chuse, whether we had wives or not, or children or not; but before the expected fruit of the comforts be ripe, we ourselves may be ripe. 'Tis therefore true spiritual wisdom, to look upon these things now, as they will be shortly; to be very moderate in the enjoyment of them, not to be too much affected when we have them, or too much afflicted when we want them." Observe here, 1. The apostle's proposition; the time is short. This is true in all the notions of it. Take it first for the whole duration of this world, from the day of its creation to the hour of its dissolution; compare it with what sure is it, eternity; and it is very short, but a moment. Secondly, take time for the whole duration of any one man's life, so 'tis shorter; so short, that it is nothing. Thirdly, Take time for the special season, either of doing or enjoying good in this life; so 'tis shortest of all. Observe, 2. The inference which the apostle draws from this proposition: therefore, let them that have none, be as if they have none, &c. Learn thence, that the consideration of the great shortness of time, and the uncertainty of human life, should keep our heart in a great deal of elevation towards the best and sweetest of our outward comforts and enjoyments: That we neither love inordinately any mercy when we enjoy it, nor mourn immoderately for any contentment when we come to be deprived of it: "They that weep as though they wept not, and they that rejoice as though they rejoiced not." Observe, 3. The advice which the apostle gives to such as have great possessions and revenues in this world. 1. To take heed, that though they possess these things, that they be not possessed by them. 2. That they so use them as not to abuse them, nor be abused by them. There is much evil in the world, yet we may, we must use it, and it will be our wisdom to make a good use of this world, while we are in it; otherwise we neither answer the end of God in sending us into the world, nor the design of God in trusting us with the good things of this world. Observe, 4. The reason assigned, why we should use the world in the forementioned manner: because the fashion of this world passeth away. Here the apostle compares the things of this world to a scene which is presently changed, and vanisheth almost as soon as it appears. As fashions in this world alter, so doth the fashion of this world alter every day. There is a world to come, the fashion whereof shall never pass away; but the fashion or scheme of this world passeth away continually. This world is like a stage, persons interchangeably act their parts upon it; but they soon disappear, and the stage itself ere long will be pulled down: The fashion of this world passeth away. Thence learn, That this consideration, that all the comforts and conveniences of this life are fading and passing away from us, should be a strong motive and inducement to us, not to set our hearts upon them.

32 But I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord:

33 But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife.

34 There is a difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in spirit; but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband.

35 And this I speak for your own profit; not that I may cast a snare upon you, but for that which is comely, and that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction.

Here our apostle subjoins another reason why a single life is to be preferred before a married life; namely, because single persons are comparatively more free from cares and distractions, and have commonly more time and leisure to attend upon the Lord in religious duties. For the unmarried man has but one care upon him, namely, how he may serve and please God: But the married man has another care upon him: to wit, how he may oblige and please his wife. In like manner, a married woman is encumbered with household affairs, disturbed with domestic cares, and concerned in lawful things to please her husband, and consequently has neither so much time nor freedom for holy exercises: But the virgin that has no family to care for, no husband to seek to please, has much more leisure to attend upon God in holy duties and religious exercises; therefore he advises them to chuse that state of life in which they may attend upon the Lord without distraction. Learn hence, 1. That a married condition is certainly and necessarily attended with many diversions and distractions, from which a single life is free. 2. That persons in a conjugal relation may and ought to seek the obliging and pleasing one another with their utmost endeavours, without violating their duty to Almighty God. Learn, 3. That persons in a single state have great advantages (may they improve them!) of serving God above others, in regard of their freedom from domestic cares, troubles, and temptations; they have time and leisure for pious performances, if the heart be disposed for them. Learn, 4. That it is the duty, and ought to be the endeavour, of all persons, both married and unmarried, not only to serve God in religious duties, but to attend upon him in them, as much as may be, without distraction. Distractions are the wanderings of the heart, mind, and thoughts, from God in religious duties. The nature of God requires, that we watch and strive against them: His majesty and greatness, his purity and holiness, his omniscience and all-seeing eye upon us, and within us, do oblige us to this careful endeavour; and the nature of his worship calls for it, which is a reasonable service, and a spiritual service; and the nature of distractions should make us dread them. They divide the heart, they deaden the duty, contract guilt, and provoke displeasure. Lord, help us in all the services we perform unto thee, to attend upon thee without distraction.

36 But if any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely towards his virgin if she pass the flower of her age, and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not; let them marry.

37 Nevertheless, he that standeth steadfast in his heart, having no necessity, but hath power over his own will, and hath so decreed in his heart that he will keep his virgin, doeth well.

38 So then, he that giveth her in marriage, doeth well ; but he that giveth her not in marriage, doeth better.

The next case which our apostle speaks to, is concerning virgins, who are under the power of others, (and not at their own disposal) as parents and guardians ; namely, whether it be best and most adviseable for them to dispose of their virgins in marriage or not. The apostle answers, that in this case, particular respect must be had to particular circumstances ; as, namely, if she be of marriageable years, and beyond them ; if she has an inclination to, and be desirous of marriage, then she advises that she be so disposed of : But if a parent be fully satisfied in his own mind, that he wrongs not his daughter in declining to marry her, if he has a perfect freedom in his own will, and his will is not contradicted by his daughter's desire, he doth well, yea, he doth best not to marry her ; best with respect to the distressed condition of the church, best with respect to the troubles of the world, which she will be the more free from ; and best, with respect to the young woman's liberty and freedom for the service of God, and the exercises of religion. Learn hence, That although children are to be disposed of in marriage by their parents, yet parents have no such absolute power over their children, as to hinder them from marriage, or to compel them to it : To do either, is very sinful, very unnatural.

39 The wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth : but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will ; only in the Lord.

40 But she is happier, if she so abide, after my judgment. And I think also that I have the Spirit of God.

The apostle concludes the chapter with a resolution of this case of conscience ; namely, Whether second marriages of widows were lawful or not. He answers, They were. After the first husband was dead, the widow might marry again, provided that she married in the Lord : that is, with a believer, not an Infidel ; with one of the same faith with herself. It is very dangerous and sinful, for persons professing the true faith of Christ, to match with idolaters. There is far greater ground of fear that they will pervert you, than there is ground of hope that you shall convert them. But though the apostle asserts it lawful for widows to marry again, yet he declares, that in regard of the present danger which the church was in of persecution, they would be more happy in their widowhood. So that the determination of the apostle as to the case of marriage and a single life, is concluded thus : " That ordinarily, where there is no necessity, a single life is more for a person's peace, more free from distractions in God's service, and therefore best."

CHAP. VIII.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, resolved several cases of conscience concerning marriage ; in this chapter he resolves that grand case touching the lawfulness of eating things offered to idols. The occasion of which scruple was this : The Heathens used to sacrifice to their idols, oxen, sheep, and other cattle, and to feast upon their sacrifices. Part of the oxen or sheep the priest burnt upon the altar as a sacrifice to the idol, and the other part either took to himself, and made a feast in the idol's temple, and invited his friends to it ; or else, the priest restored it to the offerer, who carried it home, and either feasted his neighbours with it, or else carried it into the market, and sold it in the shambles as other meat. Now, the question which the Corinthians put to the apostle to resolve, was this, Whether Christians, if invited to these feasts, might go and eat of these meats, either in the idol temples, or in the Pagan houses, or might buy and eat of such meat, if it were sold in the shambles ? A resolution of which question, we have in this and the tenth chapter. In which the apostle thus bespeaks them :

NOW as touching things offered unto idols, we know that we all have knowledge. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth.

It was the opinion of the Gnostics and Nicolaitans, those early erroneous persons in the apostle's days, that from the knowledge they had of their Christian liberty, they might either be present in the idol temples, or eat of the idol sacrifices as they pleased. The apostle here tells them, that he knew many of them had a good degree of knowledge, but desires, that they might not be puffed up with it, but that their knowledge may be accompanied with charity, which respects the edification of others ; and put men upon considering, not only what is lawful to be done in itself, and with respect to ourselves, but what is expedient or inexpedient in relation unto others. True love, or Christian charity, will put us upon consulting the good of our neighbours' souls, as well as our own ; and will not suffer us to do that thing which may offend our weak brother, that is, lay a stumbling-block before him, to tempt him into sin. Knowledge puffeth up ; this is to be understood of a notional, literal, and speculative knowledge only ; not of a spiritual, practical, and experimental knowledge. The more a gracious man knows, the more humble he is, because his knowledge shews him his own vileness and emptiness ; but the more a carnal man knows, the more proud he is, because he knoweth not himself ; his knowledge is not only a temptation to pride, but the very matter of his pride. Such knowledge doth not build up, but puff up : whereas charity edifieth ; that is, applies itself to the instruction of others, and accommodates itself to the edification of others, and considers, not only what may lawfully be done, but what is fit and expedient to be done; as in the case here before us, eating things offered to idols.

2 And if any man think he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.

That is, "If a man have ever so much knowledge, yet if it be not accompanied with charity and humility, if he improves not his knowledge to the glory of God, and the good of others, he knows nothing to any saving purpose, or as he ought to know. Learn, That Christians should by no means content themselves with an empty speculative knowledge, but labour to know as they ought to know. Observe, farther, The apostle says, He that thinketh he knoweth any thing, that is, he that is conceited of his own knowledge, that thinks of it with insolency and pride, and speaks of it with affectation and vain-glory; he who is thus conceited of his own knowledge, knows not himself: yea, he knows nothing as he ought to know. Learn thence, That it becomes us to have very humble thoughts of ourselves, and of our own knowledge, how much soever we really know: That man's wisdom is but conceit, who is only wise in his own conceit.

3 But if any man love God, the same is known of him.

Observe, The apostle doth not say, If any man know God: but if any man love God: the same is known, that is, allowed, accepted and approved of him: A man may know much of God in this world; and yet God may be ashamed to know him in another world: but the soul that sincerely loves God, is certainly beloved of him, and shall be owned and acknowledged by him. Now, true love to our neighbour, is a good evidence of our sincere love to God; and if we love our neighbour truly, we dare not scandalize our neighbour sinfully, nor offend our fellow brethren: Only here we must take notice, that by offending the weak, is not meant displeasing them, but by offending them is meant, laying a stumbling-block before them, which may occasion their falling in sin.

4 As concerning, therefore, the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one.

One argument which the Gnostics used to prove the lawfulness of eating things offered unto idols, was this, That an idol was nothing in the world: but how nothing? It was not materially nothing, for it was wood or stone; but formally it was nothing, it was nothing of God's creation, nothing that the idolater took it to be, there was nothing of a deity in it, and nothing of a deity could be represented by it; an idol is the vainest thing in the world, it was mere vanity, a perfect nothing, (called therefore the vanities of the Gentiles) it is of no worth or value, it has no power or virtue. Some observe, That the same Hebrew word signifies both an idol, and sorrow, and labour, partly because idols are made and formed with much labour, and great exactness; the wood or stone figuratively speaking, is put to pain, you must cut it and carve it, to make an idol or statue of it; partly, because idols are served and worshipped with much pain and labour; false worship is more painful than true, the service of the true God is an holy and honourable service, a noble and ingenuous service, an easy and delightful service; but the service of idols is slavish, a toil rather than worship. Idols are troublesome both in making and worshipping: and, after all the bustling made about them, an idol is nothing in the world, because there is no God but one.

5 For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many.)

6 But to us there is but one God, the Father of whom are all things, and we in him: and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him.

Here the apostle tells them, that although the heathen idolaters acknowledge a plurality of gods, some in heaven, as the sun, moon, and stars; some on earth, as men and beasts, there having their celestial and terrestrial gods and lords, but these were only called gods, that is, in God's name, not in nature, not in reality: Yet, says he, we Christians do own and acknowledge but one living and true God, one in nature, not one in person, to whom all our prayers must be directed; and one Mediator, by whom all our prayers are to be offered. To us there is but one God the Father. This text the Arians, Socinians, and Unitarians, exceedingly boast of, as if it expressly confined the deity to the Father, as distinct from Christ and the Holy Ghost. Thus they argue, 1. "He who saith there is one emperor, to wit, Cæsar, says in effect there is no other emperor, but Cæsar; so when St. Paul saith there is one God the Father, he doth (say they) in effect declare that there is no other God besides the Father." To this the Orthodox answer, 1. "That God the Father is often put in scripture for the whole Deity comprehending the three persons; he being fons Deitatis, and fundamentum trinitatis, as the schoolmen speak: so that the application of the word God here unto the Father, doth not exclude the Son from being God, but only from being the fountain of the Deity as Father is. In Rev. 1. 17, Christ says, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; Will any conclude thence that God the Father is not Alpha and Omega? Is not he first and the last, as well as Christ? Again, We call our Lord Jesus the only Saviour; do we therefore exclude God the Father from being a Saviour? Is he not styled the Saviour of all men? 1 Tim. iv. 10. Again, God the Father is called the Creator of all things, it is asserted that all things were created by Christ, the Word, John i. 2. In short, we assert, as well as they, the unity of the Godhead, and that Christ is not another God, but only another person from the Father. We answer, 2. Their own argument may be thus retorted upon themselves: as the apostle says here, there is but one God the Father, so he adds in the next words, there is but one Lord Jesus Christ: Now if the saying that there is but one God, doth exclude Christ from being God, then the saying that there is but one Lord, doth exclude God the Father from being Lord; and if it be blasphemy to exclude God the Father from being Lord, it is no less to exclude Christ the Son from being God." Know then, That as Christians have in all ages of the Church acknowledged one God only, even God the Father, so have they also owned that Jesus Christ was truly God, of the substance of the Father, God of God, very God of very God. The Lord keep us steadfast in his faith, seeing he that honoureth the Son, honoureth the Father that hath sent him; but he that denieth the Son, denieth the Father also.

7 Howbeit there is not in every man that knowledge: For some, with conscience of the idol unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled.

These words are brought in as a reason by the apostle, why strong Christians should not eat meat offered unto idols with respect to those that are weak; as if he had said, "Though many of you know that an idol is nothing, and that meat is neither sanctified nor polluted which is set before it, and therefore, you can eat or not eat without any scruple as to yourselves, yet you should consider what is safest to be done with respect to others; for every man has not this knowledge that an idol is nothing, but some persons having a conceit of the idol's being something, eat what is offered to it as a thing offered to an idol, that is, not as common meat, but as a sacred banquet in honour of the idol! and so his conscience being weak, that is, erroneous, is defiled." Learn hence, That an action which is lawful in respect of ourselves, may yet be a sin if done by us with respect to others; another, encouraged by our example, may do the same act, but not do it with the same intent, as in the case before us: The sight of one Christian's eating things offered unto idols, who knows that an idol is nothing in the world, may harden, embolden and encourage others to do the same, who really intend some honour by it to the idol; the outward action is the same, but the opinion and intention wide and different.

8 ¶ But meat commendeth us not to God: for neither if we eat, are we the better: neither if we eat not, are we the worse.

9 But take heed, lest by any means this liberty of yours become a stumbling-block to them that are weak.

As if the apostle had said, "It is not the eating or not eating barely considered, that makes a man either better or worse, more or less acceptable in the sight of God, but we must take great heed lest by our example others take occasion to worship the idol; you therefore ought not so to eat as to give occasion to the fall of your weak brother." Still the apostle holds forth this truth unto us, That such a man certainly sins who uses his liberty, so as that it becomes a snare and a stumbling-block to his weak brother, by emboldening and encouraging him unto sin.

10 For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are offered to idols:

11 And through thy knowledge shall thy weak brother perish for whom Christ died?

The meaning of the apostle seems to be this; "If any man with an erroneous conscience goes to these feasts, and there sees thee, who he thinks has more knowledge than himself, sit at meat in the idol's temple, will not his conscience be the more emboldened by thy example to eat things offered to idols in the honour of the idol, or as thinking it no hurt, to worship the idols? And thus, by occasion of thy knowledge, a weak brother is in danger of perishing, for whom Christ died." An indiscreet use of that liberty, which our supposed knowledge teaches us to make use of, doth that, if we be not careful, which may be accounted a destroying of our weak brother, by causing him to fall into sin: By all which the apostle lets us know the obligation which lies upon every good Christian not to use his liberty to the prejudice of other souls, by doing any action which may be let alone, but if done, may really become a snare to others.

12 But when ye sin so against the brethren, and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ.

The apostle goes on to shew, that such an use of our Christian liberty as doth embolden and encourage others to do that which is evil, is both an act of uncharitableness towards our brother, and also an act of sin against our Lord Jesus Christ, in betraying a soul to ruin as much as in us lieth, and hindering his salvation for the saving of whom Christ died, wounding the members of his body, defeating the great end of his death, and destroying them whom he designed to save. Learn, 1. That Christ in dying for the weakest believers, hath shewn the highest degree of love imaginable unto them. Learn, 2. That such as will not abate or abridge themselves of their Christian liberty, when the use of it may probably be an occasion of sin, and the ruin of their brethren's souls, do at once wound their weak brethren, and sin against Christ.

13 Wherefore, if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

A twofold sense and interpretation is given of these words. Some understand the apostle speaking thus: "If my eating meat offered to idols be a stumbling-block to any persons, and confirms them in their sinful practice, or be an occasion of sin unto them, I will certainly deny myself the use of that liberty which may prove of such dangerous consequence to my fellow Christians." Others carry the thing higher, and understand it of all flesh in general, that rather than the apostle would offend his weak brother, he would not eat any flesh to his dying day: an hyperbolical expression, by which the apostle declares how far one Christian should condescend to another, to prevent each others sinning against God : As if the apostle had said, " Verily I do not make so light of another's sin, nor set so light by the soul of my weak brother, nor by the blood of my blessed Saviour, as for flesh, that is for an unnecessary thing, to make use of my liberty, when it may prove a temptation unto sin." From the whole of the apostle's discourse in this chapter, we learn, That it is the duty of Christians, in matters, wherein they are at liberty by the law of God, to do a thing, or not to do it, to take that part which, they see, will give least occasion of sin unto their brethren, and to avoid that part, which, if taken, will certainly give occasion unto others to sin. Although we be ourselves never so well satisfied as to the lawfulness of the action, yet we ought to deny ourselves in some things, rather than be an occasion to others, to fall into sin ; he forfeits the name of a Christian who will not abridge himself of his Christian liberty to preserve his brother from sin and temptation.

CHAP. IX.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, exhorted the Corinthians to abridge themselves in the lawful use of their Christian liberty, when it will be prejudicial to weak Christians : In this chapter he propounds his own example for their encouragement and imitation, who, though he was an apostle, and had as great a freedom and liberty as any man in things undetermined by the law of God, yet restrained himself in several cases, which are recorded in this chapter, in which the holy apostle thus expresses himself :

A M I not an apostle ? am I not free ? have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord ? are ye not my work in the Lord ?

The first instance which the apostle gives of his freedom and liberty was this, That when he preached the gospel amongst them at Corinth, he had a liberty either to live on the gospel, and take maintenance of them for preaching, or to live upon his labour, following his trade of tent-making, according as he saw it best for the furtherance of the gospel : Am I not free ? As if he had said, " Have not I as good a claim to freedom and Christian liberty as any man ! For am not I an apostle, or an extraordinary messenger of Jesus Christ ? And though I never saw the face of Christ upon earth, yet have I not seen him, and heard him speaking to me from heaven ? And is not the conversion of you, the Corinthians, to the Christian faith by my ministry, a fruit and seal of my apostleship ? Now, if I be all this, certainly I have as great a right and claim to the use of Christian liberty, as any of you can pretend to have. Yet will I only make use of it for the benefit of others, and for the furtherance of the gospel. Learn we from the apostle's example, in abstaining from that liberty and power which God hath given him for receiving maintenance from them to whom he preached the gospel, how much it is the duty and concern of all Christians to the end of the world, to abstain from the exercise of that liberty, and rightful power, granted to them Christ, for avoiding the scandal of the weak, and promoting men's spiritual welfare.

2 If I be not an apostle unto others, yet doubtless I am to you ; for the seal of mine apostleship are ye in the Lord ?

As if he had said, " Whatever others do, you of all men should not question my apostleship, for you were converted by it : You confirm and ratify my ministry, that it is of God, and that God is in it of a truth : The conversion of sinners, and the building up of saints, is God's seal to our ministry." Learn hence, That there is no such argument to prove a minister sent of Christ, as the success of his ministry in the conversion of souls unto God : This is God's seal to his office, that he is a minister called of God, and sent by God. Happy those ministers who can say unto their people, " Ye are our work, and the seal of our apostleship are ye in the Lord." Yet must it not be concluded from hence, that a person is not a true minister of Christ, because he cannot produce this seal : The good of our ministry is not always known to ourselves, much less published to the world ; More good is done many times by the ministry of the world than the ministry knows of ; the seed sometimes lies long under the clods before it fructifies ; what is sown in one minister's time, comes up in another's ; so one soweth, and another reapeth, but both he that soweth, and he that reapeth, shall rejoice together. But where this seal can be produced, it is a certain sign that such a minister is sent of God, and that God is with him, and owns him ; yet it must be added, that though the success of our ministry to others is a seal of our office, and assures us that we are true ministers, yet it is the efficacy of the word we preach upon our own hearts and lives, that is the witness of our sanctification, and the zeal of our salvation. Lord ! how sad will it be for any of us to have been instruments for the helping others to heaven by the soundness of our doctrine, and to go to hell ourselves for the badness of our example, and the wickedness of our lives.

3 Mine answer to them that do examine me is this :

4 Have we not power to eat and to drink ?

5 Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas ?

6 Or I only and Barnabas, have not we power to forbear working ?

Here the apostle instances in another branch of his Christian liberty, and that was marriage ; he could have taken a wife, as Peter, and other apostles did, had he pleased, and have put the church to a farther charge in maintaining himself, a wife, and family, as did others, without blame : And he and Barnabas had power to forbear working for their living and maintaining themselves with their own labour in tent-making ; they had power to ask maintenance of the Corinthians, if they pleased. But they considered the low-circumstances which the church was in and under at that time, and continued both in a single state, and wrought with their hands to maintain themselves, when they might have expected maintenance from the church. Have we not power to lead about a sister, a wife? That is to marry, if we saw fit. Hence learn, 1. The lawfulness of the ministers of the gospel marrying, as well as other men; neither the prophets of the Old Testament, nor the apostles of the New, did abhor the marriage bed, nor judge themselves too pure for an institution of their Maker; the doctrine forbidding marriage to any (which the apostle says is honourable in all) is called a doctrine of devils. Learn, 2. That no Christians, much less ministers, have power, that is, any lawful power, to marry such as are no Christians; their wives must be their sisters in Christ; that is, Christian women, at least by external and visible profession. 3. That husband and wife ought to be undivided companions one to another. Have we not power to lead about a wife? That is, to take her with us in our travels and journeying from place to place, for our comfort and assistance. Husbands and wives are to be mutual companions, sharers in each other's sorrows, and partakers of one another's comforts.

7 ¶ Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges? who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?

As if the apostle had said, "As soldiers are paid by those that employ them, and as husbandmen and shepherds live upon the fruit of their labours, so may I, and all the ministers of the gospel with me." Where note, 1. That the ministerial function is represented here as a warfare: the ministers of Christ are spiritual soldiers, they have many enemies to encounter with, and contend against. They are also planters, vine-dressers, husbandmen, shepherds: All which titles given to them, to intimate and signify what care and painfulness, what diligence and watchfulness, should be found with them. Note, 2. That maintenance, a comfortable maintenance, for the people, is a debt due to the ministers of the gospel, who labour in the word and doctrine amongst them. Who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? this is the first argument which our apostle here makes use of, to prove the minister's maintenance, a duty taken from the law of nations, equity and custom, which do appoint and allow to soldiers, vine-dressers and shepherds, yea, to all that labour for the use of others in their respective callings, a due regard of wages. What soldier goes to war at his own charges?

8 Say I these things as a man? or saith not the law the same also?

9 For it is written in the law of Moses, Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. Doth God take care for oxen?

10 Or saith he it altogether for our sakes? for our sakes, no doubt this is written: that he that ploweth should plow in hope: and that he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope.

A second argument produced by the apostle for the people's cheerful maintenance of the ministers of the gospel, is taken from the Levitical law: Say I these things as a man? Or saith not the law the same also? As if he had said, "I do not speak this only rationally, as a thing very agreeable to the light of nature, and the law of nations, but the Levitical law says the same: For when God, in Deut. xxv. 4. forbids to muzzle the mouth of the ox, who by hard labour treadeth out the corn with his feet, his design therein is more than the bare taking care of the ox; for thereby he shews in general what equity should be used in the just rewarding of all men that labour for us; and in particular, the spiritual labourers, such as plow, and sow, and thresh, in that spiritual husbandry, should labour in hope of a livelihood and subsistence, and eat their bread when they have earned it. If all men are encouraged to work, by a just expectation of the fruit of their own labours, why should not the ministers of the word meet with the like encouragement, which all mankind look upon as their just due?"

11 If we have sown unto you spiritual things is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?

A third argument for the minister's maintenance is here taken from common justice: They sow spiritual things; that is, they dispensed the word and sacraments, and endeavour to make men spiritual and holy here, and happy hereafter; and therefore they ought to reap some of their people's carnal things, things for the support of their lives, a subsistence for themselves and their families: So that the ministers of God are not indebted to their people, but their people are indebted both to God and them; they give their people things of a much greater value, and more excellent use, for things of much less value, and more inferior use; for their carnal things, they give them spiritual things.

12 If others be partakers of this power over you, are not we rather? Nevertheless we have not used this power; but suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ.

Here we have a fourth argument for the Corinthians allowing St. Paul and other apostles a maintenance: namely, for their own example to other teachers at Corinth? As if he had said, "You maintain others, why not us? Do not you owe more to us, who first laid the foundation of a Christian church amongst you, and have begotten you through the gospel, than you do to others? Nevertheless he tells them that himself and Barnabas, although they had this unquestionable liberty, yet they never made use of it, but suffered hunger and thirst, weariness and want, lest it should obstruct the course, and hinder the progress of the gospel; whilst some might, though very unjustly charge them with covetousness; and others, to save charges, might decline hearing of them.

3 Do ye not know, that they which minister about holy things, live of the things of the temple ; and they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar ?

14 Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel.

A fifth argument is here produced for the ministers' maintenance, which is taken from the example of the Levites, who lived upon the things that were offered in the temple, and at the altar, and had a considerable part of the sacrifices allowed them by God himself for their ministration under the law. ' In like manner, says the apostle, " It is the Lord's pleasure and appointment now under the gospel, (Matthew x. 10. Luke x. 7.) that they who preach the word should be maintained for it, and not diverted from their work, by the cares and business of the world, but have a livelihood from their labour. Hence it clearly appears, that a maintenance for the ministry under the gospel is of divine right ; if it was so under the law, it is likewise under the gospel ; for so says the apostle, God has ordained. God's will in this matter is the same under the New Testament as it was under the Old : and as a maintenance in general is of divine right, so tithes may make thus far a claim to be of that nature, that it is believed the wisdom of man cannot find but any better expedient, than by them to support a ministerial maintenance for the preachers of the gospel to the end of the world.

15 But I have used none of these things. Neither have I written these things that it should be so done unto me : for it were better for me to die than that any man should make my glorying void.

The apostle having thus asserted his liberty, now shews his great moderation in the use of it : Although he had a liberty to marry, and to demand maintenance for his ministry as well as others, yet he denied himself in both. The apostle was charged by false teachers, that he preached the gospel for his own profit and advantage ; whereas he gloried in the contrary that he made the gospel without charge ; looking upon it as his great honour, that he could, and did, preach the gospel freely, for sincere ends, and not out of sinister respects ; and professes he had rather die by starving than lose his advantage of glorying. Now the inference which St. Paul draws from this discourse, of his declining the use of his lawful liberty, is this : " If I your minister, for your profit and the advantage of the gospel, abate of my own just right and unquestionable liberty, why should not you abate of yours, in the case of eating things offered unto idols, to keep your weak brother from destroying his soul by sinning against God ?"

16 For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of : for necessity is laid upon me : yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel.

17 For if I do this willingly, I have a reward : but if against my will, a dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me.

That which the apostle glories in, is not his bare preaching of the gospel, but his preaching of it freely, and without maintenance ; for, says he, " Though I preach the gospel, that has nothing singular in it, others do it as well as myself ; and I am bound to do it as well as others ; for necessity is laid upon me, by special call and command from Christ so to do ; yea, woe is unto me for my disobedience to Christ in the heavenly vision (Acts xxvi.) if I preach not the gospel. Now, if I do this thing willingly, that is, freely, without demanding any thing of you for my pains, which I might do, I have a reward ; that is, a special reward from God, and may glory in it : But if I preach unwillingly (demanding a maintenance for my pains, and refusing to preach without it) all that can be said is this, that a dispensation of the gospel is committed to me ; and so in preaching I only discharge a trust of which I cannot boast or glory. The strength of the apostle's argument lies here : " No man can reasonably boast of, glory in, or expect an extraordinary reward for the doing of that which he is under a command from his superior to do, and that under a penalty too." Now this was his case : Necessity was laid upon him to preach the gospel, but no necessity but what he laid upon himself to preach it freely ; therefore for him to do it, without demanding any reward from them for the doing of it, this made it matter of glorying to him, which he declares he had rather die than any should take from him. But was it the apostle's own glory that he was thus fond of, and concerned for, that he had rather lose his life than lose it ? No, it was the glory of God, the honour of the gospel, that was so inexpressibly dear unto him ; this great apostle did, upon pure principles of faith and love, from his heart and soul, design the glory of God, pursuant to which he did cheerfully and willingly apply himself to the preaching of the gospel, waiting upon God for his acceptance and reward, without expecting any wages (as he might) from them his Corinthian converts ; and this was the matter of his boasting and glorying in the face of the false apostles, who insinuated that he preached the gospel for filthy lucre sake.

18 What is my reward then ? Verily, that when I preach the gospel, I may make the gospel of Christ without charge, that I abuse not my power in the gospel.

The sense is, " This gives me hopes of a reward extraordinary from God ; namely, that I have preached the gospel to you, without being chargeable to any of you ; for had I received maintenance from you, I found my reproaches would have brought an ill report upon me. To prevent which, I made use of my Christian liberty, and took nothing of you ; which he calls, his not abusing his power in the gospel." Learn hence, 1. That ministers, generally speaking, lawfully may expect, yea, require maintenance from their people to whom they preach the gospel. Learn, 2. That although they may expect and demand maintenance for their ministry, yet in case people are so poor, that they cannot give it ; or enemies so malicious, as to open their mouths against them for it ; or if it will hinder the progress of the gospel, by keeping people from coming under the preaching of it, fearing it should be chargeable to them; under such circumstances, if the minister can subsist without it, it is his certain duty to preach freely, and for such extraordinary services he may expect a more than ordinary reward. Learn, 3. That the liberty, which God hath intrusted us with, must never be abused by us, to the prejudice of his glory, or the detriment of his gospel, or to the disadvantage of others. All such use of our liberty in any thing, is indeed an abuse of it; therefore, says the apostle here, I abuse not my power in the gospel.

19 For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself a servant unto all, that I might gain the more.

20 And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law;

21 To them that are without law, as without law (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ) that I might gain them that are without law.

22 To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some.

23 And this I do for the gospel's sake, that I might be partaker thereof with you.

In these verses our apostle proceeds to shew the Corinthians farther, how mightily he did abridge himself of his Christian liberty, which was the argument he was insisting upon: For, says he, though I be free from all men, as being a servant to none, yet have I made myself as a servant to all, that I might gain the more to embrace the gospel. To the unconverted Jew he became as a Jew, circumcising Timothy for their sakes, Acts, xvi. 3. that he might gain the Jews. To them, who in their opinion were yet under the obligation of the ceremonial law, he carried himself as a person under that law, though he knew himself free from it, to the end that he might gain them that were under the law; and accordingly he purified himself in the temple, Acts xxi. To them that were without law, that is, the Gentiles, who were without the ceremonial law, he became as a person without law, abstaining from the use of all ceremonies as they did: But yet, not being without law to God, but under the law to Christ; that is, as to the moral law of God, which was not abolished, but re-inforced by Christ, he did never account himself free from that, nor durst do any thing contrary to that eternal rule of righteousness; and all this, that he might gain them that are without the law. To the weak converts either among Jews or Gentiles, he became as weak, by abstaining from what might hurt their weak consciences, that so he might gain the weak. Finally, he became all things to all men, by compliance with them in all lawful and indifferent things, that he might gain as many as he possibly could. And all this he did for the gospel's sake; that the gospel might be the better esteemed, and farther propagated, that he might himself partake of the promises and rewards of it, together with them to whom he preached it, and had effectually entertained it. Behold here the humility and charity of this great apostle; his ready condescension to the pitiable weaknesses of all men: his compliance with them in all lawful and indifferent things, for the glory of God, and the advantage of the gospel. A rare and singular pattern for all ministers and private Christians to imitate and follow. Now from this example of St. Paul's becoming all things to all men, and making himself a servant unto all, we learn, 1. One great duty of a gospel minister, is not to be a slave to any, but a servant to all; not a servant to their lusts, but to their weaknesses and infirmities. Our apostle did not turn, as the flattering and false apostles did, with the tide and times, nor conform to them in what was sinful: He did not symbolize with all colours, nor was he a man for all hours and humours; for, says he, If I please men (he means in any thing that is sinful) I am no more the servant of Christ, Gal. i. 10. But wisely considering the case and state of all men, he did accommodate his ministry, for the gaining of as many as possibly he could. Some are all things to all men, that they may gain by all; a spirit not only unworthy of a minister, but of a man. But St. Paul complied with all men, and made himself the servant of all, that Christ might thereby gain; his gospel gain, yea, and they themselves gain; which hints to us a second observation, the great end which the holy apostle aimed at, in this his compliance with, and condescension towards, the weakness of his people: This I do for the gospel's sake. As if he had said, "Though I thus stoop and yield to all men, 'tis to serve my Master, not myself. Think not that I thus put myself into all forms towards men for my own preferment in the world; but that Christ may be preferred in the hearts and acceptations of all men: "I please all men in all things, not seeking my own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved." 1. Cor. x. 33. Behold here the noble mark which this minister of Christ had in his eye, the saving of souls. That he might hit it, he wisely observed the temper and state of his people, striving to render himself agreeable and acceptable unto all, that he might by all means save some; yet had he also an eye to himself in all this; he had respect to the recompence of reward, as lawfully he might? "This I do for the gospel's sake, that I may be partaker thereof with you:" that is, that I may have a share myself in the promised rewards of the gospel, which I have preached to you. Blessed be God, it is lawful for all the ministers and members of Christ to do good out of hope of reward; and that his glory and our own happiness are so inseparably connected and knit together, that by promoting the former, we secure the latter.

24 ¶ Know ye not that they which run in a race, run all; but one receiveth the prize? So run that ye may obtain.

Our apostle according to his custom in sundry epistles, does in the end of this chapter fall upon the use of terms agonistical, borrowed from the Olympic, and other Grecian games, celebrated near Corinth, in which the contending parties did put forth all their strength to out do one another. These games were running, cutting, and wrestling; all which the apostle here alludes unto: and first to running;

They which run in a race, run all, but one receiveth the prize : so run the Christian race, that ye may obtain the prize. Learn hence, That Christianity is a race which God hath set us, and it is our duty faithfully and perseveringly to run it. In a race, the foundation of it is a prize ; in a race there is a considerable distance between one goal and another ; in a race there is a race-plot for the racers to run in, there are certain laws to run by, and there is a certain judge to determine who wins the crown fairly. Now this race of Christianity vastly differs from all other races, thus : This is a spiritual race, it strains not legs and lungs, but faith and patience. Other races are performed by natural abilities, but this by a supernatural power and strength. Those races might be run without disturbance, but not this ; their reward but a garland of bays, ours a crown of immortality. But what is it to run this race ? Ans. It supposes a motion, it imports a vehement and intense motion, it implies progress and proficiency ; every step brings the racer nearer the goal : and it implies perseverance ; the racer must hold it to the last, or he loses his labour and reward ; every one that thus runs shall obtain the prize ; whereas in other races, but one receiveth the prize.

25 And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now, they do it to obtain a corruptible crown ; but we an incorruptible.

It was a custom amongst those that used at Corinth the forementioned games of running and wrestling, to tie themselves to a strict prescribed diet, both for quality and quantity, by way of preparation. They did not indulge themselves in gluttony, or any sort of excess, but were temperate in all things, that the crown might be won by them ; which, alas ! was nothing but a garland of leaves or flowers. In imitation of whom, he advises the Corinthians to be very moderate in the use of all worldly things, and to abstain from whatsoever may hinder their running the Christian race, and their receiving the incorruptible crown.

26 I therefore so run, not as uncertainly ; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air.

That is, "I run this race of Christianity myself, which I advise you unto : But my care is to run sure, not at uncertainties ; to make sure of the crown at the end of the race ; and I do not only run, but fight ; I oppose whatever opposeth me." Here observe, The apostle changes the metaphor from that of running, to the other game of cussing ; and says he did not fight like one that beats the air, but never hurts the adversary ! No, he fought in good earnest with all his spiritual enemies, the flesh, the world, and the devil. It is not every running that will gain the prize, nor every fighting will obtain the victory ; but it must be a running with all perseverance, and a fighting with our utmost power, that will bring us to heaven and eternal happiness.

27 But I keep under my body,—

The original word may be fully rendered, I give myself blue eyes ; alluding to the Olympic game of cussing, in which the combatants were wont with their blows to beat one another till they made each other livid, their eyes black and blue. The sense is, that by mortification he used great severity upon himself, contending against and combating with that body of sin and death, which did obstruct and hinder him in running the Christian race which was set before him.

—And bring it into subjection :—

The word in the Greek is an allusion to the other exercise of wrestling, wherein the antagonists or contenders do strive to cast each other to the ground, and to keep them under. So he, the better to subdue his body of sin, was careful to keep down the body of flesh, which, if pampered, is apt to rebel. He concludes all with a reason why he exercised all this care and caution, namely, —Lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be cast-away.

That is, Lest when he had acquainted them with the laws and rules of Christianity, and proposed to them the way of striving and getting the crown, he himself should at last prove a cast-away, or one unworthy to be approved or rewarded by God. From whence, Observe, 1. That it is possible for him, who has been all his life preaching to others, and furthering them in their way to heaven, to be thrown himself into hell at last. Many that have prophesied in Christ's name, shall yet perish in his wrath ; and such as have cast devils out of others, shall yet be cast to the devil themselves. Observe, 2. That such ministers as indulge their unruly appetites, giving the flesh whatever it craves, and can deny it nothing it desires, pampering the body to the prejudice of the soul, go not in St. Paul's road to heaven, but the contrary, they gratify what he mortified, they indulge what he subdued : He administered to the wants, they to the wantonness of the flesh : He knew that Hagar would quickly perk up, and domineer over Sarah ; that the body would quickly expect and command more attendance than the soul, except it were kept under ; and, for this reason, says our apostle here, "I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection ; lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a cast-away."

CHAP. X.

The scope of our apostle, in this chapter, is the same with that which he had been pursuing in the two foregoing chapters ; namely, to dissuade Christians from eating of things offered unto idols, either publicly in the idol's temple, which was absolutely sinful ; or privately in the houses of any, to the offence and scandal of their weak brethren : Which, when there was no scandal in the case, was lawful, but otherwise not. Of the former, he discourses from the first to the twenty-third verse, which he proves to be altogether unlawful. Of the latter, he treats from verse twenty third, to the end of the chapter ; and although he grants, that eating of meat offered to an idol, may lawfully be done in itself in a private house (especially when it is uncertain and unknown to be so offered) yet when offence is thereby given to the weak brethren, it ought to be forborn. And accordingly he dissuades from by many arguments in the chapter before us.

MOREOVER, brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea.

Amongst other arguments which the apostle produces to dissuade the Corinthians from eating things offered to idols in the idol temples, and to prove it absolutely unlawful for Christians to have communion with the Gentiles in their idolatrous banquets, the first is drawn from the danger of such sinful communion ; it would endanger their falling into such kind of sins as the Israelites, on that occasion, fell into and consequently expose them to such punishments as they suffered. But first of all, in the beginning of this chapter, he acquaints the Corinthians with the great favours and privileges which almighty God vouchsafed to, and conferred upon the Israelites, who came out of Egypt with Moses into the wilderness, who had a pillar of cloud to guide and protect them, the manna from heaven to sustain and uphold them, and water out of a rock to refresh and satisfy them. All our fathers were under the cloud ; that is, under the conduct and protection of the cloud : and all passed through the Red-sea, as upon dry ground. This cloud, which accompanied the Israelites in their journeyings, had a threefold use. 1. In respect of God ; it was a sign and symbol of the presence of God with them, and of his care and protection over them, for it encompassed their camp as a wall doth a city. Hence is that of the psalmist, He spread out a cloud for a covering to them, and fire to give them light in the night season, Psal. cv. 39. 2. In respect of the Israelites, the cloud did guide and direct them in their journeyings ; Psal. lxxviii. 14. In the day he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire. And as the cloud did guide and direct Israel, so did it cool and refresh them in the wilderness, preserving them from the heat of the sun : It was a covering canopy over them, in a scorching desert. 3. In respect of their enemies, it was darkness to the Egyptians, and consequently, protected the Israelites from their enemies, that they could not assault or fall upon them. It had a bright side to the Israelites, and a dark side to the Egyptians. Lord ! how easily canst thou make the same creature a comfort to thy children, and a terror to thine enemies. Every outward blessing is that, and no more, which thou art pleased to make it to us. A cloud shall guide, a cloud shall cover, a cloud shall comfort Israel : And the same cloud shall be darkness, yea at thy command, shall be death to the Egyptians.

2 And were all baptized unto Moses, in the cloud and in the sea ;

Observe, 1. The Israelites is here said to be baptized in the cloud and in the sea ; that is, the cloud which overshadowed them, did sometimes bedew and sprinkle them : And the Red sea, through which they passed, had its waters gathered into two heaps, one on the right hand, and the other on the left, betwixt which the Israelites passed, and in their passage seemed to be buried in the waters : As persons in that age were put under the water when they were baptized ; and thus were Israel baptized in the cloud and in the sea. Observe, 2. They are said to be baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea : unto Moses : that is, into the doctrine taught by Moses, they believed him, and followed his conduct through the sea and were confirmed in their belief of Moses (the typical Mediator) as a person employed by God ; and were obliged, under the ministry and guidance of Moses, to follow God whithersoever he led them. Observe, 3. That all this was a figure to which our baptism answers : both the cloud and the sea had some resemblance to our being covered with water in baptism, by which we are confirmed in the faith of Christ, and obliged to profess and own him, to trust in and depend upon him, to serve and obey him, and this to the death. Behold how much of Christ and his gospel was shadowed and held forth to the Jews under the dispensation of the ceremonial law ; they had Christ in their sacrifices, and we have all their sacrifices in Christ. The cloud, the sea, the manna, the rock, all typified Christ, and were resemblances and representations of him. Christ was as truly represented to the Jews as unto us, as truly, though not so clearly.

3 And did all eat the same spiritual meat:

4 And did all drink the same spiritual drink. (For they drank of that spiritual rock that followed them ; and that rock was Christ.)

They, that is, the fathers in the wilderness, did all eat of the manna which came down from heaven, which is here called spiritual meat ; either because it came down from heaven, which is the habitation of spiritual beings : or because it was food given out by the ministry of angels, those spiritual agents ; or else it is called spiritual, that is, sacramental meat ; because it typified Christ, who is the bread of life, the true bread which came down from heaven. That manna was a type of Christ, thus appears : " Was manna provided by God for the Israelites without their labour and industry ? so is Christ given unto men without any merit or work of theirs, but of the free gift and goodness of God: Did manna come down from heaven besides the ordinary course of nature ? so was Christ's birth wonderful, and not as the birth of other men ; being not begotten of mortal seed, but by the influence of the Holy Ghost. Was manna distributed to all alike, one not having more and another less, but all an equal share ? In like manner, Christ communicates himself unto all alike, without exception of persons : A beggar may have as great a part in Christ as a prince. Again, as manna was food, plentiful food, sweet and pleasing food : so is Christ, the food of life, very sweet to such a soul as can truly relish him. Farther, must the manna, before fit for food, be beaten in a mortar, or broken in a mill, and baked in an oven ? so Christ, our heavenly manna, was broken on the cross, scorched in the fire of his Father's wrath, that he might become the spiritual food wherewith our souls are nourished unto everlasting life. Finally, as manna was given only in the wilderness, and ceased when the Israelites came into Canaan; so is Christ our spiritual meat, our sacramental food whilst we are in the wilderness of this world; but when we shall come to the heavenly Canaan, we should have no more any need of sacramental supports, but shall behold him face to face, and be satisfied with his likeness." And they did all drink of that spiritual Rock which followed them, and that Rock was Christ. Here the water out of the rock is also called spiritual drink, it being typically and sacramentally so. That rock was Christ; that is, it typified Christ. The word is, doth import as much as signifies or represents; so the rock is Christ: that is, it signified, represented, and typified Jesus Christ. For as the rock gave no water before it was smitten with the rod of Moses; so was Christ smitten upon the cross, and out of his side came forth water: And as it was the rod in Moses' hand that smote and broke the rock; so was Christ smitten with the curse of the law, in the day when his soul was made an offering for sin. In a word, as the rock yielded water, not only to them that were first present at the breaching of it, but followed them with its streams, in their stations through the wilderness: in like manner, the water which gushed out from our smitten Saviour, the sweet fruits and benefits of his death, did not only belong to them who were present at the time and place of his sufferings, but it doth, and will accompany all believers to the end of this world. The virtue and efficacy of Christ's blood is now as great, as efficacious and effectual, as it was the first hour it was shed; the divinity of his person adds an eternal efficacy to his passion.

5 But with many of them God was not well pleased: for they were overthrown in the wilderness.

Although the Israelites were made partakers of the fore-mentioned privileges and spiritual flavours; though they were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea, and did eat sacramental meat, and drink sacramental drink; yet it did not set them out of danger of God's displeasure, for they were overthrown, their carcasses fell in the wilderness. Learn thence, That no external privileges or prerogatives whatsoever, can exempt persons from God's judgments, if they return not suitably to him for the favours and benefits received from him. The bare outward receiving of a sacrament is not saving to the soul of a person; and the unworthy receiving of sacraments, and unsuitable walking after them, do inkindle God's anger, and provoke his heavy displeasure against persons, even to the cutting them off by untimely death here in this world; With many of them God was displeased, and they were overthrown in the wilderness.

6 ¶ Now these things were our examples to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted.

Observe here, 1. The sin charged upon the Israelites in the wilderness: They lusted; that is, after the flesh-pots of Egypt, and to return thither again. They had manna for forty years together, but being tied to it, (though angels food, that is, most excellent food) they grew weary of it.

Lord! how exceedingly indebted are we to thy liberality and bounty, in that plenty and variety of creature refreshments which thou affordest us? The beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, are given us, not barely for necessity, but delight, and do all administer to our support and comfort. Observe, 2. How the apostle calls upon us to improve examples, that we may not be made examples. These things, that is, their sufferings, were our examples; they were for our caution to receive warning by them, not to walk in those soul-defiling ways, in which they have walked, fallen, and perished. A wise Christian may receive much good by observing the dealings of God with them that are evil, for God is unchangeable, just, and holy, and will not favour that in one person, which he punishes in another. These things were our examples. As if the apostle had said, "O ye Corinthians, look upon the dead bodies of the Israelites, which are cast upon the shore of the scriptures, for a warning to you: follow not the same course, lest you meet with the same curse: if you tread the same path, expect the same punishment, for God is as righteous now as he was then: he hates, and will punish sin in you, as much as he did in them. These things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they lusted."

7 Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them: as it is written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and arose up to play.

8 Neither let us commit fornication, as some of them committed, and fell in one day three and twenty thousand.

Our apostle being still dissuading the Corinthians from eating of things offered unto idols, and thereby from holding communion with the Gentiles in their idolatrous banquets in their idol-temples, he sets before them the idolatry of the Jews, who sat down to eat and to drink of the sacrifices offered to the golden calf, and rose up to play; that is, to dance before the golden calf, after the manner of the Heathens, this being one of their rites by which they honoured their gods. He farther advised them to take heed how they mix with idolaters in their feasts, lest they be given up to fornication as the Israelites were in the wilderness, with the daughters of Moab, Numb. xxv. of whom there fell in one day, three and twenty thousand by the immediate hand of God. Learn hence, That Almighty God has left many instances upon record, in his holy word, of the severity of his justice upon persons guilty of idolatry and fornication, and all other sins, on purpose to warn all of their sin and danger in the perpetration and commission of them. To sin against example, is an aggravation of sin.

9 Neither let us tempt Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents.

10 Neither murmur ye, as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer.

Observe here, A double sin which the Corinthians are warned against, tempting and murmuring: Neither tempt ye Christ, by trying how long his patience will last, as the Israelites did, (when as the angel of the covenant) he went before them in the wilderness, Numb. xxi. 5, 6. Here note, The object or person, whom the Israelites are said to tempt, Christ; which proves, 1. His pre-existence before his incarnation; the Israelites could not have then tempted him, had he not been then existent. His divinity: he who is called here Christ, is by the psalmist called, God, Psal. cvi. 14. They tempted God in the desert. Christ had not an human nature then to be tempted in, they tempted him therefore as he was God: A good argument to prove the divinity of our Saviour, made use of by the ancients. The other sin warded against, is murmuring: Neither murmur ye: that is, do not repine, because you are forbidden to be present at the idolatrous feasts of the Gentiles in the idol-temples: neither do ye murmur, by reason of the persecutions which you do or may endure, for the sake of Christianity, and the cause of Christ. Learn hence, That to murmur at, or be impatient under, any of the providential dispensations of God, is both great sin and folly. 'Tis an high presumption and wickedness to be dissatisfied with God's works of providence, as with his works of creation; to quarrel at what God doth, is an unchristian-like, yea, as uncreature-like, as to quarrel at what God has made. Therefore, murmur not as the Israelites murmured. Observe, 2dly, A double punishment inflicted on the Israelites, for this double sin committed; such as tempted, were destroyed of fiery serpents. Numb. xxi. 6, 7. The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people; the sting and venom of those serpents was inflaming, spreading, killing; much people of Israel died. And such as murmured, were destroyed by the destroyer; that is, by the destroying angel in that plague, mentioned Numb. xiv. 37. Such variety of judgments has Almighty God, with which to punish and plague an incorrigible and un reclaimable people.

11 ¶ Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples: and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

That is, the history of the Israelites' sins and punishments was written and recorded by God in the holy Scriptures, for the use and benefit of all succeeding generations, and particularly for us, who live in the last ages of the world, to warn us to avoid the like sin, that we may escape the like punishments. Learn hence, That the fall of others, whether into sin, or under judgment for sin, should be caution and warning to us to take heed of sinning. Here the apostle sums up the most remarkable judgments which fell upon the Jews in their passage from Egypt to Canaan, and closes all with this application to Christians; These things happened to them for ensamples; in the original it is, as types: they beset them typically, that in them we may see how God will deal with us if we take their course; those calamities which destroy some, should instruct others: Many will never see sin in itself, some will see it in the type and ensample, that is, in the judgment of God upon others, and those that will not see sin in the lashes of severity upon others, shall certainly feel it upon their own backs; such as will not improve examples, shall undoubtedly be made examples.

12 Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.

These words are an inference which our apostle draws from the foregoing discourse: Seeing that so many who enjoyed great privileges among the Jews, were yet punished greatly for their sins: seeing that sacraments are no privileges either for sin, or from plagues: therefore, let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed, &c. Where note, 1. A great mutability to which human nature is subject: he that thinketh he standeth, may fall: Man's condition is according to his place and station: This is threefold. The first place is heaven; this is fixed and confirmed, a kingdom that cannot be shaken; the saints there are standing pillars, free from all possibility of falling. The second place is hell, where sinners are bound hand and foot; and being fallen, are without any possibility of rising. The third place is this earth on which we live, where men both stand and fall; and the best are subject to falling, being sons of Adam, as well as sons of God; partly flesh, and partly spirit. Note, 2. The vigilancy required in order to our standing; Take heed; How many thousands have fallen by a presumptuous confidence of their own strength in standing! they fell by thinking it impossible to fall. A Christian's motto is cavendo tutus; never safe, but when weary and watchful. Let a Christian always keep a jealous eye upon the weakness and inconstancy of his nature, and with a believing eye look up to the promise and power of God, and he shall be both preserved from falling, and also be presented faultless and unblameable in the day of Christ; if ever we stand in the day of trial, 'tis fear and faith must enable us to stand.

13 There hath no temptation taken you, but such as is common to man; but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it.

Here the apostle answers a plea which the Corinthians might probably make for their compliance with their fellow citizens, in eating things offered unto idols in their temples with them, namely, that thereby they should avoid persecution. Fear not that, says the apostle, you have hitherto been preserved, that no temptation has taken you, but such as is common unto man: that is, you have not yet been exercised with any trial but what is human, what the ordinary strength and resolution of human nature is able to bear: But in case you should be tried with extremity of suffering, and that you must either comply with the Heathen idolatry, or endure suffering to extremity, yet you have the promise of a faithful God for your support in that case: "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted, at any time, above what you are able, but will with the temptation also make a way so far to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." Learn hence, 1. That it is a great addition to an affliction not to see or discern a way to escape, and get out of affliction: God is exceeding gracious in our afflictions, in that he doth not hedge us in on every side, and hinder all possibility of escape out of our troubles. Learn, 2. That the consideration of God's strength to support us in and under our sufferings, is a mighty encouragement to us to grapple with them resolutely, and to bear them patiently and submissively: If our sufferings were intolerable, and human nature were not divinely assisted to stand under them, we should be forced to consult our present ease and deliverance, and chuse sin rather than affliction : but the assistance of God makes suffering work easy.

14 Wherefore, my dearly beloved, flee from idolatry,

15 I speak as to wise men : judge ye what I say.

Here our apostle re-assumes his exhortation to the Corinthians, not to meddle with the mysteries of Paganism, nor to eat of things offered unto idols ; assuring them it was no less than idolatry, in the account of God, to eat of those things which were taken from their execrable altars, as a part and remnant of those sacrifices to idols which were performed in the city of Corinth, with all the pomp of an abominable superstition. This participation of things offered to idols, in the idol-temples, our apostle calls idolatry : Wherefore, my beloved brethren, flee from idolatry. Here note, That the nature of man is extremely prone to idolatry, and very ready to comply with men in their idolatrous practices. Note, 2. That the idolatry of the Jews of old, and of Christians since, who knew and owned the true God, and gloried in him, was and is, far worse than the idolatry of Pagans, who knew him not, nor even gloried in him. Observe farther, How our apostle appeals to themselves, and leaves it to them to judge, whether they did not do very ill to be present at the feasts upon the Heathen sacrifices, and eat of things offered unto idols : He leaves it to themselves to judge, Judge ye what I say. There is a judgment of discretion which persons ought to use in matters of religion, and not to deliver up themselves blindfold to the conduct of their teachers, the church of Rome, by denying the people this liberty, make them slaves : they put out the people's eyes, to make them fit for a blind obedience. Our apostle was far from this practice : Let wise men, says he, judge what I say.

16 The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ ? the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ ?

These words are a special argument, made use of by the apostle to dissuade Christians from joining with the Heathens, in their impure feasts in the idol temples ; the Gentiles have fellowship with the idols in those feasts, as Christians have communion with Christ at his holy table : So that the argument runs thus, " If believers, by communicating with Christ at his holy table, have real communion with him, then also, those that do communicate with idolaters, do become partakers of communion with them in their impure feasts : But believers do the first, namely, at the Lord's table they communicate with Christ." This he proves from the words before us, The cup of blessing, &c. Where observe, 1. A description of the Lord's Supper, in both the parts of it, namely, the external and visible part, bread and wine : the internal and spiritual part, the body and blood of Christ. Observe, 2. The ministerial actions performed in this solemn ordinance, and they are the blessing of the cup, and the breaking of the bread. 3. Here is the great end and design of God in the institution of this ordinance, namely, that believers might thereby enjoy a spiritual fellowship and communion with Christ their head ; Is it not the communion of the body of Christ ? Learn hence, That one great end and design of Christ, in the institution of his supper, was this, that believers might enjoy a sweet fellowship and communion with himself therein.

17 For we being many are one bread, and one body ; for we are all partakers of that one bread.

The apostle's argument lies thus : " As Christians, though many, yet by virtue of their society in the same worship, are compacted together, as it were, into one loaf or lump ; that is, into one mystical body, in that they partake of one and the same sacramental bread ; so those that communicate with idolaters, in eating things offered unto idols, are compacted together, as it were, into one body, forasmuch as they communicate in one and the same sacrifice ; as many grains of corn moulded together make one loaf, and the juice of many grapes make one cup : so Christians though many, yet are one visible church, one mystical body, and declare themselves so to be, by their fellowship together at the Lord's table.

18 Behold Israel after the flesh. Are not they which eat of the sacrifices, partakers of the altar ?

19 What say I then ? that the idol is any thing, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing ?

20 But I say, that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God : and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils.

Here another argument against eating things offered to idols is produced by our apostle, and it runs thus : " As in the Jewish church, all persons that did eat of the peace-offerings, which were laid upon God's altar, did, by that act, declare themselves members of the Jewish church, and that they owned the God of the Jews, to whom those sacrifices were offered : in like manner, the converted Corinthians, by eating part of those beasts which were sacrificed in the idol's temple, did by that act declare their owning of that idol, and that idolatrous worship which had been there performed, and were really partakers of that idolatrous altar : Not that an idol is any thing, or that which is offered to the idol any thing, that can of its own nature pollute and defile ; but the plain truth was, the Heathens were seduced by the devil to offer these sacrifices, and they were devils whom they worshipped ; though not in their own intention, yet in God's estimation : And consequently those that did eat of those feasts, are supposed to join in those sacrifices, and thereby to hold communion with devils.

21 ¶ Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils ; ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils.

That is, "Ye cannot have communion with Christ and with idolaters too; your communicating with Christ in the Lord's Supper is utterly inconsistent with communicating with devils in the idols' feasts, for this were to do homage to two contrary Lords, God and Satan, and profess service to both." Here observe, 1. A sacramental table described; 'tis the table of the Lord, so called, because he is the Lord of Lords, did institute it, for the remembrance of his own death. Observe, 2. An impossibility declared, that none can be worthy partakers at the Lord's table that hold communion with sin: True idolatry is the sin here specified, or sacrificing unto devils; but it holds true of all sin in general, and of having fellowship with Satan in any of the unfruitful works of darkness. Learn hence, That no person can really enjoy any fellowship and communion with Christ at his holy table, who maintains correspondence with sin, and holds communion with Satan.

22 Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?

Observe here, 1. That the worship of God, is that which he is very tender and jealous of; never was husband so jealous of the chastity of his suspected wife, as God is jealous in point of worship; idolatry is a provoking God to jealousy. Observe, 2. That such as worship idols, or are guilty of idolatrous worship in any kind or degree, must expect God a jealous avenger, and will find themselves not strong enough to contend with him. "Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy, by joining devils in competition with him? Are we stronger than he? Who knows the power of his anger? The strength of God should make sinners tremble."

23 All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not.

Our apostle having, in the former part of this chapter, resolved the case concerning public eating of things offered unto idols in the idol-temples, and by several arguments proved it to be absolutely unlawful: he comes now to resolve another case, concerning private buying, and private eating of things offered unto idols; for it seems to have been a custom, to set to sale in the market, flesh that was sacrificed, (the gain whereof went to the priests) as well as other flesh; but first he answers an objection: Some might be ready to say, all things are lawful for me: that is, all-meats may lawfully be eaten by me, If so, says the apostle, yet all lawful things are not expedient to be done, in respect of our weak brother: plainly intimating, That there are many things lawful in themselves, which, considered under such and such circumstances, are very inexpedient; and so far as they are inexpedient, so far are they unlawful.

24 Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth.

These words may be understood two ways: 1. Let no man seek his own, that is, only his own wealth. 2. Let no man seek his own wealth, that is, to the prejudice of others, though never so much to his own advantage; teaching us, That it is the duty of every Christian, not merely to look at his own profit and pleasure, but at the benefit and advantage of others, as that which edifies, or tends to promote holiness in others: And that is the use of our Christian liberty, we must regard rather the edification and salvation of others, than the gratification of ourselves.

25 Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question for conscience' sake.

26 For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

Here the apostle resolves the case, whether it were lawful to buy that meat in the market, which had been offered to an idol in the temple. He determines, 1. That it was; if it be sold in the shambles, it is to be looked upon as common food, and they may freely buy it, without any scruple of conscience; but how came meat to be sold in the shambles, which was offered and sacrificed in the temples of the Gentiles? Ans. It is probable, that the priests who had a share in the beasts that were offered unto idols; or the people, who had also a share, returned them out of their own offerings, did bring such meat to be sold in the market: In this case, says the apostle, ask no questions about it. Observe, 2. He assigns the reason for it, because the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: That is, those things that are sold for food in the market, are to be looked upon as the creatures of God, made for, and sanctified, to the use of man; and, therefore, you may eat of any creature which the Lord provideth for your food, without scruple of conscience, when others are not scandalized at it, 1. Tim. iv. 4. Every creature of God is good, if received with thanksgiving.

27 If any of them that believe not, bid you to a feast, and ye be disposed to go; whatever is set before you, eat, asking no question for conscience' sake.

28 But if any man say unto you, This is offered in sacrifice unto idols, eat not, for his sake that shewed it, and for conscience sake. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.

Our apostle here puts another ease; "Suppose an unbeliever, an Infidel or Heathen, did invite a believer, a Christian, to a feast of civil friendship in his private house (not to a feast upon a sacrifice in the idol-temple, which was absolutely unlawful) what was to be done in this case?" He declares they may warrantably go and eat of whatever is set before them, without scruple, but would have them ask no questions about the lawfulness of it; nevertheless, if the master of the feast, or any present at the feast, shall suggest that some part of the meat has been offered to an idol, in that case he would have them forbear; lest they should encourage any man to idolatry; adding his reason as above, For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; that is, there is plenty and variety of other meat to be had, which God the Creator of all things, the Lord of the whole earth, has allowed us the free use of; so that we may well let the idol-sacrifices alone,

Here we see, than an action, lawful in itself, becomes sinful and is condemned as such, when there is a breach of charity in the doing of it.

29 Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the others; for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?

30 For if I by grace be a partaker, why am I evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks?

Here the apostle tells them, that they ought to abstain from that which is lawful and indifferent in itself, for the sake of another man's conscience. This meat had not been unlawful to them, though offered to idols, had they not been told that it was so offered, but being made acquainted therewith, for the sake of him that shewed thee it was offered to idols, forbear eating; for why should our liberty be so used by us as to be judged of, and condemned by, another man's conscience? It is not enough that we do what is just and right in our own sight, but we must provide things honest in the sight of all men. Whatever things are pure, whatever things are lovely, whatever things are of good report; these we must practise, and none but these." And observable is the apostle's reason, why he should, for the sake of another, abstain from eating that meat, which was lawful in itself, ver. 30, namely, to prevent being evil spoken of, Why am I evil spoken of? That is, why should I cause another to speak evil of me, for eating that meat, which I might without any prejudice forbear? for in so doing, I shall certainly abuse my liberty, grieve God, and offend the weak.

31 Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God.

Our apostle concludes his whole discourse with three excellent rules, to direct all Christian, how they should govern themselves in the use of their lawful liberty, as to things that are of an indifferent nature; that is, neither commanded nor forbidden in the word of God. The first is this. To refer all our actions in general, both natural, civil, and religious, to the glory of God; to make that our supreme aim, our ultimate end, in all we do. in all we design, in all we desire. A Christian is to perform his natural actions to spiritual purposes; and whilst he is feeding and refreshing his body at his own table, must have an eye at his serving God, both with soul and body. Farther, not only in our natural actions, but in our civil employments, in our lawful recreations; but especially, and above all, in our religious duties must we propound the glory of God as our principal aim, our chief scope, our supreme end: This injunction, do all to the glory of God, is applicable to all the actions of human life.

32 Give none offence, neither to the Jews nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God.

Here we have the second rule given for ordering all the affairs of human life, Give no offence to any, neither to the unbelieving Jew, nor to the unconverted Gentiles, nor to the weak members of the church of God; particularly, give no offence to these, by eating things offered to idols at any time, or in any place, where any may be scandalized; for the Jew will consider, that you are enemies to the law and the prophets: The Gentiles will believe that your abhorrence of idols is not real, when they see you eat things offered unto idols before their faces; and the weak Christian will be tempted by your example to revolt from the Christian faith. Therefore, do nothing that may tend to the hurt, or just offence, either of Jew, Gentile, or Christian.

33 Even as I please all men in all things, not seeking mine own profit, but the profit of many, that they may be saved.

The last rule, which the apostle lays down, is his own practice and example, who in different things accommodated himself to all men. I please all men; that is, I seek and endeavour to please all men, and in all things; that is in all lawful things, and in all other things, wherein the law of God has left him at liberty; for in neither the omission of any thing which God commanded, nor in the commission of aught which he had forbidden, would St. Paul please any man in the world: And when he did please all men, it was for their profit and advantage, not his own; to promote their eternal salvation, not his own temporal interest. I please all men, that they may be saved. Learn hence, 1. That no man must be pleased by sin, nor pleased in their sins. The smallest duty must be preferred before the pleasing of all the men in the world. Learn, 2. We may and ought to seek the pleasing of men, with subserviency, and in subordination to the pleasing of Almighty God. Learn, 3. That inordinate man pleasing is fruitless, needless, and endless; when you have endeavoured to please most, how many will be displeased, when you have done your best? God himself, Jesus Christ, his holy prophets, apostles, saints and servants, could never please the world; and can any of us expect to do it? St. Paul, though he became all things to all men, yet could save but some: The world hates godliness, and godly persons, and will never be pleased with that which they hate; let pleasing of God be our great business, and in subordination to him, endeavour to please all men for their profit, that they may be saved.

CHAP. XI.

BE ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ.

The apostle, had in the foregoing chapters, by many cogent arguments exhorted the Corinthians to deny themselves the lawful use of their Christian liberty for the benefit of their brethren: to enforce which argument he propounds to them his own example in this verse, Be ye followers of me, even as I follow Christ. Where note, 1. The duty recommended to their practice; namely, to follow their spiritual guide: Be ye followers of me. It is the standing duty of a people whom God honours with the enjoyment of faithful spiritual guides, to follow their faith, and to imitate their exemplary conversation; the graces of all Christians in general, but of the ministers of the gospel in particular, whether living or dead, are patterns set forth to the world for their careful imitation : and for omission herein, they must certainly become accountable to God. Note, 2. With what great modesty and caution, with what restriction and limitation, St. Paul propounds his own example to the Corinthians' view ; Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ : As if he had said, " If at any time you find me your spiritual guide stepping aside, and walking unanswerably to that uniform pattern of holy and humble obedience, which the Lord Jesus set both before you and me, in his own exemplary life, be sure you decline my example, and follow not my footsteps." Learn hence, That the best of ministers, and the best of men, being but men, our imitation of them must not be universal, but a limited imitation ; we must follow pastors, teachers, nay, apostles themselves, no farther than they follow Christ, their infallible Lord and Master. Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ.

2 Now I praise you, brethren, that you remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances as I delivered them to you.

This commendation is to be restrained to the sounder part of the church at Corinth, who were mindful of his precepts and instructions, which he had delivered to them concerning matters appertaining to the public worship of God ; which precepts and rules for the worship of God he calls traditions, because they were immediately delivered to the church, either from the apostle's mouth or by writing : This place, though produced, yet makes nothing for the unwritten traditions of the Romish church. Let them prove by authentic testimony, that their fardles of traditions were delivered to the church from the mouth of the apostles, and we will receive them ; Now I praise you brethren. Here it deserves a remark, That the apostle, being about to reprove certain disorders in the church of Corinth, ushers in his reproof for what was amiss, with a commendation of what was praiseworthy among them : I praise you brethren : Like the physician, who wraps his bitter pill in honey or sugar before he gives it into his patient's mouth. It is wisdom to intermix commendations with our reproofs, that the latter may take more place when accompanied with the former.

3 But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ ; and the head of the woman is the man ; and the head of Christ is God.

Here our apostle answers the query, and resolves the case, which the Corinthians had put to him, and laid before him, about church-order, and concerning the decent behaviour of men and women in church-assemblies. And first he reminds them, that a subordination of persons in the church of God ought to be observed and kept : That as Christ, as Mediator, is inferior to God the Father, but is the head and Lord of all men, as Creator and Redeemer ; so the man is the head of the woman, and, as such, she must shew her subjection unto the man : As Christ, as Mediator, acts in subordination to the Father, so must the woman act in subordination to the man. The Socinians would wrest this text, to confirm them in their blasphemous denial of the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. " Here, say they, the apostle declares, that the Head of Christ is God : Now the most high God can have no Head above him ; therefore Christ, who hath an Head above him, cannot be the most high God." The modern and general answer is, That God is here called the Head of Christ as Mediator, in which relation he received his kingdom from him, and exercises it for him, and therefore is elsewhere styled the Father's servant. Behold my servant, &c. because he doth all things according to his Father's will, and with a fixed eye to his Father's glory. But the ancients reply to this objection thus : " That God is said to be the Head of Christ, as he is the Father of the Son, and so the cause of him ; and as the woman is of the same nature with the man, who is her Head, so is Christ of the same nature with God the Father, who is here called his Head : The head of Christ is God."

4 Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoureth his head.

5 But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered, dishonoureth her head : for that is even all one as if she were shaven.

By the man's praying and prophesying, understand his performing any divine offices in the church, as prayer and expounding the scriptures, singing of psalms, and the like. By doing this covered, understand not the natural covering of the hair, but an artificial covering by a veil, after the manner of women, which is a token of subjection. By dishonouring his head, understand either, 1. Christ, who in the former verse was called the Head of every man ; He that administers in the church in holy things, represents Christ, who is the Head of the church ; therefore by covering the head, he declares a subjection in his administration, and doth as it were make the church the head of Christ, instead of Christ's being the Head of the church : Or else, 2. By dishonouring the head, may be understood the minister's own head ; he betrayeth his superiority and lesseneth the honour and dignity of his sex, by using such a gesture in divine offices, as is a token of inferiority and subjection ; for in that country, at that time, it was a sign of subjection to have the head covered, but a sign of power and dominion to have the head uncovered. The contrary is found with us at this day ; for those that have power over others now keep their heads covered, and those that are inferior to others keep their heads uncovered before them, ver. 5. By the woman's praying and prophesying, is understood either prophesying extraordinarily, which we read the women sometimes did both in the Old and New Testament, and were called prophetesses, Luke. ii. 36. Acts xxi. 9. Or else, 2. By the woman's prophesying, is to be understood praising God in hymns and psalms, 1. Chron. xxv. 1, 2, 3. " They prophesied with harps, psalteries, and cymbals, giving thanks, and praising the Lord ;" where prophesying and praising the Lord are the same thing. By the woman's prophesying with her head uncovered, to the dishonour of her head or husband, is to be understood, her appearing unveiled in the church, open and barefaced in public : which was accounted, 1. An immodest, unbecoming, and unseemly guise. 2. Arrogant ; her being unveiled and uncovered was a token of her usurping an undue authority over the man, and of her casting off that subjection, which she was under by the law of her creation to him. 3. Superstitious; it being a fantastical imitation of the she-priests and prophetesses of the Gentiles, when they served their idols, and particularly when they sacrificed to Bacchus, who used to have their faces uncovered, their hair dishevelled, hanging at its full length round about their ears. Now the Corinthian women, in imitation of these Heathen women (for the female sex is very fond, and exceeding prone to follow the fashion) did cast off their veils, discover their faces, dishonour their heads, even their natural heads, (as well as the æconomical head, their husband) it being there and then accounted as immodest a thing for a woman to appear in public uncovered as to appear with her head shaven. From the whole learn, That God requires at the hands of all persons, who either administer unto him, or stand before him, a decent behaviour, and comely accommodation in his house, especially in the acts and exercises of his worship and service. For if in their habit and dress, surely much in their gesture and deportment, doth he love what is unseemly and unbecoming in any person. Learn, 2. That it is especially the duty of persons employed in divine administrations, to demean themselves as those who represent our Lord Jesus, managing themselves with a due authority and decent gravity, becoming the ambassadors of God. So then it is a general observation of decency in our outward behaviour, when worshipping God before others, which our apostle here recommends as a special duty.

6 For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn: but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaved, let her be covered.

7 For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God: but the woman is the glory of the man.

Our apostle proceeds, by many arguments, to evince and prove the woman's inferiority and subjection to the man, and that she sought to have a covering upon her head, as a sign and token of it. First, Because the image of God, that is, the image of his majesty, dominion and power, shineth forth most brightly in the man, therefore he ought to have his head uncovered; Man is the image and glory of God. But is not the woman so likewise? Ans. Consider the woman according to her specifical nature, and so she was created after the image of God in righteousness and true holiness, as well as the man: but then, consider the woman according to her personal relation to her husband, and in that regard, the woman is not the image of God; because dominion, which is the image of God, is the man's privilege: and subjection, the woman's duty: But she is the glory of the man; that is, it is the glory and honour of man, that God hath given him superiority over so excellent a creature as the woman; for if his dominion over the irrational creatures be his glory and honour, then what a glory and honour is it for a man to have so excellent a creature as the woman, a creature endued with reason like himself, subject to him! But as in this sense the man is the glory of the woman, so in another sense the woman is the glory of the man. She communicates with him in all his dignity, how great soever, whatever natural or civil excellency is in him, reflects on her; uxor fulget radiis mariti, the wife shines with the rays of her husband's honour. And the woman being thus in a state of inferiority, she ought to profess her subjection to her husband, by wearing a veil.

8 For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man.

9 Neither was the man created for the woman: but the woman for the man.

Another argument which the apostle offers, to prove the inferiority of the woman, is this, That originally the man was not made of the woman, or for the woman, but the woman was made of the man (his rib) and for the man; that is, for his service and comfort, to be an help-meet for him, and to be in subjection to him. Man had this prerogative, to be immediately from God; but the woman was from man, and to be administering and subservient to man, and consequently to cover her head, in token of her submission to him.

Moreover, for this cause ought the woman to have power (that is, a veil upon her head, as a sign, and a token of her husband's power, and her own subjection) because of the angels: that is, say some, 1. Because of the law of subjection given her by the ministry of angels. 2. Because of the pastors, teachers, and ministers of the church, say others, who are often in scripture styled angels. 3. Because of the evil angels, as some interpret it; the woman being tempted by Satan, the prince of evil angels, to commit the first sin, which is a perpetual cause of shame to her and her posterity, and which increased her and their subjection to the man; for which reason, the woman ought to be veiled and covered (in the church assemblies particularly) as a token of shamefacedness and subjection. 4. The more general interpretation is, because of the good angels, who are present in the assemblies of the saints, and eye-witnesses of their carriage there; therefore the woman ought to do nothing indecent in the presence of those holy spirits. And besides, she has the angels for her pattern and precedent who cover their faces and veil their heads, in token of subjection to almighty God. Note here, 1. That it has been a general opinion among the Jews, Heathens, and Christians, that good angels are more particularly present with us, in the places, and at the times of God's public worship; yea, that they are not only present with us, but observant of us, and assisting to us in the performance of all religious exercises, especially prayer; and therefore the Jews speak of a particular angel, whom they call the angel of prayer. Note, 2. That therefore all persons, both men and women, ought to demean themselves with all modesty, reverence, and decency in the worship of God, and out of regard to the angels, who are there present, observing their carriage and behaviour. True, the angels cannot penetrate into the inward devotion of the mind, which God only observes; but they observe, and take notice of the outward decency of our carriage, and the reverence of our deportment. But, Lord! how little is this considered, and by how few among us in our religious assemblies ! with regard to God, who sees our hearts, we should more particularly compose our minds to the greatest seriousness and sincerity in our devotions ; and with a particular regard to the holy angels, who are there present, we should be careful also of our outward behaviour : But, to our shame be it spoken, there are multitudes amongst us in our Christian assemblies, whom neither the presence of angels, nor the observing eye of him who is the Lord of angels can influence to any tolerable decency of behaviour in the house of prayer, where the eyes of God and angels, of ministers and men, are upon them. Such, without repentance, must never expect to dwell hereafter with God and his holy angels in heaven, but take up their lodgings with the devil and his angels in an eternal hell, for whom is reserved blackness of darkness for ever.

11 Nevertheless, neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord.

12 For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman ; but all things of God.

Because the apostle might seem to have been too harsh towards the woman, and lest the man should thereupon take occasion to carry himself with pride and insolence towards her, he prudently intimates the mutual help and need which both man and woman stands in of one another ; for, since the creation of the first man, all men are by the woman. And as men have no being but by the woman, so the woman without the man cannot exist or propagate. For as at the first creation the woman was taken out of the man, so now in generation the man is of the woman, and by the woman : she conceives him, brings him forth, suckles him, and brings him up, and all this by the wise disposal of God, who made the woman out of the man, and by his benediction increaseth man by the woman. From which considerations our apostle infers, that both man and woman should look upon their distinct prerogatives as given them by God, and carry it not with pride and insolence, but with respect and kindness each to the other ; and especially, that the woman be in subjection to the man, and testify that subjection by all the signs of it, particularly by her being veiled and covered, which is the argument our apostle is here insisting upon.

13 Judge in yourselves ; is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered ?

14 Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have longer hair, it is a shame unto him ?

15 But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her : for her hair is given her for a covering.

16 But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.

Observe here, 1. How our apostle closes his discourse, in which he had reprov'd the Corinthians, the men for covering, the women for uncovering their heads, and laying aside their veils in time of religious worship ; by an appeal to themselves and their own judgment, concerning the matter he is speaking of, and reprov'ing them for ; namely, men's praying with their heads covered, and women with their heads uncovered. Observe, 2. How the apostle proceeds to blame both sexes for another disorder ; namely, that men wore their hair like women, and that women appeared in the guise of men as to their hair. Here he lets them know, that both these kinds of disorders are repugnant to the institution of God, and the dictates of natural reason ; Doth not nature itself teach you ? That is, 1. The general dictates of natural reason. 2. The particular law of nature, concerning the distinction of sexes. 3. Usage and common custom, which is a second nature. All these suggest, that for men to wear their hair at full length like the women, is uncomely and unnatural in the manly sex, but so to do is comely and natural in the female. Learn hence, That God disallows, and even nature itself condemns every thing that tends to the confounding of the sexes, which it is his will and pleasure should be visibly distinguished. It is a great offence to God, and contrary to one end for which apparel was given, when either the man or the woman wear apparel contrary to their sex ; and what is said of apparel, their artificial covering, may be affirmed of the hair, which is their natural covering. "It is a shame for either sex to wear their hair in an uncomely and indecent manner, disagreeable to the natural modesty of either sex." Observe, 3. How the apostle appeals to the custom and practice of the churches of God in the case before us. The custom of all the churches is against women's being uncovered, as an unseemly thing. It is a known rule, Ubi nihil certi statuit scriptura, mos populi Dei, & instituta majorum pro lege tenenda sunt : We ought not to dissent and differ from the custom and practice of the church, in matters not positively determined : but the custom of the church must sway with us, with whose practice it is our duty to be as concordant as we can ; If any be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God. Learn, thence, That in things only respecting decency, and in compliance with which there is no violation of the command of Christ, the custom of the church of Christ should determine us, and be as a standing rule unto us ; Learn, 2. That it argues a contentious spirit, and savours very much of pride, in matters of little moment, to be singular in our practice, and to create disturbance to the church of God : If any man seem to be contentious, &c.

17 Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse.

18 For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you ; and I partly believe it.

19 For there must be also heresies among you that they which are approved may be made manifest among you.

Our apostle here enters upon a new argument or subject-matter of discourse; namely, to reprove the abuses which were crept in amongst them, in their administration of the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper. And the first abuse which he blames them for, was the divisions and factions which were found amongst them: I hear there are schisms amongst you: Where we are to understand by schisms, not a separation from the unity of the catholic church, but of sects and divisions in the church; they did not separate from the church, but they ate the Lord's Supper separately in the church, and the whole congregation did not join together, in the celebration of that ordinance. Though we do not separate from the communion of the catholic church, yet if we occasion division and dissent groundlessly in the church, we justly fall under the imputation and charge of schism. Observe next, The apostle argues, a minori ad majus; he did easily believe there were divisions, because there must be also heresies among them. Heresies are worse than schisms, false doctrines more dangerous than divisions. Heresy is an error in the fundamentals of religion, maintained with obstinacy. When the green wound of an error is let alone, it soon rankles, and quickly grows into the old sore of an heresy. But how comes the apostle to say, there must be heresies? What necessity is there for them? Answ. 1. Negatively; there is not an absolute necessity for them on God's part, or a necessity of his making, but a conditional necessity, or a necessity ex hypothesi, which must needs be, if such a thing be granted before: As supposing the sun to be risen, it must be day. Thus here, upon supposition of the pride, vain-glory, envyings, strife, and contentions, which are amongst the members of the church: upon supposition of the craft and subtilty, malice, and malignity of Satan, the church's grand enemy: upon supposition of God's permission that Satan and wicked men should act according to their corrupt affections and inclinations, heresies must and will be. Note, farther, That the reason here assigned for the necessity of heresies is not casual but eventual; not casual, as if the wisdom of God did design there should be heresies for this end, that they who are approved of him should be made manifest: but rather eventual, as if the apostle had said, "Hence it will come to pass, that they who are approved will be made manifest."

20 When ye come together, therefore, into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's Supper.

As if he had said, "True, ye Corinthians, when ye come together to one place, ye pretend to eat the Lord's Supper; but though you eat it, yet ye do not eat it as ye ought to do; you perform the material part of the action, but you do not partake of it solemnly and religiously, according to the divine institution: this therefore is not to eat the Lord's Supper." Learn thence, That a duty not done as it ought to be done, is not done at all in the account of Christ. Sermons may be heard, and yet accounted no sermons; prayers made, yet not made; sacraments received, yet not received; alms given, yet not given; because not done in manner and form as God required. A gracious heart will look not barely at the matter of the duty, but also at the manner of performance, and take care not only that he hears, but how he hears.

21 ¶ For in eating, every one taketh before other his own supper: and one is hungry, and another is drunken.

Here our apostle begins to reprove the Corinthians for the abuses found in their love feasts. These love-feasts were founded on no express command in holy writ, but only on the custom of the church, who immediately before receiving the sacrament used to have a great feast, to which all the poor were invited at the charges of the rich, as an expression of their perfect love and charity one towards another. Now in these feasts of charity, they did not observe due order and decency; for every one, that is, every party and faction, being come to the place of the assembly, did presently sit down to eat what they had brought, in the company of their own party, not minding or regarding others; whereupon this holy feast of charity was neither celebrated at the same time by all, nor with that unanimity and concord which it was designed to represent; whilst the poor were excluded and sent home hungry, the rich were feasted and drank to some degree of excess which is here called drunkenness; one is hungry and another is drunken. Behold what great irregularities and disorders are here found in the church of Corinth! Who can expect a church without spot in this imperfect state? God has left these miscarriages upon record, not for imitation, but for our caution.

22 What! have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye the church of God, and shame them that have not? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not.

A twofold sense and interpretation is given of these words. Some paraphrase them thus: What! must you make the house of God the place of your feasting? If you be disposed for mirth and jollity, have you not houses wherein you may do it with more privacy, and less offence? Or despise you the church of God? Do you undervalue, and thus profane and unhallow the place set apart for God's worship and service, by converting it into a common banquetting-house! Thus many expound it of the material church; and their opinion is favoured by the antithesis and opposition between church and houses: Have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise you the church of God? Learn, That holy duties, pious and public, are to be performed in the church or house of God. Duties pious, but not public, better suit the closet than the church. Duties public, but not pious, more befit a guildhall or town-house, than the house of God. Others by the church of God understand the spiritual church, the poor members of Jesus Christ, and reader the words thus: "What, have ye not houses to eat and to drink in, if need be before you come? Or despise you those poor Christians, who are members of the church of Christ as well as you, and put to shame them that have not what you eat and drink, by excluding them out of your company for their poverty-sake? For since God adopts them into his family, and admits them unto his table, you ought not to exclude them from this feast of charity, which was originally designed for the poor's relief." Learn, He that despiseth the poor, despiseth the church of God: yea, despiseth Christ himself; as he that pincheth the little toe, paineth the whole body, so the dis-racing the poor members of Christ, is a despising of the whole church. In these love-feasts the poor were the most proper, and should have been the most principal guests: but alas! the rich gorged themselves plentifully, whilst the poor stood and looked on hungry. Yet observe, lastly, With what lenity and mildness the apostle reproves these great disorders in the church at Corinth; Shall I praise you in this? I praise you not. It was the first time he had told them of their faults, therefore he doth it gently, in hopes of amendment. Learn thence, That though ministers must not commend, but reprove people, when they do ill, yet they must use mildness, especially at their first reproof of a sin. Some observe, That God so blessed the mild severity of St. Paul, that the Corinthians, upon the writing this first epistle reformed all their abuses; which they gather from hence, because no fault is taxed in the second epistle, which was reproofed in the first.

23 ¶ For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you, That the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread:

24 And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat: this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me.

25 After the same manner also he took the cup when he had supped, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood; this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

26 For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle, for reforming those abuses which were crept into the church amongst them relating to the holy sacrament, reduces them to the first institution of that sacred ordinance, I have delivered unto you what I have received of the Lord. Mark, The apostle did receive and deliver, but not institute and appoint, this venerable ordinance. Had he not received, he had wanted authority; and had he not delivered what he received, he had wanted integrity. Observe, 2. The author of this institution, the Lord Jesus. To institute sacraments is an act of Christ's regal power and royal authority. The church has no power to appoint, but only to execute and administer what Christ appoints. Observe, 3. The time of the institution, the same night in which he was betrayed. It is a night much to be remembered, in which he settles an ordinance in the church, for the confirmation and consolation of his people to the end of the world. Lord! What an evidence was here of thy tender care and affectionate concern for thy church and people, in spending so much of that little, very little, time thou hadst left, upon their account! Observe, 4. The sacramental elements, or the commemorative, significative, and instructive signs: and they are bread and wine, shadowing forth the body and blood of the crucified Jesus. Where note, St. Paul calls it bread five times over, which Christ calls his own body, because it was a sign and representation of his body: not his real body, for then Christ ate his own body whilst he was alive, his disciples devouring that body over night, which hung upon the cross next morning, with a thousand such absurdities which the doctrine of transubstantiation carries along with it. Observe, 5. The ministerial actions, the breaking of the bread, and blessing of the cup. The bread must be broken, to represent the breaking of Christ's body upon the cross, which comprehended all the sufferings of his human nature, all which were consummated in his crucifixion; and his broken bread must be taken and eaten by us to intimate, that all his breakings, bruising, and woundings, both in soul and body, were for our sins, and for our benefits, and that the sole intention of all his sufferings was for us. Wine also is poured forth, because as no liquor like wine doth cheer a sad and drooping spirit, in like manner, nothing doth so glad and cheer the soul, as faith in a crucified Saviour. That spiritual life which a soul is raised to, by the death of Christ, is a life of the greatest delight and joy which we can conceive. Observe, 6. The great design and end of this institution, Do it in remembrance of me, or for a memorial of me; Christ knew how apt our base hearts would be to forget him, amidst such a throng of sensible objects as we here converse with; and how much our forgetfulness of him and his sufferings would tend to our prejudice and disadvantages: and therefore doth he appoint this ordinance to bring him to remembrance. Observe, 7. The strict mandate or charge given for the frequent celebration of this ordinance, Do this as oft as ye drink it; that is, Do it often. We can no more live and thrive without our spiritual, than we can without our corporal food, as the body must be often fed, so the soul must have its frequent repast. Observe, 8. The reason assigned for the frequent celebration of this ordinance; For as oft as ye do this ye do shew the Lord's death till he come; that is, by frequenting this ordinance, we commemorate the death of Christ during his absence from us. As the end of the ordinance was to be a standing memorial, so the obligation that lies upon all Christians to observe it, is perpetual; Christians are by this ordinance to represent the sacrificing of Christ for their sins, till he comes again in glory. Learn, from the whole, 1. That the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was instituted by Christ as a standing memorial of his death and sufferings for us. Here we ought to remember the painfulness of his death, the meritoriousness of his death, the voluntariness of his death, the acceptableness of his death to God, and the advantageousness of his death to ourselves. And the manner how we should remember Christ and his death in the sacrament, is various: with judgment and understanding, with reverence and humility, with sorrow and grief of heart for our sins, yet with joy and thankfulness for the sufferings of a Saviour, with faith and assurance, with love and affection, with resolutions for a new and better obedience. Learn, 2. That the command of Christ lays it as a law upon, and makes it the standing duty of, all Christians, to commemorate his death at his holy table, Do this in remembrance of me. Here it deserves our notice what kind of command this is; it is a sovereign and supreme command; it is a positive and express command; it is a permanent and lasting command; it is the command of a Saviour, yea, of a dying Saviour; it is the command of love; it is such a command, as, if we duly observe, will be a blessed means to enable us to observe all the commands of God better. Lastly, It is such a command, as whoever lives in the wilful neglect of it, cannot be called a Christian, but will be treated by Christ, at the great day, as an enemy and despiser of his dying love. Learn, 3. That it is a Christian's duty, not barely to do this, but to do it often : frequent communicating is a great duty. The primitive Christians received every Lord's day, yea, it is believed, oftener than every Lord's day. This is agreeable to the nature of the ordinance, which is a spiritual repast, banquet, and feast, and therefore to be received frequently. It is also agreeable to the author of the ordinance ; it is a feast of God's own providing ; therefore to neglect it, is to fly in the face of God ; it is agreeable to the end of the ordinance, which is, to renew our covenant, and that cannot be done too often.

27 Wherefore, whosoever shall eat this bread and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord.

The apostle having, in the foregoing verses, declared the original institution of the Lord's Supper, he comes now to instruct the Corinthians in the right use of it ; and, to excite them to a due regard in their approaches to it, he acquaints them with the great danger of an unworthy receiving of it ; " Whosoever shall eat this bread, &c. unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." Ques. 1. What is it not to eat and drink unworthily ? Ans. 1. To receive the sacrament with many doubts and fears, with a weak faith, with a trembling hand, and fearful heart, all this may be, and yet the person not receive unworthily. 2. The want of perfect holiness, and a complete freedom from sin, doth not denominate a person an unworthy receiver ; for this ordinance was not instituted for angels, but for men ; to make sinful men good, and good men better. 3. Backwardness to the duty, deadness and dulness in the duty, when involuntary and lamented, makes not a person an unworthy receiver. Ques. 2. What is it not to eat and drink unworthily ? Ans. 1. It is to receive out of custom, not out of conscience : for company's sake, not for the command's sake ; because the law of man enjoins it, not because the law of Christ requires it. 2. It is to receive, without such a disposition of mind, such a preparation of heart, such reverence and devotion, as ought therein to be exercised ; to receive without knowledge, without repentance, without faith, without resolutions, for a sincere obedience, without sincere reconciliation to our neighbour. Ques. 3. What is it to be guilty of the body and blood of our Lord ? Ans. 1. It is an implicit approbation of the Jews' act in crucifying Christ. 2. It is implicitly a jesting with the body and blood of Christ, a playing with the most tremendous things in the world. 3. It is a crucifying the Son of God a fresh ; it is to stab the master of the feast at his own table, whilst he is treating us with the richest dainties.

28 But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup.

Observe here, The duty required to prevent the danger of unworthy receiving, and that is the great and necessary duty of examination. A metaphor taken from goldsmiths, who try the truth of their gold by the touchstone, the purity of their gold by the fire, the weight of it by the scale. Observe, 2. The examinant, or person performing this duty of examination. Let a man, that is, let every man. This stands in a double opposition, 1. To our examining of others. 2. To our resting in another's examination of us. Observe, 3. The frequency of this act ; as often as we partake of the ordinance, so oft we should, if we have time, less or more, examine ourselves. Let him examine, and so let him eat : Let him pass through one duty to another. Learn hence, That it is the special duty, and ought to be the singular care and endeavour, of all those that desire safely and comfortably to approach the table of the Lord, to examine themselves before they come ; to examine their right unto it, and to examine their fitness for it.

29 For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body.

What it is to eat and drink unworthily, we find explained before at ver. 27. Note here, farther, That many persons of honest hearts, but weak heads, have sadly misunderstood the words of St. Paul, about unworthy receiving, thinking that such an excess of reverence and preparation is required, that either they dare not come at all, or they come with so much dread and fear upon their minds, that they are more terrified than comforted. Observe farther, The unworthy person eats and drinks judgment ; that is, temporal judgment will follow him in this life ; and without repentance, eternal damnation in the next. Yet note, It is judgment to himself that receives ; not to another that receives with him. If a wicked man's presence at the sacrament pollutes the ordinance to a worthy receiver, then Christ and his eleven apostles were defiled by the company of Judas at the passover ; for at that he certainly was, and, as many think, at the Lord's Supper also. Learn thence, that unworthy receivers of the Lord's Supper do contract great guilt, and incur great danger to themselves. The design of the apostle in these two last verses, is this, that we should not sinfully omit the duty, because of the command ; nor carelessly undertake it, because of the threatened judgment.

30 For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.

For this cause : That is, for profaning the sacrament, and not discerning the Lord's body at the Lord's table ; for not approaching it as a feast of love designed equally for the benefit of all his members, and to knit them in the closest bonds of unity and friendship each to the other : Therefore it was, that many were visited with sickness and weakness, and some with death ; which being called sleep, some have charitably concluded from thence, that they were pious persons in the main ; for the death of the wicked is hardly called sleep any where in scripture ; and if so, then we learn, that the holiness of an ordinance, or the habitual holiness of any person who approaches an ordinance, will not exempt from God's displeasure, and the infliction of temporal judgments here in this life, if they do not by actual preparation sanctify the name of God in the duties and ordinances of his worship. Besides an habitual, there is required an actual preparation in all those that will safely and comfortably approach to God in holy duties; without it, we shall meet with a blow instead of a blessing.

31 For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged.

That is, "If we would examine, try, censure, and sentence ourselves, and so come to the Lord's table, as penitent believers, with a purity of aim, and a sincere intention, we should thereby escape the castigatory punishments, and condemnatory sentence of God." Learn hence, That as it is our duty often to examine and judge ourselves, so self-judging in particular, before we approach the Lord's table, will preserve us from the judgment and condemnation of God; we must first summon, then examine, then convict and try, then sentence and condemn ourselves; and all this in hopes of being absolved and acquitted by God, acting our faith upon his free mercy, and the Redeemer's satisfaction.

32 But when we are judged we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world.

Observe here, 1. The nature of those judgments, or afflictive evils, which do befall the children of God in this life; they are chastenings; we are chastened of the Lord. Chastenings belong properly to children who are wanton and ungovernable. To be chastened has a double aspect; first upon our privilege, it denotes our relation as children unto God our Father. Chastenings are a part of his children's portion; yet, in that we are chastened, it tasks us with weakness; we are foolish, wanton, and unruly children, and therefore so long as we are here, must always go with a rod at our backs. Christ, who was also a son, was chastened. The chastisement of our peace was upon him; but his were judiciary chastisements; God did not chastise him as a child, but as an enemy, as a malefactor, in our stead; as we must have been chastened, who were enemies and malefactors. Our chastenings are fatherly, Christ's judiciary. Observe, 2. The merciful design of God in the chastenings of his children; it is to prevent their condemnation; We are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned of the world. When therefore at any time we are under chastisement, in all we say or do, let us justify God, and condemn ourselves, seeing his chastisements are designed to prevent our condemnation.

33 Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another.

34 And if any man hunger, let him eat at home; that ye come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come.

Our apostle here concludes his discourse with an exhortation to the Corinthians, to take heed for time to come, that all these forementioned miscarriages may be rectified; that when they come together to eat the Lord's Supper, and the love feasts, they should tarry one for another, that they may all feed and feast together. And if any man pretend to be hungry, let him eat at home before he comes, lest by these irreverent actions he bring down the judgments of God upon himself. Lastly, He tells them, that as to other points of church order, he would determine them when he came among them: The rest will I set in order when I come; Such unchristian disorders may arise in the church, as will require the presence and coming of an apostle to correct and reform them.

CHAP. XII.

NOW, concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant.

Our apostle begins this chapter with the resolution of another case concerning the nature and right use of spiritual gifts. Some that excelled in them, were proud of them, using them to vain ostentation: he therefore tells them, he would not have them ignorant as touching spiritual gifts; not ignorant either of their author from whence they came, the holy Spirit of God; nor of their end and use, which is the benefit and edification of others. Gifts are for the good of others, but a man shall have the advantage and comforts of his own graces: Gifts are the gold which adorns the temple, but grace is the altar which sanctifies the gold. Lord! how many have gone laden with gifts to hell? how many have prophesied in thy name, and yet perished in thy wrath? how many cast devils out of others, who yet were cast to the devils themselves? how many wrought miracles, and did many wonderful works, who yet perished for evil workers? Lord! let me never build upon this bottom (gifts) for eternity: these may make me glorious in the eyes of men, but grace renders me precious in the sight of God.

2 Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle reminds the Corinthians of what they were in their Heathenish state; namely, idolatrous Gentiles, serving dumb idols; for though the devil sometimes spake in and by the idols, yet the idols themselves had mouths and spake not; and they were carried away unto these dumb idols, even as they were led; that is, as they were led by their idolatrous priests, who had nothing of this divine Spirit among them, which they, since their conversion from Gentilism to Christianity, had been made partakers of. Now from this description of idolaters, that they serve and worship dumb idols, we learn, What an absurd and unreasonable sin idolatry is; the worshipper is better than the God he worships; reasonable men worship unreasonable creatures; sensible men adore senseless stocks and stones; and they who can speak, invoke and call upon dumb idols, that can neither speak nor hear. And yet how prone is the nature of man to idolatry and false worship; partly because it is a worship of our own invention, and we are fond of what of is our own finding out, and setting up; and partly because it is external, and pompous, it courts the outward senses with glittering appearances; and men do naturally love and chuse that for the object of their worship which may be seen, rather than that which is to be believed.

As they walk by sight, and not by faith, so do they worship too: an invisible and unseen being is neither the object of their adoration, nor election and choice.

3 Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God, calleth Jesus accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

The great difference that was then in the world, was about Jesus: Those that were led away by dumb idols, were taught by Satan to blaspheme, and say, upon the mention of our Saviour's name, Jesus Anathema, Jesus Anathema: that is, let Jesus be Anathema, accursed, detested, and destroyed, as the common odium of their gods. Now, when the apostle says, such speak not by the Spirit of God, his meaning is, that they did it by the impulse and instinct of the devil, by the actings and instigation of the evil spirit, which ruled in those children of disobedience; on the other side, every one that believeth, calleth Jesus Lord, and professeth faith in him. Now, none, says the apostle, can do this but by the Holy Ghost, that is, by his help and assistance. But it may be said, we read in scripture of many who were accursed by the unclean spirit, that yet called Jesus Lord, Mark ii. 23. Acts xvi. 17. Ans. These acknowledgments of Christ to be Lord, were either wrested from the devil, and were a considerable part of his torment, or were over ruled by God to advance the glory of Christ. But, 2. The apostle here speaks of such a calling Jesus Lord, as is accompanied with faith in him, and subjection to him. There is a double saying that Jesus is Lord; the one verbal, one tenus, with lip and tongue only, without the consent of the heart, or obedience of the life; the other actual, when we do with our whole souls own and acknowledge him, love and embrace him, obey and serve him as Lord, and vote for his government and dominion over us. No man thus called Jesus Lord, but by the Holy Ghost renewing and sanctifying him, assisting and enabling him so to do.

4 Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit.

5 And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord.

6 And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all.

That is, there is a great variety and diversity of spiritual gifts, but it is the same Spirit from whence they all proceed and flow; and there are different administrations and offices in the church, but it is the same Lord who hath appointed all these offices. And there are diversities of operations performed by these officers in the church, but it is the same God who worketh in them all. Here gifts are ascribed to the Holy Ghost, administrations to the Lord Christ, and operations to God the Father; but in all these, there are great diversities both of kinds and degrees; they differ in the nature, extent, and use. Thus it is with reference to spiritual gifts; but in the case of sanctifying graces, it is far otherwise; these are all bestowed jointly, or not at all; God cannot give humility to one, purity to another, charity alone to a third, because there is such an inseparable union and alliance among the graces of the Spirit (a concatenation of graces, as some call it) that where one really is, there all the rest must be. Hence probably it is, why the whole of religion is sometimes expressed by one particular duty of it, sometimes by faith, sometimes by hope, sometimes by repentance, sometimes by charity; because the combination of these saving graces is such, that the mentioning of one implies and includes all the rest.

7 But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.

8 For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit;

9 To another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit;

10 To another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another diverse kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues:

11 But all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will.

Observe here, How the apostle enumerates and reckons up the several sorts and kinds of spiritual gifts, which were at that time plentifully poured forth upon the ministers and members of the church of Christ, which begat astonishment and admiration; and of these extraordinary gifts, our apostle reckons up nine sorts or kinds, which were found in the primitive church in his days, as they here follow: 1. One had the word of wisdom; that is, the revelation of the gospel, which is called the manifold wisdom of God; This was the gift of the apostles; to whom extraordinary measures of divine wisdom were first given, to reveal the mysteries of the gospel to the Pagan world. 2. Another had the word of knowledge; that is, a special ability to interpret the mystical senses and veiled meanings of the scripture, and also to foretel remote and future things. Thus St. Paul told the centurion before the shipwreck, that not a man in the ship should be lost, Acts xxvii. and Agabus foretold the famine, and St. Paul's imprisonment, Acts xi. 3. To another faith, by which some understand supernatural courage and confidence, with which God did endow them, when he called to extraordinary sufferings and services; accordingly, we read in the Acts of the Apostles, with what invincible courage and resolution poor men appeared before the Jewish and Heathen tribunals, and with what astonishing presence, both of body and mind, they bore the name of Jesus before the kings and people of the earth! Others by faith here, understand a miraculous faith, that is, a supernatural confidence; and firm assurance, wrought by the holy Spirit in the minds of some, in the apostle's time, by which they were certain, that they could do such and such a miracle before they undertook to do it; and the greatest apostle durst never undertake to do a miracle, but when he was assured by the Spirit that he could do it; and, indeed, it was requisite for Almighty God, by some secret preceding impression of mind, to let the teachers of the gospel know when he would assist them in working miracles, lest they should attempt to work when they could not, and so discredit Christ's doctrines, their own authority, and dishonour the name of God; and therefore it is observable, That the gift of faith here, is set immediately before the gift of healing, and working miracles, because it consisted in an antecedent impulse to both. 4. The next miraculous gift, is the gift of healing: that is, a power of curing all diseases, both of body and mind, without the help of physic, through the name alone of Jesus Christ. 5. The gift of miracles, under which is comprehended the power of silencing and casting out devils, inflicting diseases and death on the bodies of incorrigible sinners, as on Elymas and Ananias: also the more wonderful power in raising the dead. 6. The gift of prophecy; that is, 1. The prediction or foreknowledge of things to come. Thus Agabus foretold by the Spirit a famine, Acts xi. and this gift was sometimes exercised by foretelling who would be fit persons to do God service in the church; 1. Tim. i. 18. and chap. iv. 14 "According to the foregoing prophecies concerning thee, neglect not the gift that was given thee by prophecy." 2. Others, by prophecy, understand preaching and expounding scriptures by divine inspiration, praising God by inspired hymns and psalms, and also praying unto him in public assemblies by inspired prayers; for in the apostle's time, there was a miraculous gift of preaching, praying, and singing, in which the Spirit did, in an extraordinary manner, assist some persons, which, with other extraordinary gifts, is long since ceased. 7. The gift of discerning of spirits; that is, either, first, a power of quick and sure discerning, whether men, pretending to the Spirit, spake from God, or not; or a supernatural sagacity to discern between the impulses of satanical spirits, and divinely inspired persons. Or, secondly, A spirit of discerning, whether such or such persons be best qualified for such an office in the church, and accordingly, chusing them out for that work. Thus, Acts xiii. 2. 3. the Holy Spirit in the prophet, said, Separate me Barnabas and Saul, for the work to which I have called them. Or, lastly, By this power of discerning spirits, the apostles could tell very much of the inward purposes of men's hearts and thoughts; so Peter discerned the heart of Ananias, and the thoughts of Simon Magus. 8. The gift of tongues, that is, an ability to speak divers kinds of languages, unlearned and untaught. To which was added, 9. The gift of interpreting those languages; for these two gifts did not always go together: Some could speak divers languages, that could not interpret them; others could interpret them that could not speak them; For, say some, the gift of strange tongues was usually accompanied with such strong raptures, that the person affected, could not use his understanding in an ordinary way, so as to interpret and explain his own inspirations in the audience to which he spoke; which was the reason why the Spirit did usually reveal to others, who stood by, and understood not the inspired languages, the matter which was spoken. Thus are the extraordinary and miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit enumerated by the apostle, which were bestowed upon the primitive church, whose infant state required all this extraordinary assistance: but as the church grew up, Almighty God, like a wise nurse, weaned her by degrees from these miraculous gifts, till at last, arrived at her full stature, he left her, as parents leave their children when grown to be men, to subsist without these extraordinary helps and supplies.

12 ¶ For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ.

13 For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit.

Here our apostle acquaints us, that the intent and design of God, in giving these various gifts, was the profit and edification of his church, which he compares to a body that has many members; for though that one Spirit, which distributes the gifts, could have given them all to the same person, yet to maintain a mutual dependence, and a charitable serviceableness of the members, one among another, he gave to one, one gift; to another, another; by which means, one member of the church would be obliged to take care of the rest. Behold here, how the wisdom of God has ordered the state of the church, like that of the natural body, to which the apostle elegantly compares the body of Christ, which is his church: "As the body hath many members, so also has Christ;" that is, the church of Christ. Now, having assured them, that they were indeed members of one body, he tells them what it was that made them so, ver. 13. "For by one Spirit," says he, "we are all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, and have been made to drink into one Spirit;" that is, by being baptized we are all made members of the body of Christ, and united one to another, under him the Head; and this whether we be Jews or Gentiles, bond or free, we are all one in Christ, who by baptism were admitted into his church; And this union of our's, one with another, is testified and declared by our communion at the Lord's table, which is here called, a drinking into one Spirit. And whereas by baptism we are said by one Spirit to be baptized into one body, and at the Lord's Supper, are said to drink into one Spirit; we learn, That the grace of the Holy Spirit was given in baptism and in the Lord's Supper to all the faithful, who do not receive unprofitable signs, but the quickening grace and Spirit of God, to make them living members of that one body.

14 For the body is not one member, but many.

15 If the foot shall say, Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

16 And if the ear shall say, Because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body?

17 If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? if the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?

Our apostle here elegantly compares the state of the mystical body, the church, with that of the natural body: As the natural body is one, so is the mystical body; as the natural body is informed and animated with one spirit or soul, so the mystical body, the church, is animated by one and the same Spirit, received from our spiritual Head, Christ Jesus, and communicated to all the members of his body, to give them life and motion: As the members of the natural body are not alike, but some superior, and others inferior, in excellency, yet all of indispensable use; (for the wise God hath created no member of man's body in vain, but designed all for the mutual help and benefit of one another) in like manner is it in the church, the mystical body; there are different gifts, different offices; some are superior and more excelling in gifts, others are of meaner abilities, yet all conduce to the good of the whole: One of inferior gifts must not account himself useless; (for every one that cannot be excellent may yet be useful) for if so, what would become of the church? Therefore there must be different gifts and offices, for different uses: But every one must employ his gift, and perform his office, according to the nature of it, for the service of the whole. Learn hence, 1. That several men have their several gifts, as it pleaseth the gift-giving Spirit to give unto them. Learn, 2. That such as have the meanest talent, either of gifts or graces, ought not to esteem themselves, or be esteemed by others, as useless or unserviceable; but to employ their talent, though ever so small for the service and benefit of the whole church.

18 But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body as it hath pleased him.

19 And if they were all one member, where were the body?

20 But now are they many members, yet but one body.

21 And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee: nor again, the head to the feet, I have have no need of you.

22 Nay, much more of those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary;

As if the apostle had said, Whereas our wise Creator, who made the body of man, has appointed all the members of that body for divers uses and offices, and also appointed the order in which every member shall stand; that the head shall be uppermost, to guide the body, the foot lowermost, to bear the body: In like manner our gracious Redeemer has appointed to the several members of his church, distinct offices in his church. And as the principal members of the body, the eye and hand, do need the less principal; so the rulers, pastors, and wisest members of the church, do need even those weak and inferior Christians, whom the world makes small account of. The eye, that is, the man of great understanding, cannot say to the hand, the person employed in lesser services, I have no need of you; nor again the head, that is, the person placed in the highest dignity in the church, cannot say to the feet, the person employed in the lowest offices of the church, I have no need of you. Therefore the superior members of the church must not pride it over the inferior, nor the most knowing Christians despise the less knowing, as unuseful and unprofitable, but as fellow-members, jointly endeavour the mutual benefit and advantage of one another.

23 And those members of the body which we think to be less honourable, upon these we bestow more abundant honour; and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness.

24 For our comely parts have no need; but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked:

25 That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another.

26 And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it: or one member be honoured, all the members rejoice with it.

Still our apostle proceeds in that elegant comparison betwixt the members of the body natural and the body mystical; shewing, that as there are some members in the natural body that are less honourable, and some that are more honourable: and whereas we put more abundant honour upon the less honourable members by a decent covering, and modest adorning of them; but upon our comely parts, such as the face, we put no covering, being comely enough of itself, and lacking no artificial beauty: in like manner all the members of the mystical body ought to be instructed, that the meanest offices in the church, and the meanest members of the church, who have least gifts, are as well of that spiritual body, the church, as those that have more excellent offices and gifts: and as the meaner must not envy the more excellent, so neither must the more excellent despise the meaner, but put a due value and respect upon one another. From practising of which duty, a double reason is here assigned: 1. That there may be no schism in the body, but the members have the same care for, and regard to, one another; if the members of the natural body should strive among themselves, the whole body would come to ruin by schism, so great mischief would arise to the church, the mystical body, by divisions and dissensions amongst the particular members of it. 2. Because there ought to be a sympathy between the members of the mystical body, as there is betwixt the members of the natural body. — There is a fellow-feeling with each other, both of joy and grief, in and among the natural members, they all rejoice, and mourn with one another; if one member be pinched, the whole body is pained. Thus all the mystical members of Christ's body the church, ought to have the same common interests, the same common concern, the same common care, and the same mutual sympathy with each other, both in weal and woe.

27 Now ye are the body of Christ and members in particular.

Our apostle having thus finished his elegant and excellent comparison between the members of the natural, and those of the mystical body; he comes now to make a particular and close application of it to the believing Corinthians, whom he acknowledges to be a part of the mystical body of Christ; and that it is their duty to carry themselves towards their fellow members, as the members of the body natural do towards each other, who are ever more solicitous for the good of one another. Now, says he, "ye are the members of Christ:" as if he had said, Thus must it be with you who are the several members of Christ's church, which is his body. From the whole of this comparison, with the apostle's application of it, we learn, 1. That as there can be no natural body without divers members, so no mystical body without diversity of gifts and offices. 2. That as the most inferior members of the natural body are as truly members as the most noble, and as necessary and serviceable to the body as the other; so are inferior Christians as much the members of Christ's body, and in their place as useful and necessary as other members of the church, which are more excelling in spiritual gifts. Learn, 3. That as all the members of the natural body are placed and disposed according to the wisdom and pleasure of Almighty God; in like manner, the members of Christ's mystical body, are, by the unerring wisdom of God placed in that station and condition in the church, in which he has set them, and accordingly, they ought to be satisfied with it, and endeavour to be useful in it. Learn, 4. That as there is no division in the members of the natural body, but all the members take care of, and are employed for the good of the whole: so ought matters to be managed in the body mystical, that there be no divisions, nor separate interests in it, but they should mutually regard the common interest of one another, sympathizing, sorrowing, and rejoicing together. O happy day! when the interest of all parties, and private concerns; shall give place to public interest.

28 And God hath set some in the church, first, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that miracles; then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues.

Our apostle having, in the beginning of the chapter, reckoned up the divers gifts, which God had variously bestowed upon the church, here, in the close of the chapter, he reckons up the particular officers that he thought fit to place in his church. 1. Apostles: persons sent forth immediately by Christ to lay the foundation of Christian churches, and upon whom the care of all the churches lay. 2. Prophets: or persons immediately inspired with the knowledge of future things. 3. Teachers; such as labour in the word and doctrine, either as itinerary preachers, going from place to place, or as settled fixed ministers in the church, expounding the scriptures to the people. 4. Miracles; that is, some persons endued with an extraordinary power to work miracles for convincing infidels, and confirming believers. 5. Gifts of healing; such persons as had a power conferred upon them to heal diseases, without the help of physic in an extraordinary way. 6. Helps; deacons, which took care of the poor, and assisted the church in the distribution of her charity: and consisted in holy things, particularly in baptizing and administering the Lord's Supper. 7. Governments; the rulers of the church and spiritual guides. 8. Diversities of tongues; that is, persons enabled to speak divers languages, in order to the farther spreading of the gospel, without the help of an interpreter. Behold here the wisdom of God in this various distribution of gifts and offices in his church; all which, as they are designed by him, so ought they to be managed by her, for the general good of the whole, without either pride or haughtiness on the one hand, or envy and emulation on the other.

29 Are all apostles? are all prophets? are all teachers? are all workers of miracles?

30 Have all the gifts of healing? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret?

The force of the apostle's arguments lies thus: As the natural body, to which he had before alluded, cannot be all eye, nor all ear, nor all hand, nor foot; in like manner, in the mystical body, the church, all cannot govern, prophecy, teach, work miracles, heal diseases; but one has this gift, and another that; one has the office in the church, and another that; all which are to be employed and improved for the common good of the church, and mutual benefit of each other.

31 But covet earnestly the best gifts: And yet shew I unto you a more excellent way.

He concludes the chapter with this advice, that they covet and desire the best; that is, the most useful and excellent gifts, the most beneficial and edifying gifts, such as are most advantageous to the church; yet without intimating to them, that though there be an excellency in gifts, yet there is a greater excellency in grace, particularly in the grace of love. Charity or love to God and our neighbour, is more excellent than a load of gifts, though very extraordinary, though supernatural and miraculous. "Yet shew I unto you a more excellent way." That is a more excellent way of ministering to the welfare of the church, and of edifying your own souls, even by true Christian love one towards another. Learn hence, That as the sanctifying graces of the holy Spirit are far more excellent than the miraculous and extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, so it is the Christian's duty to be much more covetous and desirous of them; for when gifts vanish away, the habits of grace shall never fail, but abide for ever, particularly the grace of love, which shall not only accompany us to heaven, but in heaven ; where, from a small and little spark, it shall be improved into a seraphic and never failing flame.

CHAP. XIII.

Our apostle had, in the foregoing chapter, very copiously set forth the nature, the excellency, and usefulness of those gifts, which were found amongst the ministers and members of the church at Corinth, in his time. Now, lest they should trust too much to any of the forementioned gifts, either of tongues or miracles, which, alas ! a man may have, and perish eternally ; he proceeds in this chapter, to set forth the transcendent excellency of the graces of the Holy Spirit, above the most exalted and admired gifts ; and in particular, the superlative excellency of the grace of charity, that is, the unfeigned love of God and our neighbour, which is the noble subject of this chapter now before us.

THOUGH I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

Here our apostle begins a comparison between gifts and graces, and shews how much more excelling and desirable the saving graces of the Spirit are, than all those pompous and miraculous gifts, in which there is no real excellency, and nothing for which we should desire them, but only upon the score of usefulness and serviceableness to the church : And he instances first in the gift of tongues : Though I speak with the tongues of men and angels ; that is, though I had the gift of tongues, or speaking divers languages in the highest measure, and most exalted degree ; could I preach and pray like an angel, discourse and talk beyond the rate of any mortal man, and have not the grace of love and charity, alas ! what is all this to God, who is not taken with a noisy sound, as children are with a musical instrument ? Behold here, that the tongues of men or angels could have said nothing more plain or emphatical, to shew how much more excellent the saving graces of the spirit are than miraculous gifts, which commend us not to God, render us not like God, nor any ways qualify us for the enjoyment of him, giving us no intrinsic worth, or inherent excellency. They only proclaim God's goodness towards us, but are no ways evidential of any goodness in us towards him. Gifts are like the gold which adorns the temple, but grace is like the altar which sanctifies the gold.

2 And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge ; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have no charity, I am nothing.

Farther, Suppose I had the spirit of prophecy, and could speak, by inspiration, of things present, and things to come, and could understand deep and difficult points in God's word and works, what is this more than Balaam had ? And suppose I have all faith, that is, the highest degree of miraculous faith, so that I could remove mountains, yet this severed from charity, or the predominant love of God and our neighbour, is all nothing. And I am nothing, that is, nothing worth in the sight of God. Observe here, that miraculous faith may be severed from charity, but justifying faith cannot, which always worketh by love ; and wherever that grace is found, it gives value and acceptance to all other graces. Faith without charity, is but a dead assent ; hope without charity is but like a tympany, the bigger it grows the more dangerous it proves ; and the more desusive alms-giving, without love, is but a sacrifice to vanity.

3 And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

Observe here, 1. That alms may be given without true love to God, or our neighbour, for God's sake ; they may be given out of mere natural pity to the poor, out of a desire to be well thought of, and well spoken of by men, out of an opinion of merit, and obliging God, or from some other cause, which includes not love either to God or man ; and wherever they are thus given, they profit nothing to salvation. The Greek word for feeding the poor here, signifies to divide victuals in several pieces, and so distribute it amongst the poor. Lord ! what a consideration is this, that a man may do all the external works of mercy, even the highest and most transcendent works, and yet want true love to God and his neighbour. Observe, 2. That as alms may be given, so martyrdom may be undergone without charity, If I give my body to be burned ; that is, If I have so much fortitude and courage as to lay down my life for Christ and his truth, which is such an high expression of my obedience to him, as angels are not capable of performing, yet without charity, burning is but a vain glorious blaze ; and instead of sealing the truth with our blood, we seal but our own shame and folly. Observe, 3. The apostle says not, if I be burnt, persecuted, and put to death by others ; but if I give myself to be burned, if I voluntarily and freely offer up myself, not to imprisonment only, but to death itself, yea to the most terrible kind of death, burning ; yet if all this be not from a right principle, and sincere end, if all this be without true love to God and his glory, church and truth, it will avail nothing to salvation. Learn hence, That no kind of external sufferings, though ever so grievous, either for the truth of Christ indeed, or for that which a man's conscience judges to be the truth of Christ, is a sure and infallible sign of a gracious state ; a man may suffer for truth, but not for truth's sake, only for interest's sake ; he may suffer from a natural strength and stoutness of Spirit, and not from a spiritual fortitude wrought in him by the Spirit of God. Ah, Lord ! how miserable is it to be burnt with fire here for Christ, and to hear him say afterwards, Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire ! It is indeed a great matter to suffer for Christ, but it is much greater to suffer with such a disposition of heart as Christ requires.

4 ¶ Charity suffereth long, and is kind ; charity envieth not ; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.

Here the apostle enters upon the description and commendation of the grace and duty of charity, and declares several excellent effects and properties of it, namely, It suffereth long ; and is kind ; that is, the charitable man is kind to all, patient to all ; he can bear injuries and reproaches very long, without either desiring or endeavouring to revenge them. It envieth not ; that is, he envieth neither the power, nor profit, nor preferment, nor applause, nor precedence of any man ; but is well pleased with the happiness of every man, and laments their misfortunes. Charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up ; that is, it suppresses all self-applauding and admiring thoughts, all arrogance in assuming to ourselves, and undervaluing of others.

5 Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil ;

That is, charity, or true love to our neighbour, will restrain us from all uncomely deportment towards him ; it will not suffer us to do an ill or indecent thing to any one ; it breaks not forth into violent and ungovernable passions upon any provocations, how just soever, how great soever. Seeketh not her own ; that is, her own praise, profit, or pleasure ; it seeketh it not inordinately, it seeketh it not injuriously, either in the neglect of others, or to the hurt of others. Charity is not selfish, but generous. It is not easily provoked ; that is, charity is not provoked readily to think, speak, or act unduly, by small injuries or occasions, but beareth, forbear-eth, and forgiveth. Thinketh no evil ; that is, of any person groundlessly, but construes and interprets every thing in the best sense ; for lightly to take up an evil report of our neighbour, to think or suspect, much more to believe and report any evil of him, without sufficient evidence against him, is a violation of the royal law of charity.

6 Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth ;

Charity rejoices not in any evil done, either, 1. By ourselves in the commission, or after contemplation of it ; or, 2. By others. Lord ! how sad is it when it becomes matter of mirth and sport, to see another stab at once the Christian name, and his own soul ! Or, 3. It rejoices not in any evil done to others ; charity suffers no man to be pleased or delighted with any deceit or falsehood spoken of, or done to others, or with any ill stories, or malicious insinuations concerning them, or in any calamity befalling them. But rejoiceth in the truth ; that is, 1. Charity is so far from rejoicing, either in the falls or misfortunes of others, that it rejoices when the truth and innocency, the righteousness and equity, of any person or cause is made evident and manifest : A good man rejoices when he sees any suspected for, or charged with iniquity, upon due examination, cleared and acquitted. Or, 2. Rejoiceth in the truth ; that is, in men's loving truth, doing justly, and living righteously, according to the rule of truth, the gospel. Oh ! what a complacency and inward pleasure doth it beget in a good man's mind, when he beholds truth and righteousness, piety and goodness, prevailing in the world !

7 Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

Charity or love has strong shoulders to bear wrongs and injuries with patience, though very hard and grievous to be borne ; without returning evil for evil, it will enable us to forbear one another in love, and not cease to be kind, notwithstanding provocations. Believeth all things ; that is, charity inclines a man to believe the best of his neighbour, till the contrary appears ; it interprets every thing in the best sense, and makes the fairest construction of every man's case and condition : Not that the charitable man is the credulous man, and can believe whatever he pleases ; but he believeth all things, so far as either reality or probability, so far as truth, or appearance of truth, will encourage him to do it. A charitable man is very willing to believe that things are, meant as they are spoken, and intended as they are done. Oh ! how uncharitable then, and unjust are they, who believe all is ill, when they know nothing ill ; and think and speak ill of them, in whom they never say any thing but what was good ! It is not sufficient that we do not judge our neighbour maliciously, but we must not judge him ignorantly ; it is an injurious and unworthy jealousy, when a person's actions are fair, to suspect his intentions. Hopeth all things ; that is, it is the genius of charity and the character of love, to hope the best of persons and things, so far as there is any ground of hope ; yea, though they carry in them some cause and colour of suspicion : It inclines us still to hope the best concerning men's intentions and actions ; and if our brother be bad at present, not to despair of his amendment, but endeavour his reformation, by all proper means. Endureth all things ; that is, it puts up wrongs and injuries, without desiring, much less endeavouring to revenge them ; it causes us to endure provocation with much patience, and extinguishes all inclinations to revenge. Some will conceal their anger, but seek revenge ; their malice is like slow poison, that does not discover violent symptoms, but destroys life insensibly : Others have such fierce passions, that they strike fire out of the least provocations ; they inflame their resentments, by considering every circumstance that will exasperate their spirits ; But charity beareth all things, endureth all things.

8 Charity never faileth : but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail ; whether there be tongues, they shall cease ; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away.

9 For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

Charity never faileth. Holy love is an everlasting quality and employment ; it shall not fail at death, as other graces do, but be perfected at death : Repentance should accompany us to the gates of heaven, but repentance ceases for ever in heaven; for no need of repentance where there is entire innocence; faith is swallowed up in vision, and hope in fruition: but love is then and there in its exaltation. Thus charity never faileth, but all other gifts will fail: prophesying, languages, sciences, and all artificial knowledge, will cease for ever; knowledge itself in heaven shall vanish away: But how vanish? the meaning is, that such knowledge as we have now, shall vanish then; that imperfect knowledge we have now, will cease, and beuseless then; our present knowledge is attained with much labour and study, but it shall be no more difficult to know in heaven than it is for the eye to open and see: The beautiful face of truth shall in a moment be unveiled to us in heaven, and the curtain drawn away by the hand of God, which interposed between us and the light. Again, knowledge of so imperfect a degree, as now it is of, shall vanish away: Here we know what we know by divine revelation, but in part; and we prophecy by inspiration but in part.

10 But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

As the imperfect twilight is done away by the opening of the perfect day: so at death, when that which is perfect takes place, then that which was imperfect shall be done away. Blessed be God for the hopes of that blessed place and state where all imperfection shall cease, especially the imperfection of our knowledge. Alas! here all that we know, either of the word or works of God, is but a part, a little part; and blessed be God that this perfect state doth not succeed the imperfect one, after a long interval (at the resurrection and re-union of the body) but the imperfect state of the soul immediately is done away by the coming of the perfect one; the glass is laid by as useless, when we come to see face to face, and eye to eye. Oh happy and vast difference between the Christian's present and future state! True, he now begins to know, he knows in part here; but verily, what here he knows, is little of that he should know, little of that he might know, little of that others know, little of that he desires to know, and little of that he shall know, when he comes to heaven: then all imperfections shall be done away, when that which is perfect is come.

11 When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

Here the apostle compares the Christian's imperfect state of knowledge and holiness in this life, to a state of childhood, his perfect state of holiness and happiness in heaven, to a state of manhood. As a child conceives, thinks, and speaks of things suitable to his childish state; but when he comes to manly perfection, and to the full use and exercise of his reason, he then puts away childish conceptions and things: Thus it is with the best of us in this life; like children we conceive and think, we discourse and speak of spiritual things in a confused and imperfect manner; but when we arrive at our state of manly perfection in heaven, we shall have knowledge and all other graces perfected. Learn hence, That Christians must stay for perfect knowledge, till they come to maturity and ripeness of age; children must not expect to know, what men know: Solomon's knowledge on earth, so famously celebrated, will be but ignorance, compared with the knowledge and enlargements which the saints have in heaven; there, in natural things they shall be exact philosophers, in spiritual things complete divines; all dark scriptures shall be clear to them, all the knotty intrigues of providence wisely resolved; in a word, there they shall know God himself perfectly, though they can never know him to perfection.

12 For now we see through a glass, darkly: but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

As if the apostle had said, Now in our minority we see divine revelations, as the prophets did of old in a dark enigmatical manner, and by symbolical representations of things upon the fancy, as in a glass; but then in the adult state of the church we shall see them after the Mosaical manner, in a way more accommodate to human nature, and as it were face to face; we shall see clearly immediately: not by reflection, but by intuition. These adverbs, now and then, distinguish the twofold state of gracious souls; and shew what they are whilst confined to the body, and what they shall be when emancipated and freed from the body, that clog of mortality which now hangs upon them. Observe here, 1. That our imperfect knowledge of God is set forth by seeing in a glass, because it is a weak and imperfect vision; a glass gives but a weak and languid representation of the face that is seen in it; and because it is a vanishing and transient vision, a man having looked in a glass, presently forgets what he saw there; and because it is no immediate sight, but mediante speculo, by the glass of his word and ordinances we see and understand something of God's nature and will; though after all our searchings here to find out what God is, we rather know what he is not, than are able to declare what he is. Observe, 2. That such as have seen God here, as in a glass, in the glass of his ordinances and providences, in the glass of his word and works, shall see him face to face, and fix their eye upon him in heaven to all eternity: When once the pious soul is unsheathed from the body, it glisters gloriously: as soon as the cage is open, this bird soars aloft, and sings melodiously. It is death's office to beat down the partition-wall, a gross earthly body; and then the glorified soul shall have a clear and perfect vision, an immediate and possessive vision, a satisfying and soul-transforming vision, a permanent and eternal vision of the holy and blessed God, which the apostle here calls seeing face to face. Observe, 3. How St. Paul, in the latter words of the verse, gives us a plainer expression of that which before he had spoken more darkly and obscurely: Now I know in part, but then I shall know even as I am known. Where note, How the apostle changes the person; before it was, we see through a glass darkly; here it is, I know in part. He had included himself before, in the word we; but he doth it more apparently in saying I. Now I know in part. When so great an apostle acknowledges the imperfection of his knowledge, who can, who dare, boast of the largeness of his understanding? Note farther, The apostle's saying, Now I know, intimates, that he had begun his acquaintance with God here, which he expected should be improved and Perfected in heaven: he that knows not God in part here, shall never know him face to face in glory: Heaven is a place of perfection indeed; but nothing is perfected there, that was not begun here; no knowledge, no holiness will be consummated there, which did not commence and begin here. Observe, 4. When the apostle says, We shall know even as we are known; he means that we shall know God as really and truly, though not so fully and comprehensibly as he knows us; we shall know him in his nature and attributes; then and there will his wonderful clemency be sweetly displayed, his exact justice visibly demonstrated, his perfect wisdom clearly unfolded, all the knotty intrigues of providence wisely resolved, all the mysterious depths of divine counsels fully discovered, to the delightful satisfaction of the admiring and adoring soul, who shall then see as it is seen, and know as it is known.

13 And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

The design of the apostle in these words is, 1. To inform the Corinthians, that the sanctifying graces of faith, hope, and charity, are far to be preferred before all the forementioned extraordinary gifts of prophecy, miracles, tongues; healing the sick, and raising the dead, not excepted. The least degree of sanctifying grace from the Holy Spirit, is to be preferred, with respect of ourselves, before the largest measures of extraordinary gifts, which are wholly for the good and benefit of others. 2. As our apostle had compared gifts and graces together before, so he compares graces amongst themselves now. Faith, hope, and charity, are set in competition, and the preference given to the last: partly with respect to its present excellency, for charity is the end to which faith and hope are but the means; and partly with respect to its future duration; faith and hope will vanish with this life: Faith will end in sight, and hope in enjoyment; but charity will never be out-dated, but last and flourish when we come to heaven, and be a special ingredient in, and a considerable part of, our happiness there, which consists in the rapturous contemplation of divine love, in loving, praising, admiring, and adoring God, our great Creator, and in loving all whom he loves, and that eternally. Learn, 1. That faith, hope, and love, are abiding graces; they do and must keep house, not only in the church militant in general, but in the soul of every member of the church-militant in particular. Learn 2. That of all those graces, charity is the greatest and most excellent. 1. In regard of its extent, reaching to God, angels and men. 2. In regard of its use, extending to the good of others; whereas faith and hope are particular and private graces. 3. In regard of perfection, as rendering us more like to God. 4. In regard of duration; farewell faith and hope, when we come to heaven; but welcome love: Therefore, the greatest of these is charity.

CHAP. XIV.

Our apostle having in the twelfth chapter acquainted the Corinthians with the wonderful diversity and disparity of spiritual gifts, which the wisdom of God saw then fit to be-slow upon the church, for the propagation and confirmation of Christianity, and farther declared, that the intent and design of them was no other than the common and universal good; in the thirteenth chapter he recommends to them, and admirably decyphers before them, that great and noble grace of charity, which will render us eminent and useful in the world, which sets off all other gifts and endowments whatsoever, and directs us how to manage them to the best advantages. And here he begins his fourteenth chapter, now before us, with a persuasive to follow and pursue so incomparable a grace and virtue, with the utmost eagerness and vigour, and not to give over till we have perfectly attained it; for thus he speaks:

FOLLOW after charity, and desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy.

Observe here, 1. The apostle propounds to the Corinthians a threefold object, charity, spiritual gifts, and prophecy; charity has the precedency and pre-eminency; the apostle not only prefers it before all other gifts, but before the most useful and excellent graces, even faith and hope; for service and benefit to the church of God it exceeds them all. Next he mentions spiritual gifts, such were the gift of tongues, the gift of miracles, the gift of healing, and lastly, prophecy: by which we are to understand an ordinary set course of preaching, interpreting, and opening the holy scriptures, which contain a revelation of God's mind and will. Observe, 2. A threefold act recommended, answerable to a threefold objection propounded. An act of prosecution; Διωκετε, persecuted and follow after, charity as close as your persecutors pursue and follow after you: It imports a most earnest, vigorous, and vehement pursuit. An act of emulation; Ζηlete, Desire earnestly spiritual gifts. An act of election and choice; Chuse rather that ye may prophesy, or clearly understand the mind of God yourselves, and have an ability to expound and explain it to others; this will bring most glory to God, most profit to his church, and most comfort to yourselves.

2 ¶ For he that speaketh in an unknown tongue, speaketh not unto men, but unto God: for no man understandeth him; howbeit in the Spirit he speaketh mysteries.

3 But he that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort.

Here observe, 1. That the gift of tongues, or speaking divers languages, was greatly valued and much desired by some in the church at that time; probably for this reason, because the apostles were very eminently endowed with this gift, the Holy Ghost descending upon them in the shape of cloven tongues: But yet the gift of prophesy, that is, of understanding and interpreting God's will, was clearly the more valuable and desirable accomplishment; for though speaking with tongues created more admiration, and conciliated greater veneration to the speaker, yet prophesying was by far the more excellent gift, and tended most to the edification of the church: It is far better to do good, than to appear great; that is most valuable and excelling, which is most advantageous and edifying. Observe, 2. How the apostle enters upon a comparison between the gift of speaking in an unknown tongue, and prophesying or speaking plainly to the church's benefit and comfort: He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, that is, in a language not understood, not explained or interpreted, he speaketh not unto men; that is, not to the understanding of men, for none understand him; but to God only, he alone understands him: And though in the Spirit he speaks mysteries, or the deep things of God, yet all this is not to edification, because not understood by the church. Whereas, he that prophesieth, that is, he that intelligibly openeth and applieth the word of God to his auditors in the congregation, what he speaks conduces exceedingly to their edification and consolation. Here note, That the apostle not only dislikes, but plainly forbids preaching, praying, and all other offices, being performed in the church in a language not understood: So that the practice of the church of Rome in their Latin prayers, is a flat contradiction to this whole chapter, and to the practice of the primitive church, Acts, iv. 24, who lifted up their voice with one accord, and offered up a reasonable service to God: the prayers of the Jewish church were made in the Hebrew tongue; and God gave the gift of tongues to the Christian church, that the apostles might establish the worship of God in every nation, in their own language.

4 He that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church.

5 I would that ye all spake with tongues but rather that ye prophesied; for greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues, except he interpret, that the church may receive edifying.

6 Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine?

Observe here, 1. Another argument used by the apostle, to prove the gift of prophesying, that is, of interpreting the holy scripture, to be far more excellent than the gift of tongues separated from the gift of interpretation: He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, edifies none but himself, because none but himself understands it; but he that teacheth, instructeth, and exhorteth others, edifieth the church, or the whole assembly that he speaks in. Observe, 2. The apostle wishes they all had the gifts of tongues, because they were so very covetous and desirous of them; though, alas! rather for their own ostentation than the church's edification; yet he rather desires with Moses, That all the Lord's people were prophets; that is, directed and assisted by the Spirit of God, to deliver plainly, and persuasively the will of God to men; for he is the greatest in the church, who is most edifying; and he that prophesieth, edifieth more than he that speaketh all languages uninterpreted. Observe, 3. He amplifies this, by instancing in his own person: If I come to you speaking with tongues. As if he had said, I wonder whether what you so admire in others would please you in me: Suppose that I, whom God has eminently endowed with the gift of tongues, should come and speak to you in the Arabian language, what good would it do you? What would you be the wiser or better for me, should I make known to you some revelation which I immediately received from God, or open to you some truth which you knew not before, or urge you to some needful duty, or doctrinally expound to you the matters of faith and obedience recorded in the gospel, if either myself for some interpreter did not make what I say intelligible to you, what will it profit you? To deliver the mind and will of God plainly and persuasively to the church's benefit and edification, is much more acceptable to God, profitable to man, and comfortable to ourselves, than to speak with the tongue of men and angels, in a language not understood, or not heard.

7 And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped?

8 For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle?

9 So likewise you, except ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? For ye shall speak into the air.

Our apostle here proceeds to illustrate his former arguments, by a similitude taken from musical instruments; the one used in peace, to wit, the harp; the other in war, to wit, the trumpet; as they are useless, if by distinction their signification is not perceived; for if a man hears not, or understands not the sound of the harp or trumpet, he cannot prepare himself either for the dance or the battle; so if persons in the church do not speak intelligibly, they will nothing edify; it is like beating the air, all in vain, and to no purpose.

10 There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and none of them is without signification.

11 Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice; I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian: and he that speaketh shall be a barbarian unto me.

12 Even so ye; forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church.

Here the apostle tells them, that there may probably be as many voices or languages in the world, as there are nations; and every nation understands its own language, and commonly no other: Now, says the apostle, if he that has the gift of tongues, speaks to you in a language which ye understand not, will he not be a barbarian unto you? And if you talk to him in a language he understands not, will you not be barbarians unto him? Verily, it will be just as if two men of two different countries should talk to one another, and neither understand a word of each other. He farther adds, that seeing they were so very desirous of the extraordinary gifts of the spirit, they should seek those gifts especially, by which the church may receive edification and advantage; Seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church. Here note, 1. The noble end which St. Paul directs them to propound in what they desire and design, namely, The edifying of the church. The church's edification should be the scope of all her members, especially of all her ministers' wishes and prayers, enterprises, and endeavours: Our first care should be, to lay a right foundation, namely, the doctrine of redemption and salvation, by the meritorious undertaking of Christ Jesus our Lord, the eternal Son of the Father: Our next care, that our superstructure be answerable to our foundation; this being solid and substantial, that must be so too; acquainting persons with the whole will of God, and the whole duty of man: Note, 2. The operation to be performed, and the means to be used, in order to this noble end; Seek that ye may excel; that is, passionately desire and endeavour that you may, by the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, be eminently qualified for edifying and building the church of God: Seek that ye may excel to the edifying of the church. Learn hence, 1. That the edifying of the church, and the improvement of its members in knowledge, faith and holiness, is, and ought to be, the great end which the ministers of God propound to themselves in the use of their gifts, and discharge of their office. Learn, 2. That the edifying of the church being the proper office of the ministers of Christ, they should study to excel in all gifts and graces conducing thereunto, by such means and methods as are proper for that end; namely, by fervent prayer to God for divine illumination and knowledge, by reading the scriptures with great attention and application of mind, by studying other authors in order to that end, by deep meditation, by judicious zealous, and laborious preaching, but especially by holy living. There ought to be a consecration of our lives, as well as of our persons, to the service of God and his church; in this manner, especially the meanest of her ministers, may seek that they may excel to the edifying of the church.

13 Wherefore let him that speaketh in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret.

14 For if I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful.

15 What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also: I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also.

Observe here, How strongly the apostle pleads the necessity of all public worship, particularly preaching or prophesying, praying and singing, to be performed in a language known and understood by all the congregation: Let him that speaketh, preacheth, or teacheth, in an unknown tongue, in which he cannot edify others, pray for the edifying gift of interpretation, that others may be edified as well as himself; otherwise when we pray in an unknown tongue, our spirit prayeth, that is, our own gifts are exercised; but our understanding is unfruitful, that is, unto others: If we satisfy ourselves, we cannot edify them. He resolves therefore to pray with the Spirit, and to sing with the Spirit, that is, with a strange tongue ministered to him by the Spirit; yet to pray with understanding also, that is to pray so as others may understand him, and join with him, and be edified by him. Learn from hence, Both the impiety and absurdity of the church of Rome, in appointing their public offices to be performed in Latin; a language which the common people in France, Spain, Germany, yea, in Italy itself, do not understand; for the Latin tongue is not now the mother-tongue of any nation under heaven: And the council of Trent thunders out an anathema against those, that say the mass ought to be celebrated only in the vulgar tongue. Lord! what is, if this be not, to offer the sacrifice of fools? How can this be a reasonable service, which is no better than a sinful taking-God's name in vain? How can their hearts and tongues go along together, who understand nothing which their tongues utter? They neither know the God they pray to, nor yet the mercies which they pray for. Lord! pity the miserable souls in their communion, who erect an altar, and offer up unknown prayers to an unknown God.

16 Else, when thou shalt bless with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest?

17 For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified.

18 I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all:

19 Yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.

Our apostle still goes on arguing, that public prayers ought to be made in a language understood by them that pray. His argument is this, The heart ought to consent to, and agree with, the supplications and prayers presented unto God, and to testify its consent by saying, Amen; but, says the apostle, no man can say Amen to that which he doth not understand, nor be edified by that which cannot be understood. For at the close he tells them, That Almighty God hath given him the gift of speaking more languages than all of them put together, that so as an apostle, he might plant and propagate the Christian faith in and throughout all nations; yet he declares he had rather speak a few words to the instruction and edification of his hearers, than a multitude in a language not understood: The faithful ministers of Christ have such a regard to the end of their ministry, which is the communicating of divine knowledge to the understandings of their people, that they had much rather they should be edified and profited, than their own parts and gifts applauded and admired.

20 Brethren, be not children in understanding: howbeit in malice be ye children; but in understanding be men.

As if the apostle had said, My brethren, be not like children in understanding, who prefer gay and gaudy things, which make a fine show, as the gift of tongues does, before things more useful. Thus, do not you chuse what best pleaseth you, but what most profits others. I would have you indeed, in some respects, to be as children, namely, in innocence and harmlessness, in freedom from malice, and all kinds of wickedness; but in understanding be and act as men, as persons of mature judgment, who know what is fittest to be spoken, and best to be done. To be like children in the innocency of our actions is a virtue, but to be like them in the inpotency and weakness of our understandings, is a reproach: In understanding be men.

21 In the law it is written, With men of other tongues and other lips will I speak unto this people; and yet for all that will they not hear me, saith the Lord.

22 Wherefore tongues are for a sign, not to them that believe, but to them that believe not: but prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe.

Observe here, How our apostle, to take the Corinthians off from their fond admiration of the gift of tongues, tells them, That in the law, that is, in the writings of the Old Testament, particularly in Isa. xxviii. 11, it is declared, That because the people of Judah would not be instructed by the plain preaching of the Lord's prophets, therefore he would cause them to be spoken to in an unknown language, namely, by outlandish enemies and armies, whose language they should not understand: from whence he infers, that strange tongues were not given for a sign of any good to believers, but they were given as a token rather of God's displeasure to unbelievers; insomuch, that by the just judgment of God, their ignorance by this means would be the more increased: But the gift of prophesy serveth not only for the conversion of unbelievers, but for the edification of believers also; therefore, prophesy or preaching intelligibly, is to be preferred in the church before speaking with tongues.

23 If, therefore, the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad?

24 But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all;

25 And thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so, falling down on his face, he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth.

To convince the Corinthians that prophesy was far more excellent than the gift of tongues, the apostle here argues from the absurdity of speaking in the congregation with a strange tongue uninterpreted; Will they not say ye are mad? And from the utility and advantage of speaking in a language understood, it convinceth and converted sinners; He is convinced of all, he is judged of all: As if the apostle had said, when the church meets together, if all that speak should speak in a strange tongue, what will an ignorant or unbelieving person coming into the congregation think or say? Will he not apprehend you to be mad-men?—Whereas, if all that speak do prophesy and interpret scripture to the edification of the church, in such a case, if an unbeliever comes in, he is convinced, discovered, judged by all them that prophesy, and the secrets of his heart are made manifest to himself; and so falling down, he will adore God, the searcher of the heart, and report, from his own experience, that God is in or among you of a truth. Where, note, Whence prophesying, or preaching of the word has its convincing power, and converting efficacy, namely, from that God who is present in and with his own word; God is in, or with you of a truth. When Almighty God quickens the word with his own Spirit, and clothes it with his own power, when he bids it go in his might, and prevail in his strength, the strongest holds of ignorance and unbelief, of obstinacy and rebellion, fall to the ground like the first ripe figs shaken with the wind; when the unlearned or idiot comes into the assembly of the saints, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all, he falls down and worships. What is it that works this sudden change? Not the preaching of men, but the power of God: He will report that God is in you of a truth: The arm of grace in the ministry of the word is victorious and invincible: The efficacy and success of the word depends not on the parts of a man, but the power of God:

26 How is it then, brethren, when ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation? Let all things be done unto edifying.

From this verse to the end of the chapter, the apostle lays down particular precepts for the preservation of decency and good order in the church of God: and, first he advises, when they came together in the public assembly, that if any of them had a psalm or hymn suggested to them by the Spirit of God, to his glory, and the church's edification, or had a doctrine, either for instruction or consolation, or had a strange tongue, or the gift of interpreting tongues, let it be how it will, he exhorts that all be done so as may most and best tend to the benefit and edification of the church, which is the true end of church assemblies. The great end, design, and aim, which those who administer in holy things ought to propound to themselves in all their public administrations, is the church's edification, the people's growth and improvement in knowledge, faith, and holiness: Let all things be done unto edifying, that is, let all your public offices be so performed, and in such a manner, as may best conduce to the end for which they were designed.

27 If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret.

28 But if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church; and let him speak to himself, and to God.

29 Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the other judge.

30 If any thing be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace.

31 For ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted.

32 And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets.

33 For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints.

Our apostle's next advice for the church's edification, is this, that such as had the gift of tongues should not speak all together, but two or three successively one after another; and that one interpret what was spoken, to the benefit and edifying of the church. But if there were no interpreter present, let him, says the apostle, that only speaks with tongues, keep silence in the church; and let him only speak mentally to himself, and to God in prayer and thanksgiving. The same advice he gives to them that prophesied; to wit, that only two or three of them should prophesy successively, in order to the church's edification, and that the rest of the prophets should sit still and judge, examining their doctrine by the rule of the word: For, says he, the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets; that is, the doctrines which the prophets deliver, are apt to be judged and examined by other prophets, whether they be agreeable to the word of God or not; or the instinct by which the prophets pretended to be moved at that time to prophesy, is subject to the judgment and censure of other prophets, who are endowed with the same gift. And thus he declares, that all that are prophets, and prophetically inspired, may prophesy, provided it be done orderly and successively, without occasioning disorder and confusion in the church, and so managed, as to answer the great end of the institution; namely, the instruction, edification, and consolation of the church. For God is not the author of confusion but of peace: Confusion is so far from being of divine inspiration, that it is hateful to God, who requires that peace and order should be kept and maintained, not only in the church of Corinth, but in all the churches of the saints. That which breaks order, breaks peace; for there can be no true peace without order; and God is not the author of disorder and confusion in the churches, but of peace. Here, by the way, let us observe and note, that speaking and preaching in the public assemblies is limited all along by the apostle to the prophets; Let the Prophets speak; not the common people, they were to sit by, it was no part of their business to speak, but to examine what was spoken, by the rule of the word. The authoritative preaching of the gifted brethren, at the call of a private congregation, was no more permitted by St. Paul, than his suffering of women to speak in the church: none but prophets, or persons in office appointed for the work of preaching, were ever suffered to undertake it in the primitive times, and downwards till very lately. Let such as first gave and still give encouragement to the contrary, consider how they will answer it at the bar of God, who is not the author of such confusion and disorder but of peace.

34 Let your women keep silence in the churches; for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law.

35 And if they will learn any thing, let them ask their husbands at home: for it is a shame for women to speak in the church.

A farther rule is here given by the apostle for maintaining decency and order in the public assemblies; namely, that the women should never presume to speak or utter any thing as public teachers in the congregation; no, nor so much as ask any question publicly: Almighty God having, by his law, made subjection (not public instruction) their duty, of which silence is a token. Here observe, That it is not the women's speaking in the public assemblies, when they join with the congregation in singing of psalms and prayer, but their speaking by way of teaching and prophesying.

syng, that is here forbidden. Note farther, that the means of instruction were not denied the women; at home they might put forth questions to their husbands for their own information and satisfaction; but to do any thing like this publicly, was a shame, an indecent thing, both to the church, the husband, and herself. Still observe, How the God of order calls for order, and delights in decency, especially in places where his religious worship is celebrated. He has unworthy thoughts of God, that thinks him either a patron of, or pleased with, any disorder, either in civil affairs or religious services.

36 What? came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only?

37 If any man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you, are the commandments of the Lord.

38 But if any man be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

These words are looked upon by interpreters, as a smart reflection upon some of the ministers and members of the church at Corinth; who, from an high opinion which they had of themselves and their own management, would not submit to the foregoing precepts, canons and rules, for order and decency in the church of God. What! says the apostle, do you think that you have all the word and will of God? Doth all knowledge of scripture, and resolution of doubts rest in your breasts, and flow out of your lips? Consider, you are not the first church that was planted (Jerusalem was before you) the gospel was sent to you, it did not first come out from you. Whence learn, That all kind of scorn is not always uncomely; men are apt to over-rate themselves and to overvalue their own abilities, as if they had engrossed all knowledge, that all must borrow from their store, and light their candle at their torch. Now in that case, we may, without breach of charity, or blemish of holiness, check pride with derision; and speak them below men who set up themselves above men. Observe next, The apostle affirms, That these rules for order and decency which he had given them, were from the Lord; and he expected and required, that those who esteemed themselves prophets, should observe and obey them as such: But if men will be ignorant, and obstinate in their ignorance, be it at their peril, and let them look to it, do not you regard them: If any be ignorant, let him be ignorant.

39 Wherefore, brethren, covet to prophecy, and forbid not to speak with tongues.

40 Let all things be done decently and in order.

For a close of the whole, he exhorts them earnestly to endeavour after the gift of prophesying, and not to forbid the use of the gift of tongues, provided the forementioned rules and directions before given be observed; that so in their public assemblies all things relating to religious worship be performed with that becoming gravity and decency which may most and best conduce to the glory of God, and the church's edification. Learn hence, 1. That the whole church in general, and every individual member of it in particular, ought to perform all the duties of God's worship in a decent and orderly manner. Learn, 2. That it is the duty of church governors to take care that order and decency be enjoined and observed in the church of God, to the edification of all the members of it. Learn, 3. That they only have authority to make church-orders, whom the Lord has made church-governors. Learn, 4. That such orders as relate to real decency in the worship of God, made and confirmed by the governors of the church, ought to be obeyed and conformed to by the members of the church, for conscience-sake, that all things may be done decently and in order.

CHAP. XV.

The design and scope of our apostle in this excellent chapter now before us, is to establish the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, which some in the church of Corinth at that time denied. This grand article of the Christian faith is here by several arguments defended, the absurdity of the contrary declared, the objections made against it fully answered, and Christian-steadfastness in the faith, and laborious diligence in the work of Christ, urged and enforced to the end of the chapter.

MOREOVER, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand;

2 By which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain.

Observe here, 1. The subject-matter of St. Paul's preaching to the Corinthians, it was the gospel: I declare unto you the gospel which I preached; and particularly the doctrine of the body's resurrection, which was a great point of that gospel which he had preached and delivered to them. Observe, 2. The obedience which many, if not most of the Corinthians had given to the doctrine of the gospel; they heard it, believed it, and embraced it as the truth of God: Which gospel ye received, and wherein ye stand; that is, the best and greatest part of you are firm to your former profession, though some are fallen away. Observe, 3. The blessed effect which the gospel had upon those that did believe and receive it: By it they were saved; that is, put into a salvable state, brought into the right and only way that leads to salvation. The gospel reveals the object, Salvation: it directs lost man which way to arrive at it, assures him that it is attainable, and inclines and encourages him seri-only to endeavour after the attainment of it. Observe, 4. The condition annexed and required on our part, in order to the obtaining that salvation which the gospel discovers unto us, and that is perseverance; for that is implied in our keeping in memory what we have received: ye are saved if ye keep in memory. If ye do not steadfastly cleave to the gospel, and to this grand doctrine of it, the resurrection, our hearing is vain, our believing is vain, our hopes of salvation are vain. By the gospel we are saved, if we keep it in memory, and practice it; otherwise we have believed it in vain.

3 ¶ For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures;

4 And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures:

5 And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve.

6 After that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once: of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep.

7 After that he was seen of James; then of all the apostles.

Observe here, The apostle's fidelity, 1. In delivering nothing to the church but what he had received: I delivered to you first of all that which I also received; either mediately by Ananias, or by immediate revelation from Christ himself. Observe, 2. The principal and fundamental doctrines or articles of faith, which the apostle in his preaching had insisted upon amongst them, namely, the death, the burial and the resurrection of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. That he died for our sins: that is, a voluntary sacrifice for our sins, to make an atonement for sin, as the prophets Isaiah and Daniel had long foretold. And that he was buried: The dead body of our dear Redeemer was decently buried by a small number of his own disciples, and continued in the state of the dead, and under the power of death, for a time. That he was buried, is a demonstration of the certainty that he died. And that he rose again the third day, according to the scriptures: Christ, though laid, was not lost in the grave, but, by the omnipotent power of his Godhead, revived, and rose again from the dead the third day, to the consternation of his enemies, and the consolation of all believers. Observe, 3. How the apostle proves the truth and verity of Christ's resurrection, by ocular demonstration: He is risen, because he was seen alive after his passion; first of Peter, next of the whole college of the apostles, which formerly consisted of twelve; then of five hundred brethren at once in Galilee, whereof some were then alive to testify it; after which he was seen of James, and then of all the apostles. These were all holy persons, who durst not deceive, and who confirmed their testimony with their blood. So that no article of faith, no point of religion, is of more confessed truth and infallible certainty, than this of our Lord's resurrection; and blessed be God it is so, seeing the whole weight of faith, hope, and salvation, depend upon Christ as risen from the dead. Behold how great a weight the scripture hangs upon this nail; thanks be to God, it is a nail fastened in a sure place. Our Lord's resurrection is his church's consolation.

8 And last of all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time.

As Christ was seen by St. Paul last of all the apostles, so it is probable he was seen last by him of all persons: We read not of any that saw Christ after St. Stephen and St. Paul, who here reckons himself among those who were eye-witnesses of the risen Jesus; Last of all he was seen of me also. Observe farther, The great humility of St. Paul, in styling himself an untimely birth, or a person born out of due time. But in what sense doth he mean that he was born out of due time? Ans. 1. Negatively; not that he was as to his spiritual birth born too soon, but rather too late. Alas! he had been too long a proud Pharisee, a formal professor, a fiery persecutor. In this sense he was no abortive, or born out of due time, but rather born too late than too soon. But positively he calls himself an abortive, or untimely birth, 1. Because he was the last of the apostles that was called; the rest were called by Christ whilst here on earth. Paul was called by Christ from heaven after his departure from earth to heaven. 2. Because of the suddenness and violence of his conversion. An abortion is occasioned by some sudden surprise, some strain, or violent motion. St. Paul's conversion was a wonderful, violent conversion, out of the ordinary way and course; he was smitten from his horse to the ground, and lay as one dead in his passage to his new life. 3. Because abortive children are lesser, weaker, and more imperfect children, than those of full growth. As an abortive child is the least of children, so he reckons himself the least of the apostles; and styles himself so in the next verse, where he thus speaks:

9 For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God.

10 But by the grace of God I am what I am: and this grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I laboured more abundantly than they all; yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me.

11 Therefore, whether it were I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed.

Observe here, 1. The profound humility of this great apostle, and how low he was in his own thoughts, he calls himself the least of the apostles; nay, not meet or worthy to be called an apostle, because he had persecuted the church of Christ with so much fury and fierceness. Elsewhere he styles himself, less than the least of all saints: Not that any thing can be less than the least; but the original being a double diminutive, his meaning is, that he was as little as could be. Oh admirable humility! the more we know of God and ourselves, the more humble apprehensions we shall have of ourselves; a good man's thoughts are always lowest of himself; the more holiness any man has, the more humility he has. Humility is a great evidence of our holiness, it being indeed a great part of our holiness. Observe, 2. How the apostle ascribes all that he was, wherein he differed from others to the grace of God; by the grace of God I am what I am. As we receive our natural being from the power of God, so we derive our spiritual being from the grace of God: if I forbear what is evil, it is from restraining grace: if I follow what is spiritually good, it is from sanctifying grace: Therefore, not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy grace be the praise. Observe, 3. The blessed fruit which the grace of God produced in St. Paul, it caused him to labour, (grace is an active principle) to labour abundantly, to labour more abundantly than all the apostles; not more than all of them put together, but more than any one of them that were his fellow apostles separately considered. Such as receive most grace and favour from God, are holily ambitious to do the utmost services for God. Observe, 4. Lest he should seem to be too assuming, and to arrogate any thing to himself, he adds, Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. Behold how the holy apostle ascribes the fruit of all his endeavours to the grace of God, to the influences and assistances of the Holy Spirit of grace, exciting him, assisting him, working in him and with him, and succeeding of him in all his enterprizes and undertakings, for the glory of God, and the good of souls: I laboured, yet not I; but divine grace that went along with me. Observe, 5. The inference which the apostle draws from the whole: Therefore, whether it were I, or they, so we preach, and so ye believed: that is, whether it were I, or any other of the apostles, who laboured most in the preaching of the gospel, the doctrine is the same, namely, That Christ died for our sins, rose again, and will raise us. This is the doctrine which we apostles preached, and which you Corinthians believed and received; therefore why should any of you now stagger in the faith, and disbelieve the resurrection of the body, which is a blow made at the root of Christianity? Alas! what have we to carry our spirits through all the rugged passages and cross dispensations of this life, but only our hopes in reversion, only our hopes of a glorious resurrection, and blessed immortality?

12 ¶ Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?

13 But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen.

14 And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain.

15 Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God: because we have testified of God that he raised up Christ; whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not.

16 For if the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised.

17 And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins.

18 Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished.

19 If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable.

Our apostle having asserted and proved the resurrection of Christ by ocular demonstration, by a plentiful testimony of those who saw him after he was risen; and withal informed them that this was the doctrine of the gospel which both he and the rest of the apostles had with one consent preached to them, he from hence infers the certainty and necessity of our resurrection. And because some in the church of Corinth were tainted with the wicked opinion of the Sadducees, who said there was no resurrection; therefore, to strangle this monstrous opinion amongst the Corinthians in the birth, he shews the absurdity of it in these verses before us. His first argument runs thus: If there be no resurrection of the dead, then Christ the Head is not risen; for if the Head be risen, he will certainly raise up his members. Christ's resurrection is the cause, the pattern and archetype of ours: He did not only raise his body from the grave, but his church with him: For indeed Christ is not perfectly risen, till all his members are risen with him, and raised like him. True it is, that Christ's personal resurrection was perfect when he arose; and it is as true, that all believers arose representatively when Christ arose: But till all believers arise personally, the resurrection of Christ has not received its utmost perfection. His next work is, to prove the certainty of Christ's resurrection, from the manifold absurdities, which would follow upon the denial of it; as, namely, 1. If Christ be not risen, then the apostle's preaching was vain, and their belief of it was vain also. Our preaching is vain; that is, we who in our preaching have so strongly asserted Christ's resurrection, as an infallible argument of the divinity of his person and doctrine, have taught you a vain and idle dream: And your faith in Christ, as risen from the dead, is no better than a fancy; vain also: seeing the object of it faileth, Christ has risen from the dead. 2. If Christ be not risen, then we are found false witnesses of God; that is, then St. Paul himself, and the other apostles, had given a false testimony of God to the world, in affirming that God the Father had raised up Christ the Son from the dead; which he did not do, if there be no resurrection of the dead. To be false witnesses for men, is a sin of no common guilt; but to belie God, and to be false witnesses for God, is a sin of an aggravated guilt, which the holy apostles could not be supposed to be guilty of. Again, 3. If Christ be not raised from the dead, then we are yet in our sins; that is, under the guilt of our sins, and liable to condemnation for our sins: we are not justified and absolved from them, unless Christ has expiated the guilt of them; and this he has not done, if he be not risen, but remains himself under the power of death; for he was raised again for our justification. Farther, 4. If Christ be not risen, then they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished: that is, the dead saints in general, and the holy martyrs and sufferers for Christ in particular, who are fallen asleep are perished utterly, and lost finally if there be no resurrection; martyrs will then be great losers, and martyrdom great folly. Lastly, Then Christians are of all men most miserable. As if the apostle had said, As those martyrs were errant fools, and perished as such, who laid down their lives for Christ, if they have no hopes of a resurrection, when they shall take them up again; so we Christians that survive, are the wretchedest creatures upon earth, who undergo all the sufferings and hardships of this life, and deny ourselves many comforts and advantages which we might enjoy. If after this mortal life we have no hope, who would care to do well, or who would fear to do ill? Were this believed, none would live so fleshly and sensual a life as those that do not believe the resurrection of the flesh; and none would be so miserable in this life, as the holy self-denying Christian, had he not an hope after death of a glorious resurrection. Learn hence, That true Christians would be more unhappy than any other men, if their happiness were confined to this life only: We are of all men most miserable. We Christians are more miserable than any other mortals; and we apostles and ministers more miserable than other Christians, who, like beacons upon the tops of mountains, stand open continually to all storms and tempests raised against us by men and devils.

20 But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept.

Observe here, 1. The resurrection of Christ declared; Now is Christ risen from the dead. 2. Our resurrection from his inferred and insured; he arose as the first-fruits of them all that slept. The term of first-fruits is metaphorical, alluding to the oblation of the first-fruits in the Levitical law, Lev. xxiii. 9. These were offered, both as an acknowledgment that the whole crop was God's, and as a pledge and assurance of their enjoying the whole crop from God, and as a mean by which the whole crop was consecrated and sanctified to their use. As sure as the whole harvest follows the first-fruits, so shall the saints' resurrection follow the resurrection of Christ, as an effect follows its proper cause: For Christ's resurrection is the meritorious cause, the efficient cause, and the exemplary cause of our resurrection; and as it is the cause, so it is the pledge, the earnest, and the full assurance of ours. Observe, 3. Christ is called the first-fruits of them that slept; that is, the first-fruits from the dead of them that slept; not as if Christ was absolutely the first that was raised from the dead, for we read of one raised by Elijah, and another by Elisha, and of Lazarus raised by Christ: But these were so raised as to die again; they were not raised to a life of immortality: But now Christ was the first that arose never to die more; the first that arose by his own power, the first that arose to give others a pledge and assurance of their rising after him, and of their rising like unto him; Christ's resurrection is the cause, the pattern, the pledge, the assurance of the believer's resurrection: Christ is risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept.

21 ¶ For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead.

22 For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

Here observe, That our apostle, to prove Christ's resurrection to be the cause of our resurrection, makes a comparison betwixt Adam and Christ, whom he represents as two originals and fountains, the one of death, the other of life: As by Adam's sin all that are partakers of his human nature die a natural death, so all that are partakers of Christ's divine nature, all that are his spiritual seed and offspring, shall be raised and made alive by him; for the expressions, in Adam, and in Christ, do denote a casualty in both, the one in death; and the other of life; as the death of all mankind came by Adam, so the resurrection of all mankind comes by Christ; the wicked shall be raised by him officio judicis, by the power of Christ as their Lord and Judge; the righteous shall be raised beneficio mediatoris, by virtue of their union with him as their Head.

23 But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's, at his coming.

24 Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power.

25 For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.

Here the apostle answers an objection. Some might say, if Christ's resurrection be the cause of the believer's resurrection, then why did not all believers rise when he arose? The Head being risen, why did not all the members rise with him? He answers, No. God had appointed an order which must be observed; and this order was, that Christ should be the first-fruits of the harvest; that he should rise first from the dead, and then they that are Christ's at his coming to judgment shall rise after him. And then cometh the end; that is, the end of the world, when Christ will deliver up his kingdom to God the Father. What kingdom? his mediatorial kingdom, which, as Mediator, he received from his Father, not his natural and essential kingdom, which, as God, he had with his Father from eternity; this shall never be delivered up, for of this his kingdom there shall be no end; but at the end of the world, Christ having subdued all his and his church's enemies, and put down all rule, authority, and power, both in the world and in the church, he shall deliver up his mediatorial kingdom to his Father, and reign no longer as Mediator, and as deputed by his Father; but he shall still reign, eternally reign, as God equal with the Father: For his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion endureth to eternal ages. Here note, That when our apostle is setting forth the order in which the saints shall arise, he says nothing of a first and second resurrection, nothing of a first and second coming of Christ to judgment; one to reign on earth a thousand years, and a second to judge all the world. Mention is here made of a general resurrection, when all the saints shall be raised together, but not a word of some being raised before the rest to reign with Christ a thousand years.

26 The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death.

Observe here, 1. What sin has subjected the human nature to, and that is death; sin brought mortality into our nature, and the wages of sin is death. Observe, 2. That death is an enemy to humanity, an enemy to the whole race of mankind, both to body and soul, to the righteous and the wicked; to the body, by turning that which is the glory of the creation, in a moment into rottenness and putrefaction; to the soul, by occasioning its separation from the body, towards which it has so strong and affectionate an inclination and desire, as its old companion. Death is also an enemy to the righteous, as it blunts the edge of his desires after heaven, and abates that joy which he should have in the believing thoughts and apprehensions of heaven; and it is an enemy to the wicked, as it is a passage to everlasting misery, by their falling immediately into the hands of the living God, from whose mouth they receive a final sentence to depart accursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. Observe, 3. That this enemy is the last enemy: It is so to the children of God; when they have overcome death, they have overcome all their enemies at once, and especially their worst enemy, sin, which they could never overcome before fully. Blessed be God, though death came into the world by sin, yet sin shall go out of the world by death. Observe, 4. This last enemy shall be destroyed, by losing its sting that it cannot annoy, by losing its terror that it cannot amaze, by losing its power that it cannot destroy; and by losing its very being, it shall be finally abolished and destroyed by a resurrection from the dead. Observe, 5. The destroyer of death, this last enemy, is Christ, Hos. xiii. 14. "I will ransom them from the power of the grave, I will redeem them from death." Christ has conquered death meritoriously by his satisfaction, victoriously by his resurrection. Observe, 6. The scope and drift of the apostle's argument in this assertion, and that is, to prove the necessity of the resurrection; the argument lies thus, Christ must reign till all his enemies are destroyed, but death is one of these enemies, the last of them which keeps the believer's body from union with his soul, and from communion with Christ, therefore death must be destroyed; and there is no other way to destroy death but by a resurrection from the dead, which is the truth our apostle strongly proves throughout his whole chapter.

27 For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, All things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him.

28 And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.

Our apostle here proceeds in the argument which he begun at the 24th and 25th verses, that Christ must continue as Mediator to reign till all things are subject to him, and all enemies are subdued by him: This the apostle here proves, because God the Father has put all things and all persons under his Son's feet, as Mediator, himself only excepted:

God the Father having reserved to himself his own sovereign empire, and supreme authority; he being excepted from this subjection himself, who gave it to his Son. And when all things shall be thus subdued to Christ, then his mediatorial kingdom shall be delivered up to his Father, from whom he did receive it; yea, the Son himself, as Mediator and Head of the church, shall be subject to the Deity, that God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, may be all in all, by a full communication to, and intimate union with all the saints. Learn hence, 1. That the mediatorial kingdom of Christ was given to him by God the Father, as a reward of his sufferings. Phil. ii. 8, 9. "He became obedient to the death, wherefore God hath highly exalted him." Learn, 2. That this mediatorial kingdom was given to Christ only according to his human nature; seeing the human nature only suffered, and the divine nature is capable of no such exaltation or new dominion, he was thus exalted, "Because he was the Son of man." John v. 27. Learn, 3. That during the continuance of this mediatorial kingdom of Christ, the Father judges no man, but commits all judgment unto his Son, giving him full power and authority to punish and reward according to his own wisdom, will, and pleasure; and, as Lord of all, he gives laws to all. Learn, 4. That this mediatorial kingdom, Christ shall certainly lay down; when all things are subdued unto him, the exercise of his kingly power shall cease then; and as Christ is now all in all with relation to his church, the God-head then will be all in all: and Christ himself, as man, will be subject to his Father, as well as saints and angels are subject to him. From those words, God shall be all in all, as applied to his saints, we learn, That all the saints shall be abundantly satisfied in heaven, with the fruition of the Deity alone; there is enough in God alone eternally to fill and satisfy all the blessed souls in heaven, without the addition of any creature comfort. God is complete satisfaction to his children in the absence (I must not say want) of all other enjoyments; we want these comforts in our way, we shall want none of them at our journey's end, for there God will be all in all; as in heaven we shall see God, so we shall there eye nothing but God.

29 Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?

Expositors do vary exceedingly in the sense and interpretation of this difficult text; some understand it of a sacramental, some of a funeral, and some of a metaphorical baptism or washing. Those who understand it of a sacramental baptizing, say, That the baptized for the dead, are those who are baptized upon the article of the resurrection of the dead, and consequently in hope of the resurrection: As if the apostle had said, As for those among you in the church of Corinth, who are baptized persons, and yet deny the resurrection of the dead, I would demand of them why they have in their baptism made a profession of believing the article of the resurrection? Why were they baptized in this faith, if they now renounce it? To be a baptized Christian, and yet deny the resurrection, is a flat and plain contradiction. Others understand it of a funeral washing of the dead corpse, in order to burial; and they say this was done in the belief and expectation of the dead body's rising again. As if he had said, If the dead corpse shall never rise more, to what purpose do you wash them! Do men give respect where there is no hope? Others will have a metaphorical and allegorical baptism here intended, namely, afflictions, persecutions, and martyrdom: As if he had said, If there be no resurrection of the dead, what benefit will accrue to those that suffer persecution, and death itself, for professing and defending the resurrection of some that are dead, namely, Christ-Jesus, whose resurrection is past; and of the saints whose resurrection is to come? Some, last of all, render the words thus: Moreover, what shall they do that are baptized, for the sake of the dead? If the dead are not raised at all, why are they therefore baptized for the sake of the dead? As if the apostle had said, What shall they do which are baptized for the sake of the holy saints and martyrs deceased? Is it not by reason of them, that they take up the profession of Christianity? Yes, surely; the sight of the holiness of their lives, and of their courage and constancy at their deaths, has stirred up many to espouse the same holy religion, and to admit themselves into it, by the sacrament of baptism. The death of an eminent saint made a great number of disciples in those days, and the blood of any holy martyr baptized whole cities: Now to what purpose is all this, If the dead rise not at all.

30 And why stand we in jeopardy every hour.

31 I protest by your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily.

Our apostle is still arguing for the belief of the resurrection of the dead, and seems to speak here after this manner: What folly would it be in us Christians, to chuse a religion that exposes us continually to death and danger? Why should we run the hazard of the loss of estate, liberty and life itself, if there be no resurrection in order to a retribution, when our courage and constancy for Christ and his holy religion shall be acknowledged and rewarded? "Why stand we in jeopardy every hour?" intimating, that it would be the greatest folly and madness, to suffer the worst of evils, for the sake of Christianity, if all our hopes perish in the grave. He adds farther, That as to himself, he died daily; that is, was continually exposed to death, in danger of it, and in a preparation for it; which he would never have been, if he had not an expectation of a glorious resurrection, when all his sufferings and services should be rewarded. And to confirm the truth of what he said, he binds it with a solemn protestation, "I protest by your rejoicing, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily;" that is, either I protest by all that joy which I have in your conversion to Christianity, and by all that rejoicing which is found with me for the success of my ministry among you; or else I protest by all that rejoicing which I have in common with you, and all Christians under the heaviest suffering for the sake of Christ Jesus our Lord, that I live continually a dying life, perpetually in expectation of death, and preparation for it.

32 If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?

Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die.

The apostle had mentioned his sufferings in general in the former verses, to testify his belief and hope of a future resurrection. Here he relates one particular kind and manner of suffering; namely, his fighting with beasts at Ephesus: To what purpose had he that mighty struggle there, and ran such a hazard of his life as that was, if he had no hope of a better life after this, no expectation of a blessed resurrection? If I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, &c. A twofold interpretation is given of these words: Some understand them literally and properly, that he did really combat with wild beasts; it being usual in those times of persecution, under Heathenish powers, to cast Christians to wild beasts: The common cry then was, Christianos ad leones; Away with the Christians to the lions. But some objected to this interpretation, That the apostle being a freeman of Rome, had no such indignity offered to him; and in the Acts of the Apostles, St. Luke gives no relation of it; and that the apostle himself, in the catalogue he gives of his sufferings, 2 Cor. xi. makes no mention of it, unless it be comprehended under those general words, In deaths often. Others therefore understand the words in a metaphorical sense, I have fought with beasts; that is with savage men, with men like beasts in their manners and conditions. And thus some refer this conflict to Acts xix. where we read of his contest with Demetrius, and the silversmiths, about Diana's temple at Ephesus. Others refer it to Acts xiv. when he was stoned at Lystra, and left for dead. But whether we understand it literally or figuratively, the force of the argument lies thus: If I have undergone such deaths and dangers at Ephesus as I have done, and exposed my life to the utmost hazard, in hopes of an happy resurrection, what profit is all this to me, if there be no resurrection? What got I by such hazards and hardships, if there be no life to come? Nay, if matters be so, it will be more reasonable to say, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. Verily then, sensual fools are the wisest men; and they have the best of it, that gratify their appetites and brutish desires, expecting they shall shortly die, and there will be an end of them. Learn hence, 1. That faith in the resurrection to a future life, encourages us against all the troubles and afflictions of this present life; the hope of future good, is a powerful support under the pressure and burden of present evil. Learn, 2. That upon supposition that there is no happiness beyond the grave, a life of sensual pleasure is not absurd: the epicure's song (Ede, bibe, lude, post mortem nulla voluptas; Eat, drink, and play, while it is day, for after death no man shall breathe) seems not unreasonable.

33 Be not deceived: Evil communications corrupt good manners.

34 Awake to righteousness, and sin not: For some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame.

Here the apostle advises them to take heed of being corrupted in their manner by such wicked principles as epicures would be ready to instil into them. Ill words draw persons on to ill deeds; therefore, says he, look to your communication and discourse, take heed of debauching your morals by evil communications; and he backs this exhortation with a forcible motive, because that such sensual principles and lewd opinions shew that men's consciences and reason are in a deep sleep, and that a sottish stupidity has benumbed them: So much is implied in the next words, Awake to righteousness and sin not. Here note, 1. That sin is frequently in scripture compared to sleep, and very fitly, because sinners apprehend things no better than men asleep: all their apprehensions of God and Christ, of heaven and hell, of eternity and a life to come, are slight and hovering notions, wild and uncertain guesses; and the most substantial realities are with them but mere fancies. Again, he that is asleep, is void of all care and fear, full of forgetfulness, unapprehensive of dangers; such is the sinner, whilst he continues asleep in sin, secure but not safe. Note, 2. That repentance is the soul's awaking out of the sleep of sin: The soul rouses up, apprehends, and considers its danger, whilst there is a possibility to escape it, and accordingly by repentance, flies from the wrath to come. Note, 3. That it is not enough that we awake from sin; but we must awake to righteousness; we must not only eschew evil, but do good; for a negative holiness saves none: the positive fruits of holiness towards God, and righteousness towards our neighbour, must be brought forth by us, and the duties of both tables be observed of us; this will be an argument of our sincerity, and an ornament to our profession: The want of this, the apostle tells the Corinthians here, argued them not to have the true knowledge of God, which was really matter of shame to them; considering the means and advantages enjoyed by them: "Some have not the knowledge of God: I speak this to your shame."

35 ¶ But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?

36 Thou fool! that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die.

37 And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain:

38 But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body.

Our apostle having fully proved the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, in the foregoing part of the chapter, comes next to answer the objections that might be made against the body's resurrection. And, first, That it seems impossible that the dead should rise. To this he answers, That it is as possible for the dead to rise, as it is for corn sown in the earth to be quickened after it dies in the earth; corn sown rots and dies, yet doth not perish by dying, but rises up green and fresh. Thus, the body sown in the grave is not lost; though the parts of the body by death are dissolved, yet they are not annihilated; they are scattered, but they are not perished: They lose not their entity, when they part with their relation to humanity; whatsoever we lose at death, is not lost to God; his knowledge is infinite, and his power unlimited; it is as easy for God to raise our bodies out of the dust, as to make them at first out of nothing: Therefore, Christ told the Pharisees, who denied the resurrection, That they "erred, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God," Matt. xxii. 29. The next objection against the body's resurrection, is this: Who, say the objectors, can describe with what bodies the dead shall arise? Our apostle's answer to this effect, That our bodies shall arise the same in substance, though not in qualities; as corn sown is raised in substance and kind the same, but divers in qualities, coming up with blade and ear, and corn in it, it does not rise in the same figure in which it was sown, but it rises in the same nature in which it is sown: That, which was sown wheat, arises wheat. Thus our bodies sown in the grave, shall arise substantially the same, but different in qualities. Here note, That those who did not believe the resurrection of the body, judged it not only an impossible thing, but an unworthy thing, for God to raise the dead; they looked upon the body as the sepulchre and prison of the soul, and accounted it the soul's chiefest happiness to be delivered from the body, esteeming it a real punishment to the soul to be again re-united to so great a clog as the body is. Therefore to this objection the apostle returns a satisfactory answer, by shewing the happy change which shall pass upon the raised body; declaring, That though it shall arise the same body in substance, yet vastly different in qualities; of a mortal body sown, it shall rise a spiritual body; of a vile body, be made a glorious body.

39 All flesh is not the same flesh; but there is one kind of flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds.

40 There are also celestial bodies, and bodies terrestrial: but the glory of the celestial is one, and the glory of the terrestrial is another.

41 There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory.

42 So also is the resurrection of the dead.—

St. Paul here proceeds farther to answer the question which the philosophers at Corinth put, namely, With what bodies do persons come forth out of the grave? He tells them, they shall be vastly different in qualities from what they are at present; and this he illustrates by a similitude. As, says he, there is difference in bodies here below, some more excellent, as the flesh of men, others less excellent, as the flesh of beasts and birds, and as there is a difference between celestial and terrestrial bodies, among themselves, one excelling another in glory, as the sun excels the moon, and one star excels another; so will it be in the resurrection, the bodies that rise will vastly differ from those that died. Here note, That all this is to be understood of the resurrection of the righteous; since it is their bodies alone that shall undergo this happy change, which in the next words the apostle describes:

—It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption ;

43 It is sown in dishonour, it is raised in glory : It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power :

44 It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body.—

Here the apostle gives a fourfold instance of the body's differing qualities in the resurrection, It is sown in corruption, that is, it is here a frail, mortal body, subject to putrefaction, but when raised, shall be incorruptible, that is, never more subject to death or dissolution. It is here a vile body, subject to deformity and dishonour, and when sown or laid in the grave, is loathsome and unlovely ; but shall be raised in glory, a bright and beautiful body, shining like the sun in the firmament of the heavens. It is thought we shall rise in a full and perfect age, in full strength, activity, and vigour ; and were our bodies more heavily, they shall then ascend and descend like angels. Again, It is sown in weakness ; that is, it is subject to weakness by labour, to decays by age, to impotency and wastings by diseases ; and when it dies, it appears an impotent piece of clay. But it shall be raised in power by God's power : it shall be raised a powerful body ; no more impotent, weak, or feeble ; but strong and active, vigorous and nimble ; never subject more either to weariness or weakness. Lastly, It is sown a natural body, an animal body, a body suited to this lower sensible state, in which we live at present ; and when it dies, it is sown in the grave, like the body of a beast. But it shall be raised a spiritual body. Mark, he doth not say it shall be changed into a spirit, but into a spiritual body ; a body it shall remain still, but spiritualized. It is probable that our bodies will then be aërial, and thin and light, more suited to the nature of the soul, as active as fire, as fine and thin as the air. More particularly note here, That the raised body will be a spiritual body in a threefold respect. 1. As it shall always be subject and serviceable to the spirit. Here the soul is subject to the body ; the soul must go the body's pace ; but at the resurrection the body shall be everlastingly subject to the soul or spirit, and for that reason it is called a spiritual body. 2. It may be called a spiritual body, in regard of the great strength and activity with which the body shall be then endowed ; spirits are strong, and so is every thing that is spiritual. The devil is called a spiritual enemy, because he is a powerful enemy. Thus our spiritual bodies will be strong bodies ; and strong had they need to be that they may be able to bear that exceeding weight of glory, as the apostle calls it, 2 Cor. iv. 17, which would crush our bodies under it, were they not made strong to bear it. 3. It is called spiritual, because it will then need no natural helps to support it ; as meat, drink, sleep, and clothing. We shall want these no more than the angels want them, being immediately supported by the power of God, as they are. Thus it is sown a natural body, but raised a spiritual body ; not attenuated into a spirit but still a body ; a real, but spiritual body. The body after the resurrection shall be true flesh, but spiritualized, rarified and refined ; it shall not lose any perfection which it had, but gain many perfections which it had not. Hail, Hail happy day, when soul and body shall be re-united, and the happiness of both completed ! How will the soul then bless God for that body which was here its instrument and assistant in the service of God ! And how will the body then bless God for such a soul, which was so careful to secure an interest in that happiness which it was created for, and made capable of ! Then will full glory be procured into the soul ; and when it is a second time married to the body, it shall have a greater degree of glory than ever it had.

—There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body.

45 And so it is written, The first man Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit.

46 Howbeit that was not first which was spiritual, but that which is natural ; and afterwards that which is spiritual.

47 The first man is of the earth, earthy ; the second man is the Lord from heaven.

48 As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy ; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.

49 And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

Observe here, 1. Our apostle draws a parallel between the two Adams, the first man and Christ ; they were two roots and distinct fountains, from whence all life did spring and flow ; all natural life from the first Adam, all spiritual life from Christ the second Adam : " The first Adam was made a living soul, the last Adam was made a quickening spirit." Observe, 2. The apostle compares the animal life we live by the union of our souls and bodies, with the spiritual life we live by the union of our souls with Christ. In point of dignity and real excellency, the spiritual life is far before the natural ; but in point of priority the natural life is before the spiritual : " First that which is natural, and afterwards that which is spiritual." Observe, 3. What the pedigree and original of man was and is ; He is of the earth, earthy. Earth is the original of man, the matter out of which his form was produced....Hence " the earth is called his earth." Psalm cxlvi. 4. " His breath goes forth, and he returneth to his earth." Observe, 4. As believers have borne in their bodies here on earth the image of the first Adam ; so in the resurrection their bodies shall bear the image of the heavenly Adam ; that is, be changed into the likeness of Christ's glorious body. This is the highest degree of dignity and honour that an human body is capable of. Those bodies which in their formation were of dust and clay, and which in their dissolution are no better than a lump of corruption, when the grave delivers them back again, shall be shining and excellent fabrics, " bearing the image of Christ the heavenly Adam." Then will the saints' bodies be absolutely and everlastingly freed from all natural infirmities, from all accidental deformities, from all wants and necessities, and shall never more be subject to.

death, that formidable adversary of human nature. Oh blessed hour! when both soul and body shall live immediately upon God, and act freely and delightfully for God, and be for ever satisfied in the full fruition and final enjoyment of God.

50 Now this I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption.

By flesh and blood here, we are to understand our bodies in their present natural, corruptible and mortal state. Such flesh and blood as ours is at present, unchanged and unclothed with its heavenly body, cannot inherit the kingdom of God; that is, it cannot possibly enter into heaven, and bear the weight of that glory which will there be put upon it. Corruption, or nature subject to corruption, cannot inherit incorruption; that is, our corruptible bodies cannot enter into an incorruptible heaven. Note here, Another argument produced by the apostle, to prove the necessity of the resurrection, or of raising and new-moulding the body into a spiritual condition; because our natural body, till it be made spiritual, cannot bear the presence of God in heaven; it must be fitted for that glorious place and state, before it be brought into it: by a change of qualities it must be spiritualized, purified and immortalized, or it can never bear that weight of glory which is prepared for the saints in that glorious kingdom.

51 ¶ Behold, I shew you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed.

52 In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; (for the trumpet shall sound,) and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

Here our apostle answers a third objection: Some might say, What shall become of those who shall be found alive at Christ's coming? He answers, they shall not die or sleep, but yet shall undergo a change as well as those that rise from the dead; these shall have flesh and blood changed into spiritual bodies as well as they, and of mortal be made immortal, of corruptible become incorruptible, and all this in a moment of time. Christ's powerful voice will be like a trumpet, calling men together, and the dead shall be raised, and living saints changed into an incorruptible state.

53 For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.

Observe here, The identical expressions used by the apostle: He doth not say, corruptible must put on incorruption, and mortal must put on immortality, but this corruptible and this mortal, to shew the identity and sameness of it. I believe the resurrection of this body, said the primitive Christians. Every man at the resurrection shall receive the same body that now he hath, and be the same person that now he is. Though he be not in every consideration what he was yet he shall be who he was. If the same body that falls be not raised, it is not a resurrection, but a new creation. Indeed it is both unreasonable and unjust, that a person should sin in one body and suffer in another; or serve God in one body, and be glorified in another. Job was clear in the belief of this, chap. xix. 26, 27. "In my flesh shall I see God, and mine eyes shall behold him." I shall see God, this points out the reality of the resurrection; and with these eyes behold him, this denotes the identity of the resurrection; that the same body shall rise again. The resurrection is not a creation of new bodies, but only a restitution of the old ones.

54 So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory.

55 O death! where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?

Here observe, 1. The happy condition of believers in the glorious morning of the resurrection, when their corruptible bodies shall be made by the power of Christ incorruptible and immortal: Then shall death be swallowed up in victory; that is, be overcome for ever, never to destroy or hurt any more, or to have the least power over the body for ever. The conqueror of all flesh is now fully conquered, and the spoiler of mankind finally spoiled. O death! thou wert once a victorious conqueror, an universal conqueror, slaying not thy thousands and ten thousands only, but beyond number: from the infant to the aged, from the dunghill to the throne, sparing neither age nor sex, neither great nor small, neither sacred nor profane: But the Captain of our Salvation having entered into the grave, the territories of death, the king of terrors, has there encountered, disarmed, and destroyed this victorious conqueror; death is swallowed up in victory. Some read it, Death is swallowed down, death is drank up at a draught: Christ called his sufferings, by which he obtained victory over death, a cup; and as death is drank up, so mortality is swallowed up, 2 Cor. v. 4. blessed be God, beyond the grave there is neither death, nor any thing like death, neither death nor mortality. The one is abolished, the other swallowed up of life. Observe, 2. How the apostle, in the name of all believers, triumphs, and holily insults over death, the last conquered enemy. He laughs at it to the very face with a pious scorn and holy derision! "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" As if a man having disarmed his enemy, should say, Now, Sir, where's your sword? where's your pistol? Thus the believer; O death thou thoughtest to pierce, to pain, to poison us with thy sting; but where is now thy sting? Thou thoughtest thyself a conqueror, but behold thou art conquered. Where is now thy victory? Blessed be God for these songs of victory and triumph, which the Captain of our Salvation has put into the mouths of all those that fight under his exalted banner.

56 The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law.

Observe here, 1. Death hath its sting. A sting has a threefold property; to pierce, to pain, and to poison: "All which are applicable unto death. Observe, 2. Death's sting is sin, or death has its sting upon the account of sin: Sin, like a sting, pierces; it pierces us in its guilt; it pierced Christ in its punishment. The soul which no weapon can reach, sin can wound. As a sting, it paineth, as well as pierce; Judas was so pained with it, that in the height of horror, he hanged himself, in hopes of ease. And as a sting it poisoneth; sin is a deadly poison, pleasant in the mouth, bitter in the belly, baneful in the end. So strong a poison is sin, that nothing could expel it but the blood of Christ. Observe, 3. Death comes to a believer without a sting. Behold! Christ became obedient unto death, that he might unstring death. Death shot its sting in our Saviour's side, there left it, and there lost it: It is not now unto any of his members an hurting, but an healing serpent; there is now no venom, no malignity in it. Observe, 4. That as sin is the sting of death, so the strength of sin is the law. Not as if the law did encourage a man to sin, to strengthen him in sinning; for it prohibits sin under the severest penalties, and condemns the sinner to the pit of hell: but the law gives life or adds strength to sin. 1. By the curse and obligation of it, binding the sinner under the guilt of sin to the judgment of the great day. Thus the law strengthens sin, by putting into it a condemning power. 2. By the irritation of the law: Sin takes occasion by the law, and by the commandment becomes exceeding sinful; when lust finds itself restrained, then, like a river that is stopt, it rises and foams, and rebels against the law of the mind, and fetches in all its force to rescue itself from that sword which heweth it in pieces. 3. By the conviction and manifestation of the law, laying open sin to the conscience of the sinner, and shewing him that God is all eye, to see, and all fire, to consume, every unclean thing. Thus the law gives sin its strength, and death its warrant, to arrest and execute us. Ah! wretched and miserable sinner! upon whom, together with death, the weight of sin and the curse of the law fall together; which woundeth deep, and presseth low, even to the lowest hell, unless thou canst say truly, what the apostle doth triumphantly, in the next verse:

57 But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory—

Over sin, death, and the law.

—Through our Lord Jesus Christ.

That is, through the death and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. Observe here, 1. An enemy encountered, death; death armed by sin, and strengthened by the law. This is often a surprising enemy, an amazing enemy, a spoiling and destroying enemy, an inevitable and unavoidable enemy. Observe, 2. Victory over this enemy declared; the destruction of death, as to its terror and power; Death is overcome. But how? Non ut ne-sit but ut non ob-sit: not that it should not be, but that it should not hurt.—Death has lost its sting, that it cannot annoy; it has lost its terror, that it cannot amaze: it has lost its power, that it cannot destroy. Observe, 3. The victors or conquerors over this enemy, who are first Christ, and then all that are Christ's, all that harvest of which Christ is the first-fruits. Observe, 4. The triumph proclaimed, "Thanks be to God, that giveth us the victory." From the whole learn, That all believers are victorious over death, through our Lord Jesus Christ. They may triumph over death through Christ, because he has disarmed it by his death and satisfaction, he has destroyed it by his resurrection; and Christ's victories become the believers, by participation and communion with him. As they communicate with him in the value of his satisfaction, so they communicate with him in the virtue of his resurrection. Let us therefore triumph with the apostle, and say, Thanks be to God, with the prophet, awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust. Thus victory was won by Christ, it was won by us; it was dear to Christ, it is cheap to us; We overcome, but it is by the blood of the Lamb. Let us therefore, living and dying say, "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

58 Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord: forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord.

Here our apostle concludes this chapter, and closes his discourse on this great subject, the doctrine of the body's resurrection, with an exhortation to duty, Be ye steadfast, that is, in the faith of the gospel in general, and in the belief of this particular article of our Christian faith, the resurrection of the dead. Unmoveable: that is, be not moved by any temptations or tribulations, either from the faith and hope of the gospel, or from obedience to the gospel. Let not fear of the cross of Christ make you weary of the yoke of Christ: Always abounding in the work of the Lord. Here note, That the more steady and steadfast any man is in the belief of a blessed resurrection, the more forward and zealous, the more active and industrious will he be in the service and work of God. "Forasmuch as your labour shall not be in vain in the Lord:" that is, your painfulness in the service of God shall be plentifully recompensed by him at the resurrection of the just. Where note, 1. The nature and quality of the service or work of God declared; it is a labour; the vast circumference of a Christian's duty makes it so; the curious and exact manner in and after which every duty must be performed makes it so: but the greater their labour is on earth, the sweeter will their rest be in heaven. Note, 2. The reward that sweetens this labour, It shall not be in vain, there is the transcendency of the reward; Forasmuch as ye know, there is the certainty of it. The Christian's services for Christ shall be certainly and transcendently rewarded by Christ in another world. His labour is finite, his reward is infinite. There is no more proportion between a Christian's labour and reward, than betwixt time and eternity. O infinite glory, the reward of our poor labour!

CHAP. XVI.

Our apostle in this concluding chapter of his excellent epistle, gives the Corinthians several useful directions for their acceptable performance of some needful duties; and then shuts up the whole with particular salutations to them, and with his hearty wishes for a multiplied increase of all spiritual and temporal blessings upon them.

NOW concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye.

2 Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come.

3 And when I come, whosoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring you liberality unto Jerusalem.

4 And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

The first duty which the apostle here directs the Corinthians to, is the making a collection for the poor; and particularly, for them at Jerusalem, who were now in great straits, by reason of a famine which was then and there amongst them, as some expositors affirm. He advises, that on the Lord's day every one should lay something by, as God had prospered him, that there might be no need of farther collections when he came: And that the charity might be distributed according to their pious intentions, he tells them they shall send it by messengers of their own; and that if they judged it meet and needful, he would accompany the bearers of their charity, and assist in the distribution of it. Here note, 1. The great duty which the apostle directs unto care of, and provision for, the poor saints at Jerusalem. To relieve the poor members of Christ, especially such as suffer for his name's sake, is a necessary, yea, important duty. We evidence our love and affection to the Head, by our pity and compassion to the members. The charitable contributions of such churches as are in and under better circumstances, towards those that are in worse, especially if in want, "is an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable and well pleasing unto God," Phil. iv. 18. Note, 2. The time when he advises them to make this charitable collection for the poor; Upon the first day of the week, which was the day of their public assemblies, the day upon which our Lord rose again from the dead. Divines, both ancient and modern, do from hence argue for the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week: It is evident that this was the day on which the Christian churches constantly assembled, to perform their religious worship, to read the scriptures, to preach the word, and celebrate the Lord's Supper; and it was called by them the Lord's Day. Upon this day the apostle orders the collections to be made for the poor; and all Christians, in compliance with this precept, did offer their alms upon that day. Learn hence, That works of charity and mercy, though needful and acceptable every day, yet are the proper duties of the Lord's day. That being a day separated and set apart for sacred works, of which charity is a special part. Add to this, that the day itself doth contain a special motive in it to excite and enlarge our charity, it being the day in which we were begotten to a lively hope, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, of an inheritance incorruptible, and the day upon which we partake of our Lord's most precious body and blood. We having, therefore, received spiritual things so plentifully from Christ, ought to be the more ready to impart of our temporal things to distressed Christians. Note, 3. The apostle bidding every one to lay by something of his store for the relief of others, intimates to us, that God has given unto every one of us a special, proper, and personal right to what we do enjoy. To have all things common, would run all things into confusion. The apostle directing the Corinthians here to a constant use of their charity every Lord's day, in making collections for the poor, doth suppose that they had something of their own to give. Almighty God doth keep up the eighth commandment in full force and strength, as a fence and hedge about the worldly estates of men; and he that goes about to break this hedge, a serpent shall bite him. If there be no such thing as property, how shall we exercise charity? Note, 4. The rule which St. Paul directs the Corinthians to observe and follow in the distribution of their charity; namely, to lay it by in proportion for others, as God had blessed and prospered them. The good which we do, must be proportionable to what we receive. God will not accept of a little, when he has given us an ability to do much: we must always relieve the wants of others as we are able. Such as have ability ought to abound in all kinds of charity; they are to add charity to charity, one way of charity to another, and one work of charity to another; otherwise, though they may do a good work, yet they are not rich in good works; "Let every one lay by in store, as God hath prospered him." Note, 5. How desirous the apostle was that the Corinthians should receive all possible satisfaction in the prudent distribution of their collected charity. He proposes to them to chuse messengers of their own to carry their contributions: he proffers to give them letters of recommendation to the saints at Jerusalem; nay, if need require, and they desire it, he is ready to go himself upon this charitable errand. So ready are the ministers of God upon all occasions, to contribute their utmost endeavours to promote the charitable relief of the poor members of Jesus Christ: If need be, I will go also.

5 Now will I come unto you, when I shall pass through Macedonia. For I do pass through Macedonia:

6 And it may be that I will abide, yea, and winter with you, that ye may bring me on my journey whithersoever I go.

7 For I will not see you now by the way; but I trust to tarry a while with you, if the Lord permit.

8 But I will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost.

9 For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries.

Observe here, St. Paul acquaints them how he had laid his business, ordered his stay and station where he was, and designed afterwards to come and winter with them, and not to see them in passage only. From whence we learn, That a wise contrivance of our own business, of our course of labour, and of what we design to do, is very lawful, provided it be done with submission to the will of God. The apostle declares what he had in his intentions contrived, whither to go, where to stay, how long to continue; but adds, If the Lord permit. All was with submission to the wisdom and will of God. Farther he informs them of his present intentions to stay at Ephesus till Pentecost, because God had opened there unto him a great door for the propagation of the gospel, and had abundantly blessed his labours to the good of many. But there were many adversaries of the truth there, which made his stay longer at Ephesus both necessary and unavoidable. Learn thence, That the great success of the gospel is usually attended with many adversaries and great opposition. The devil stirs up all the rage and fury he can against the professors, but especially the preachers of the gospel: But where the devil is most angry, we may hope we have done most good; that ought to encourage us to stay in our place, though our difficulties are many, and our discouragements great. "I will tarry at Ephesus, where a great door is opened to me, though there are many adversaries."

10 ¶ Now, if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear: for he worketh the work of the Lord, as also I do.

11 Let no man, therefore, despise him: but conduct him forth in peace, that he may come unto me: for I look for him with the brethren.

Observe here, 1. Though Timothy was a young minister, and St. Paul an aged apostle, yet doth he bespeak the church to pay respect unto him as to himself, he being a minister of the gospel as well as himself; though far inferior to him in years and abilities. None of the faithful ministers of themselves, but content, yea, desirous, that all their fellow-brethren should share with them therein; for all men pretend to a share in reputation, and do not love to see it monopolized by a single person; and every wise and good man rejoices when that respect is given to others, which is justly due and payable to their worth and merit. Observe, 2. How affectionately this aged apostle recommends Timothy to the church's tender care, as well as to their deserved respect: See that ye may be without fear; that is, without fear of disturbance from the factions that were amongst them at Corinth; see that he be not exposed to any trouble of danger from any party whatsoever. Let no man despise him; either because of his youth, or his bodily weaknesses and infirmities, or for any other cause whatsoever. But conduct him forth in peace, bring him on his way towards me, and provide for the necessities of his journey. Oh! how happy is it when the ministers of Christ are thus careful of and solicitous for the welfare of each other, as St. Paul here was for Timothy!

12 As touching our brother Apollos,

I greatly desired him to come unto you with the brethren: but his will was not at all to come at this time; but he will come when he shall have convenient time.

Here again observe, 1. How respectfully this great apostle speaks of Apollos, an inferior minister in the church of Corinth. Our brother Apollos. Nothing better becomes the governors and pastors of the church, than humility and condescension, sincere love and affection, a due deference and regard towards those who are under-labourers in our Lord's vineyard, to own and treat them as brethren, co-workers and fellow-helpers with them. God has not made his ministers lions to tear one another, nor bulls to gore each other; but shepherds to watch over, and nurses to cherish one another: Our brother Apollos. Observe, 2. How St. Paul, though a dignified person, a great apostle, left Apollos, an inferior minister of the gospel, to judge for himself, whether he had best go to Corinth, or forbear; "I desired him to come to you, but his will was not to come;" He did not suspend him, or silence him for not obeying the voice of an apostle, but lets him take his choice. There may be, and sometimes are, particular cases and circumstances relating to ourselves and our people, (as about going from them, or continuing with them) which none can adjust and determine so well as ourselves. Perhaps Apollos here had greater and stronger reasons for his refusing, than St. Paul had for his requesting him to go to Corinth: However, the great apostle only desired him to go; not censuring him for his denial, but leaving him to the determination of himself, whose will was not at all to come to them at that time. Observe, 3. What might probably be the reason why Apollos had no inclination to go to Corinth at this time, no, not at the solicitation of St. Paul himself: Perhaps it was because he would not encourage or give the least countenance to a faction which was there begun under the authority of his name, 1 Cor. i. 12. Some said, I am of Apollos. A pious and prudent minister of Jesus Christ seeks not his own applause, or his people's admiration; but what he does is with a special respect to their edification in holiness, for preserving unity, and promoting love among each other. Afterwards, when St. Paul had by his epistle allayed those heats, and healed those divisions which prevailed amongst them, we find Apollos did return to Corinth, and was no doubt very acceptable to them, and serviceable amongst them.

13 ¶ Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong.

Three duties are here exhorted to, namely, watchfulness, steadfastness in the faith, and holy fortitude and courage. 1. Watchfulness, a necessary and daily duty; we cannot be safe one moment without it; something we must watch over, something we must watch against, and something we must watch for. We must watch over our thoughts, our words, our actions; we must watch against all sin, all appearance of sin, all temptations to sin, all occasions of sinning; we must watch for all opportunities of glorifying God, all opportunities of doing good to others, all opportunities of receiving good from others. 2. Steadfastness in the faith: Perseverance in the faith of Christ, and steadfastness in his holy religion, is the great and indispensable duty of every Christian that has due regard to his soul's salvation: Watch ye, stand fast in the faith. 3. Christian fortitude, and holy courage; Quit yourselves like men, be strong: Where we have the Christian's spiritual enemies supposed and implied, sin, Satan, and the world; and his duty declared, and himself encouraged to play the man, in opposing or contending with, and striving against them. Verily, a Christian, above all men, needs courage and resolution: he can do nothing as a Christian, but it is an act of valour; it requires much more courage to be a Christian, than to be a captain. Alas! how many of the valiant swordsmen of the world have shewn themselves mere cowards, who have come out of the fields with victory, and banners displayed, but after all lived and died slaves at home, slaves to their base lusts! It requires more prowess, more bravery and greatness of spirit to conquer ourselves, than to command an army of men: Therefore, quit ye like men, be strong.

14 Let all your things be done with charity.

Our apostle having, in the beginning of this epistle, reproved the Corinthians for their uncharitable schisms and unchristian divisions, he concludes his epistle with this excellent rule of advice, To do all things in love, one for, and one towards another. Where a true principle of Christian charity prevails amongst the members of a church, it will cast out selfishness, pride, envy, and division, and keep them from rash censuring, despising, and abusing one another, and also from separating from the communion of each other. The sum of all the commandments, both towards God and towards our neighbour, is love; it is not praying, hearing or receiving at the Lord's table, which is the fulfilling of the commandment, but when these duties are done in love; and we may do many things commanded towards men, yet if we do them not in love to men, we do nothing as the Lord commanded; therefore, let all things be done with charity.

15 I beseech you, brethren: ye know the house of Stephanas, that it is the first-fruits of Achaia, and that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints:

16 ¶ That ye submit yourselves unto such, and to every one that helpeth with us, and laboureth.

Observe here, 1. The honourable mention which St. Paul makes of Stephanas and his house; they were the first-fruits of Achaia; that is, the first there converted to Christianity: It is a great honour to be in Christ before others: Happy they that come in at the call of Christ, even at the last hour; but thrice happy those that come in at the first, who are the first ripe fruits unto God. Observe, 2. What good proof and evidence Stephanas gave of the sincerity of his early conversion: He addicted himself to the ministry of the saints; that is, he was very forward to assist the poor saints with his estate and labour. There is no better evidence of our interest in Christ, than an entire affection, and operative compassion towards all our fellow members in Christ for grace's sake. Observe, 3. The great deference and regard, the special respect and honour which was due, and is here commanded to be paid to Stephanas, for his ministering to the poor saints that were in want: Submit yourselves unto such; that is, give reverence and honour to them, and to all such as are alike unto them, who laboured with the apostle in the furthering of the gospel.

17 I am glad of the coming of Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus: for that which was lacking on your part they have supplied.

18 For they have refreshed my spirit and yours: therefore acknowledge ye them that are such.

It is very probable that the faithful in the church of Corinth did send these three persons, namely, Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, to St. Paul, at this time at Ephesus, to acquaint him with the state of the church, the rents and schisms that were amongst them; and to desire the interposition of his authority, and the exercise of his apostolical power, in order to the healing of those unhappy breaches. Now, says the apostle, I was glad of the coming of these men whom you sent, with your letters of inquiry to me; for that account of your affairs which was lacking on your part in your letter, they have supplied; I am glad, I say, for they have refreshed my spirit with their presence and discourse, and will at their return refresh yours also; therefore acknowledge ye them that are such, own their services, and honour them for the same. There is a tribute of double honour, respect and reverence, due and payable to such as labour in the church's service, even unto weariness, and are willing to spend and be spent in such services as they are capable of, for the benefit of the church in general, or any member thereof in particular.

19 The churches of Asia salute you. Aquila and Priscilla salute you much in the Lord, with the church that is in their house.

20 All the brethren greet you. Greet ye one another with an holy kiss.

21* The Salutation of me Paul with mine own hand.

Here our apostle closes his epistle with several salutations to the Corinthians, from the churches of Asia, from Aquila and Priscilla, and from the church in their house; that is, from their Christian family, or from the Christian assembly which used to meet in their house for the worshipping of God. Happy that family-governor, who has a church in his house, with Aquila and Priscilla: who worships God with all his house, as did Cornelius; who with his household serves the Lord, as did Joshua; who commands his children and his household after him, as did faithful Abraham. Observe, 2. The nature and manner of his salutation; They salute him in the Lord: that is, with a spiritual affection, for the grace of God that is in you, and wishing you an overflowing stream of spiritual blessings from Christ the fountain. Next, he wills them to salute one another with an holy kiss, a kiss of peace and charity, with which Christians in those times, and according to the custom of those countries, used to salute one another; this was not then a wanton, but an holy kiss, in which they had chaste and holy thoughts; yet afterwards, the piety and purity of the church degenerating and declining, it was thought fit and convenient to lay this kiss of charity aside, which was used in the public assemblies at the celebration of the holy communion. That which is innocent in itself and pious in its first intendment, may in time fall under such abuse, as to cause it to be wholly laid aside. Lastly, He adds his own salutation with his own hand. It is generally believed, that the apostle employed some person to write his epistles over, which he sent abroad unto the churches; yet that he might prevent fraud and forgery, and that they might know which were his own, he used to subscribe his salutation and apostolical benediction with his own hand, which was well known unto them.

22 If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha.

That is, If any man do either oppose Christ and his gospel, or apostatize and backslide from his holy profession, and thereby discover he had no sincere love for Christ, let him be accursed till the Lord comes to judgment: and when he comes to judgment, let him without repentance lie under a dreadful, yea, an eternal curse. Observe here, How that those who do not sincerely love our Lord Jesus, are under the heaviest and bitterest of divine curses. Note, 1. The ground or cause of this curse: the not loving of Jesus Christ: He doth not say, If any man hate Christ, or reproach and blaspheme him, or persecute and injure him; but, if he doth not love him. The bare want of this affection to Christ, is enough eternally to separate us from Christ.—Note, 2. The nature of this curse; Let him be Anathema, Maran-atha. The apostle pronounces the curse in two languages, Greek and Syriac, to denote both the vehemency of his own spirit in speaking, and the certainty of the thing spoken; or perhaps to shew, that men of all nations and languages who love not Christ, are under a curse, and that they are deservedly cursed among all nations. The Greek word Anathema, signifies execrable; the Syriac word, Maran-atha, is a compound of Maron Lord, and Atha he cometh. These words were used anciently in the most dreadful sentence of excommunication; as if they had cited the person to the tribunal of Christ at his coming to judge the world, or left him bound under the curse of that sentence until the coming of Christ. Note, 3. The extent of this curse: If any man; As if he had said, Let him, be who he will, that loves not Christ, Jew or Gentile, bond or free, male or female, rich or poor, young or old, prince or peasant, king or beggar, who have opportunities to know Christ, and yet do not love him, let him be accursed by him to eternal ages; let him be fully separated from the society of Christians here in this world, and from all fellowship and communion with Christ finally in the world to come. The sum is this, That those who love not our Lord Jesus Christ, much more those who wilfully hate and oppose him and his holy laws, are accursed persons in this life, and devoted to destruction here; but when our Lord shall come to judge the world at the last and great day, they shall be accursed more openly and solemnly; when they shall stand before that impartial Judge of the world, they shall receive from his mouth a final malediction, an irreversible execration, which shall be immediately succeeded with the anguish and torments of eternity.

23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.

24 My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen.

Observe here, Our apostle's valediction; it is a benediction: He takes his farewell of them with prayer for them; The grace, or gracious favour, of Christ be with you, and multiply all blessings, both spiritual and temporal, upon you: I am sure I love you all in Christ Jesus, and for his sake. Happy is it when ministers can take their farewell of their flocks in this manner, with fervent supplications for them, and with solemn, yet serious protestations of the fervour of their love, and the ardency of their affection towards them. Amen.

SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL

Corinthians.

The occasion of St. Paul's writing this second Epistle to the Corinthians, was to vindicate his person from divers imputations which were charged upon him by the false apostles, and to defend his ministry and apostleship against some that sought to bring both himself and that into disgrace and contempt: Such ministers as study, and seek that they may excel to the edifying of the church, must expect to encounter with the violent opposition, and virulent imputations of men of perverse minds, who either cannot, or will not, do so well themselves.

Our great apostle here was charged by the false apostles with inconstancy, in promising to come to Corinth, and not coming; with pride and imperiousness, with vanity and vain-glory, in reference to the incestuous person; they represented him as contemptible in his person, as despicable in his ministry. He therefore confutes, yea, and confounds his adversaries by a new and unusual way of arguing; namely, by boasting of his sufferings, glorying in them, and giving a large catalogue and long inventory of them; he displays his calamities, blazons his crosses, vindicates his person and authority from contempt, clears himself from the charge and imputation of levity and vain-glory, by rehearsing the good services he had done, and the great sufferings he had undergone, for the sake of Christ, and his holy religion. Whence we learn, That it is neither unchristian or unseemly to enlarge upon our own actions and sufferings, when there is a great and necessary occasion so to do, namely, when the glory of God, the credit of our holy religion, and a just vindication of our own integrity and innocency, doth require it, and call for it.

CHAP. I.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia;

2 Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. The writer of this epistle described by his name, Paul; by his office, An apostle of Jesus Christ, with the manner how he obtained this office of an apostle, namely, by the will of God: it was not man; but God that called him to the apostleship. It is of great concern and consequence both to ministers and people to be fully informed and thoroughly satisfied of that divine call, which their spiritual guides have to come amongst them; that the ministers may be able to say, "We come to you in the name of the Lord;" and the people may be able to reply, "We receive you as ambassadors from the Lord unto us." Paul an apostle by the will of God. Observe, 2. A person conjoined with St. Paul in the writing of this epistle, and he is also described two ways; by his name, Timothy; by his relation, our brother. Where note, The great humility and condescension of St. Paul, that though far superior to Timothy in years, and more transcendent in office, and more eminent in grace, yet he doth not assume and arrogate all to himself, but makes another sit, as it were, upon the throne with him; so humble and condescending was this holy man to one so far inferior to him, both in office and grace. Note, also, The happy advantage of Timothy in being with St. Paul, and having the happy privilege of being instructed and directed by so great an apostle; happy was it for young Timothy, that ever he came into old Paul's family. Learn thence, That it is an happy advantage to such who in their younger years are dedicated to, and designed to be set apart for the work of the ministry, to be under the inspection and care, the guidance and conduct of those who are more aged, and better experienced than themselves; Paul an apostle, and Timothy our brother. Observe, 3. The persons to whom this epistle is written and directed; To the church of God which is at Corinth; Corinth was a city famous for wealth and riches, but most infamous for lewdness and uncleanness; here was a temple dedicated to Venus, where were a thousand virgins set apart to be prostituted to the lusts of men; so that Korinthioi, so Corinthians; is as much as to be lascivious and unchaste; and after many of them were converted to Christianity, yet did the sin of uncleanness so much abound amongst them, that the apostle doth industriously set himself against it, and warns them of the sin and danger of it, in both his epistles wrote unto them. However, as had as Corinth was, God told Paul, Acts xviii. that he had much people in that city; and accordingly, he spent a year and a half amongst them, in preaching to them, in converting and confirming of them. Learn thence, That even amongst the most profane and unlikely people upon earth, God may, and sometimes doth gather a church unto himself. See what monsters of men these Corinthians were, 1. Cor. vi. 11. "Whoremongers, adulterers, effeminate, abusers of themselves with mankind;" and he tells them not only such persons, but Tartar, such things were some of them; but now washed, &c. Oh the sovereignty and wonderful efficacy of the grace of God, in cleansing souls, more black than ever was Ethiopian's face! Though man cannot, yet God can, and sometimes does cause figs to grow on thorns, and grapes to grow on thistles. Observe, 4. Our apostle's salutation of, and prayer for this church at Corinth: "Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." Where note, 1. The mercies and blessings prayed for, grace and peace, spiritual blessings, and comprehensive blessings. Note, 2. The original cause and spring from whence those blessings flow, from God the Father and from Jesus Christ; from the Father as the fountal cause, and from Christ as the procuring cause, the dispenser of these blessings. A good argument to prove the divinity of Christ: He that can dispense grace and peace, of, and from himself, is God; but Christ doth this, therefore he is God; Grace be to you, and peace from our Lord Jesus Christ.

3 I Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort;

4 Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God.

Observe here, 1. The several gracious and comfortable titles which the apostle gives to Almighty God; he styles him, 1. The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; so he is by nature; and Christ his Son by eternal and ineffable generation: For as the words, our Lord, ascribed here to Christ, do not exclude the Father from being Lord; so the word, God, ascribed here to God the Father, excludes not Christ from being our God; and as God is the Father of Christ, so he is a Father in him to all that have union with him. 2. The Father of Mercies, a most amiable and comfortable relation; not the Father of mercy, or a merciful Father barely; but the Father of mercies, in the plural number, to denote the greatness and multitude of his mercies, and that all mercies flows from him only and freely, as streams from an over-flowing and never-failing fountain. 3. The God of all Comfort; because by giving his Holy Spirit, the Comforter, he is the author of all that consolation which is conferred upon us. Observe, 2. The duty here performed by the apostle, that of blessing God, or thanksgiving; Blessed be God, &c. Learn, That blessing and praising God for all mercies, but especially for spiritual mercies, is a duty which all the people of God ought especially to be careful of, and abounding in: the more you bless God, the more you shall have cause to bless him; he will multiply blessings upon you for your thankfulness to him. Observe, 3. The particular favour which the apostle blesses and praises God for; namely, for comforting his children in all their tribulations. Learn hence, That as God is the only comforter of his people at all times, so he is their best comforter in the worst of times. There is no tribulation or affliction that the people of God can fall into, but God can and will comfort them therein: "Blessed be God who comforteth us in all our tribulations." Observe, 4. The gracious end and merciful design of God in comforting his saints and servants, in and under all their pressures, tribulations and afflictions; it is, "That they may be able to comfort them which are in trouble, by the comfort wherewith they themselves have been comforted of God." Learn hence, That God doth often exercise many of his ministers, and some of his particular saints and servants, in a very exemplary manner, with trials and afflictions, for this great end amongst others, that they may be experimentally able to instruct and comfort such, who either are or may hereafter fall into the same disconsolate condition with themselves; none so fit to advise and counsel, to instruct and comfort a suffering saint, as an afflicted minister or Christian, who have, together with their afflictions, experienced the favour of divine consolations: "That we may comfort others, as we ourselves have been comforted of God."

5 For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation all aboundeth by Christ.

Note here, 1. That the saints' sufferings are here called the sufferings of Christ. The head suffers in the members because the members suffer for the sake of the head. Note, 2. That the saints' sufferings in the cause, and for the sake of Christ, are sometimes overflowing and excessive sufferings; the sufferings of Christ abound in us. Note, 3. That as a Christian's sufferings are for Christ, so are their comforts and consolations from him; yea, their comforts do bear some proportion to their sufferings: As our sufferings abound, so our consolation abounds by Christ.

6 And whether we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effectual in the enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer: or whether we be comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation.

As if the apostle had said, "What sufferings soever I have met with in my ministerial office, you have the benefit of them, and special advantage by them; and therefore you ought not to despise me upon the account of my sufferings (as do the false apostles, and would have you do) but you ought the more to honour me for them, and be encouraged yourselves by them; and when I am comforted, it is beneficial for your consolation, inasmuch as you may confidently expect the same relief." Learn hence, That the sufferings and afflictions, which we endure for Christ, do not only turn to our own good, but rebound greatly to the good and benefit of the church of God, and consequently should not disanimate or dishearten our fellow Christians, but rather be matter of comfort or consolation to them; "If we be afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation." He adds, "If we be comforted, it is for your consolation also." Thereby plainly intimating to us, that Almighty God doth by all his dispensations, both of mercy and correction, promote and carry on the salvation of his own children and people.

7 And our hope of you is steadfast, knowing that as ye are partakers of the sufferings; so shall ye be also of the consolation.

Here St. Paul tells the body of the Corinthians, that he had a good hope concerning them, that as they had endured sufferings for Christ, so they would still endure them; assuring them, that they should share no less in consolation than they did in affliction. Learn hence, That such as suffer for Christ, or own those that suffer for him, shall be interested in all that joy and consolation which such sufferings and sufferers shall receive from God: "As you are partakers of the sufferings, so shall you be of the consolation also."

8 For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble which came to us in Asia, that we were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life:

Observe here, 1. That it is of no small benefit and advantage, but of excellent use to us, to know what are the troubles and afflictions, which do befall the servants of God for righteousness' sake: "We would not have you ignorant of our trouble." Observe, 2. How pressing the troubles and afflictions were which this apostle underwent; "They were out of measure, above strength, and even to the despairing of life." Thence note, That God may, and sometimes does exercise his servants with such extreme and pressing trials, that all their own natural strength is unable to support them under them, or carry them through them; "We were pressed above strength, and despaired even of life."

9 But we had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raised the dead;

Observe here, The great and imminent danger which the apostle was in; his very life was in hazard, nay, even despaired of; he looked upon himself as a dead man: But when he had thus sentenced himself, a divine power, which wrought above all his thoughts and rational conjectures, revived him, and revived him. Hence learn, That the Almighty power of God sometimes works beyond all creature expectations, beyond all human probabilities, beyond all rational conjectures, to help and deliver his people in hopeless and helpless troubles.

10 Who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver us:

Observe here, The deliverer, God; the delivered, St. Paul and the saints that were in Asia with him; the deliverance itself, or the imminent and impending evil delivered from, death, great death, so great a death. Learn, 1. That in times of great and imminent danger, God, and God alone, is the immediate deliverer of his children and people... Learn, 2. That it is the property of a precious heart, to magnify and enhance the deliverances of a gracious God: He hath delivered us from so great a death, &c. Learn, 3. That past and present experience of God's power and goodness towards his people, may and ought to encourage them to trust in him for time to come; former experience ought to encourage us to future dependence; when we can say, God hath delivered, and doth deliver, let our faith add, "In him we trust, that he will yet deliver."

11 Ye also helping together by prayer for us, that, for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

Our apostle having commemorated the goodness and power of God in former deliverances, and expressed his assurance of present and future deliverances, doth in this verse excite and exhort the faithful at Corinth to help and further him with their prayers: Ye also helping together by prayers for us. Where observe, The humility of the apostle, in desiring the people's prayers for himself. Such as are most eminent in gifts and office, yea, and in grace too, do really want, and heartily desire the help and benefit of their prayers, who are far inferior to them in the church of God. And verily, the people do owe unto their spiritual guides as a debt of service, their earnest prayers for them; herein they are not only serviceable to them, but kind to themselves. Observe farther, The great reason why St. Paul was so desirous of the Corinthians' prayers, that deliverance and mercy being obtained thereby, praise and thanksgiving might be rendered to God on his behalf. Learn, That when by prayer any mercy is obtained by us, it is our duty, by praise and thanksgiving to acknowledge the same to God. What is obtained by prayer, should be owned by thankfulness: God forbid we should be clamorous in asking favours, and dumb and tongue tied in returning thanks.

12 ¶ For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God we have had our conversation in the world, and more abundantly to you-ward.

Observe here, 1. That though St. Paul did not put confidence and trust in his sincerity and Christian grace, yet he did rejoice and holily glory in the evidence of his grace, and in the testimony of a sincere and upright conscience; Our rejoicing is this. Learn hence, That an holy glorying and rejoicing in the graces of God, which, upon good and sufficient grounds we find evident in ourselves, is lawful and allowable. A Christian may and ought to rejoice, not only in the confidence of Christ's merits, but also in the conscience of his own sincerity. Observe, 2. The particular grace evidenced, which the apostle took comfort in; His sincerity and godly simplicity; that is, his uprightness both of heart and life, his freedom from guile and hypocrisy. Thence note, That the conscience of sincerity is such a crown of rejoicing, as will support a Christian's spirit under and against the greatest difficulties which may arise in any condition. This sincerity discovers itself in its acting by a right rule, from a right principle, and to a right end; and it supports a man's spirit in the duty of a prayer, under the burden of slander and reproach in the dark night of affliction, in the disconsolate hour of death, and at the dreadful day of judgment. Observe, 3. That it is not a single act of sincerity, but a constant course of upright walking, that our apostle rejoiced and took comfort in: "We have had our conversation in the world, in all simplicity and godly sincerity." It is not a single action, but a series of good actions, that administrators comfort: As God doth not judge of our state and condition by a particular action, no more should we, but by the general bent of our resolutions, and the constant course and tenor of our conversations: "Our rejoicing is this, that by the grace of God we have had our conversation in the world."

13 For we write none other things unto you than what ye read or acknowledge, and I trust ye shall acknowledge even to the end;

The apostle having asserted his own sincerity and upright conversation in the former verse, he doth in this verse make his appeal to the conscience of the Corinthians for his justification. It is a good demonstration of our uprightness, when we can not only appeal to God as touching our sincerity, but dare appeal to the consciences of men; for if, through prejudice, they will not with their mouth's vouch our integrity, yet secretly with their consciences they cannot but bear witness to it. Observe, 2. The apostle's having declared, that he had his testimonials, not only from his own conscience, but from theirs also; he adds, that he trusted this would hold and continue even to the end; that is, to the end both of his and their lives. As if the apostle had said, "My conversation hath hitherto been acknowledged by you to be sincere and upright; and I hope, as you shall never see it otherwise by me, so you will persevere and continue in your good opinion and right judgment concerning me, to the end of your and my life."

14 As also ye have acknowledged us in part, that we are your rejoicing, even as ye also are ours, in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Observe here, 1. The great trial which St. Paul met with from the Corinthians, whose spiritual father he was; though he had served them with great faithfulness, yet they did acknowledge him but in part. There was a time when he was high in their esteem; Who but Paul? None but he: But now a great part leave him, and admire others. Learn hence, What great levity, fickleness, and inconstancy, may be found in good men in general, and what great mutability and changeableness of affection in particular to their ministers and spiritual guides, though never so sincere and faithful. Although St. Paul, with a laborious diligence, and divine success, had planted and propagated the Christian faith amongst them, yet now, not only his person, but his very office falls under contempt by many of them. None more than ministers do experience this truth, that nothing is so mutable as the mind of man: Though ministers are the same, and their message the same, though they continue burning and shining lights, though they burn out and consume life, health, and estate, among and for their people, yet it is only for a season, for an hour, for a short time, at their first coming amongst them, that they rejoice in their light: You have acknowledged us in part. Observe, 2. That notwithstanding the contempt cast upon St. Paul by some in the church of Corinth, yet there were others among them who did greatly rejoice in him, and bless God for him, and he for them! We are your rejoicing, and ye are ours, as being converted by us; and I trust we shall be a farther joy and mutual rejoicing each to the other in the day of our Lord Jesus. Learn hence, What unspeakable rejoicings and joyful congratulations there will be in the day of Christ, between laborious faithful ministers and their believing obedient hearers. "Lord! (will the Christian say) this was the blessed instrument, under God, of my happy illumination and conversion; by the blessing of thy Spirit upon his ministry, my soul was begotten unto Christ." But, on the other hand, if we be ignorant or lazy, unskilful or unfaithful, in our office, our people will come in against us as swift witnesses in the day of Christ: And, Lord! what an intolerable aggravation will it be of our misery in hell, to have any of our people thus upbraiding us? "Oh cruel man! that sawest my soul in danger, but never dealt faithfully and plainly with me; the same time that we spent together in sin and vanity, in sensual mirth and jollity, might have been instrumental to save us both from this place of torment." Let ministers consider themselves as witnesses for God, and their people as witnesses for or against them; and under that consideration, so study, preach, and pray; so live, walk, and act, that they may with this great apostle, take God to record, that they are free from the blood of all men.

15 ¶ And in this confidence I was minded to come unto you before, that ye might have a second benefit;

Observe here, 1. The apostle's steady purpose, and fixed resolution to come and spend some time amongst the Corinthians: "I was minded to come unto you." Where a faithful minister has good hopes and confidence of doing good amongst a people, there is great encouragement for coming to them, and abiding with them. When the ministers of Christ find that God has farther converting work, or edifying work for them to do in a particular place amongst his people, they will not, they must not, yea, they dare not forsake them for outward advantages. Observe, 2. The end of St. Paul's purpose and resolution to come to them, "That they might have a second benefit." The first benefit was their conversion, the second benefit was their confirmation; confirmation in the faith, and reformation, both in life and manners. It is not sufficient, that by our ministry we plant a church, and gather a people out of the world by external and visible profession; but there is farther need of daily industry, and continual care, to water what we have planted, to cultivate and dress that corner of our Lord's vineyard, which is under our particular inspection and care. Oh that our people had hearts to cry out, and say, Lord, not the first time only, but the second, yea, all my life, make me partaker of this benefit.

16 And to pass by you into Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia unto you, and of you to be brought on my way toward Judea.

Observe here, 1. How the heart of this holy apostle was carried forth in the service of God and souls, and how accordingly he orders all his journeys from one place to another, and determines his continuance and stay, longer in one place than another, as the glory of God, the advantage of the gospel, and the church's necessities did require: "I design to pass by you into Macedonia, &c." It is the duty of the ministers of Christ, not only to lay out themselves for the glory of God, and the good of souls, but to project, forecast, and contrive how they may do it in the best and most advantageous manner, for the furtherance of the gospel. Yet, 2. Observe, The difference between this extraordinary apostle then, and ordinary pastors of the church now. The apostles had an universal commission to plant churches in all places; they were to be in constant travels up and down the world, itinerary preachers from place to place: But the office of an ordinary pastor now is, to watch over a particular flock, and to keep constant residence amongst them. Yet though by actual relation he is tied and bound to a particular flock, he is, by habitual and aptitudinal disposition, a minister of the universal church, and a debtor to the public good thereof. He is first made a minister to the universal church, and then a pastor of a particular congregation: and accordingly, though he seeks to serve the interest of his own flock first, yet it is his duty, by prayer, by study, by preaching, by writing, by all other edifying ways and methods, to promote the universal good and benefit of the whole church of Christ, according to his power, both far and near.

17 When I, therefore, was thus minded, did I use lightness? or the things that I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh, that with me there shall be yea, yea, and nay, nay?

Here our apostle begins to make his apology and defence for himself for changing his purpose in coming to Corinth according to promise, and to free himself from the imputation of levity, inconstancy, and falsehood, cast upon him by his back friends, the false apostles, for promising to come to Corinth, and not performing it; for they aggravated the matter so far, as if he were one that said and unsaid, one that took no care about keeping his word; and thence inferred, that no regard was to be had to any thing that he delivered. "He that is not to be relied upon, say the false apostles, in his ordinary promises, how can you depend upon what he says to you in his preaching?" Hence learn, That lightness and inconstancy is a great sin and reproach in any, but especially in the ministers of the gospel, who yet are often charged with it, when they are in no degree guilty of it. Observe, 2. As our apostle frees himself from the charge of inconstancy, so from the suspicion of acting for worldly advantage: "The things which I purpose, do I purpose according to the flesh?" that is, for carnal ends or secular interest, that with me there should be now, Yea, yea; and anon, Nay, nay. Behold here! what truth and steadiness was found in and with our holy apostle; how his words and intentions, his tongue and his heart, his pen and his purpose were one, namely, in reality to come unto them, though he was providentially hindered and obstructed. Here let us remark and note, What little things the men of the world will take advantage from, to vilify and lessen the reputation of God's faithful servants, especially his ministers. How many persons might have promised to be in such a place, at such a time, and have failed, without being reproached for breach of promise? The world would have been so charitable to another person, as to have excused it; by saying, "The man spake according to his present intention and resolution, but was hindered by the providence of God;" but if Paul fails in a tittle, he must be loaded presently, upbraided for his inconstancy, or, which is worse, charged with playing fast and loose for sinister ends, and worldly advantages. Lord, give thy servants, especially thy ministers, wisdom to walk with exactness and circumspection before the men of the world, who are their watchful observers, and bold censurers, that they may cut off all occasion from them that seek occasion against them.

18 But as God is true, our word toward you was not yea and nay.

By the word here, some understand St. Paul's promise to come to Corinth, that he did very sincerely intend to come unto them; as if he had said, "As God is true to his promise, so has he taught me to be true to mine." Others understand by the word, St. Paul's preaching, that his doctrine was not mutable and changeable, but always the same. Here note, How ready and forward the adversaries of religion are from any real or supposed imperfections in the ministers of God, presently to blame and burden their ministry, to charge their private errors and mistakes upon their doctrine. There is a mighty propensity, and great forwardness in bad men, to cast all the imperfections of the ministers of the gospel upon their ministry and doctrine.—The devil is glad of an opportunity, by the failings of preachers, to bring the doctrines they preach either into doubt or disesteem. But though it be a great reproach for a minister to be mutable and contradictory in his doctrine, yet the wicked world do often accuse them of it, and charge them with it, when there is not the least occasion for it; "Verily, as God is true, our word was not yea and nay."

19 For the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who was preached among you by us, even by me, and Sylvanus, and Timotheus, was not yea and nay, but in him was yea.

This verse contains a new argument for the constancy and immutability of St. Paul's doctrine, drawn from the subject-matter of his preaching; namely, Jesus Christ. As Christ is always one and the same, whom himself and other ministers did preach, so is our doctrine one and the same also. Note here, 1. The subject-matter of St. Paul's preaching, what was the sum of his own and his companions' sermons, (Sylvanus and Timotheus,) it was not his own imaginations, or the Jewish rites and ceremonies, but Christ in his nature and offices; "The Son of God, Jesus Christ, was preached among you by us." Note, 2. The happy unity and accord, which was found among all these ministers, St. Paul, Sylvanus and Timotheus, in preaching Christ. O blessed agreement! when all the ministers of God with one consent conspire and agree to advance and extol our Lord Jesus Christ. Note, 3. That the course of St. Paul's and his assistants' preaching, was like the great subject of their preaching, Christ Jesus, fixedly and unchangeably the same; not yea at one time, and nay at another. Learn thence, That it is a proper note of God's truth, and the true preachers thereof, that they are always one and the same, always yea, and not yea and nay; there is no change or contrariety in their doctrines.

20 For all the promises of God in him are Yea, and in him Amen, unto the glory of God by us.

Our apostle had proved in the foregoing verse the constancy of his own doctrine, which he preached from the immutability and constancy of Christ, the subject of it. Here he proveth Christ to be unchangeable, in that all the promises which God hath made to us, are fulfilled both in him and by him. "All the promises of God in him are Yea, and Amen;" that is, verified and fulfilled in him, and confirmed by him to us. Learn, 1. That God has made promises, many promises to his people. 2. That all the promises which God has made to his people, are made in Christ, and ratified by him. Christ acts the part and office of a surety; he undertakes, and engages for God, that all which he hath promised shall be made good to us.—Learn, 3. That the promises made by God, and ratified and confirmed in Christ, do all tend to the glory of God. They shew the sovereignty of his grace, in making promises to his creatures, of mercy, who deserve nothing but flaming vengeance, and implacable fury. They shew the amplitude of his grace; for if grace did not flow abundantly from the heart of God towards us, we could never have received so large a stock of promises from him. Let us then glorify God, by setting a just value upon his promises, as the unchangeable assurances of his love and grace.

21 Now be which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God:

22 Who hath also sealed us; and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.

In these two verses we have four very great and noble privileges, which the apostle declares God had conferred upon the Corinthians: namely, his establishing, anointing, and sealing of them, and giving the earnest of his Holy Spirit to them. First, their establishment: "He which established us with you is God." Learn thence, That a people's establishment in the doctrine of the gospel, and in the faith of the promises, is alone the gracious work of God. We are naturally like the reeds shaken with every wind; it is the establishing grace of God that makes us pillars in the church. Again, secondly, Their anointing, this is from God; the sanctifying grace of God is often in scripture compared to oil, in regard of its effects. It refresheth the weary, it healeth the wounded, it comforts the heart, it beautifies the face, it strengthens the limbs. Such internal virtues and excellencies bath the sanctifying grace of God in the hearts of the people. Thirdly, their sealing; "Who hath also sealed us." God's sealing of his children doth imply his high valuation and esteem of them: what is sealed is esteemed very precious: It implies their safety and security: what is under seal, is not in danger of being lost. Again, Sealing doth imply secrecy and privacy; that which is sealed is secret and hidden; it is the new name, which none knows but he that receiveth it. Finally, Sealing is for confirmation: contracts and bargains among men are confirmed by hand and seal. Thus the graces of the Spirit, which sanctify us, do also witness and seal to us the assurance of God's love and special favour in Jesus Christ. The fourth privilege here conferred by God upon the Corinthians, is "his giving the earnest of his spirit" in their hearts: Grace wrought in the heart here, is a sure earnest of glory hereafter; there is a great deal of difference between a shilling, a single piece of money, and a shilling that is an earnest of a greater sum. It is joy to find grace in the soul, as grace mortifying our corruptions; but it rejoices much more to look upon grace as an earnest of glory, as the first-fruits which insure the full crop.

23 Moreover, I call God for a record upon my soul, that to spare you I came not as yet unto Corinth.

In these words, our apostle doth assure the Corinthians, in a very solemn manner, that it was not any inconstancy or carnal respect in himself that made him delay his coming to them, but it was purely to spare them, as being unwilling to come with his rod among them, and to use severity upon them. Here observe the apostle's manner of speech, it is by way of adjuration; I call God to record upon my soul. The words are an assertory and execratory oath, wherein God is called to witness the truth of what he said. Learn hence, That it is lawful for Christians under the gospel to swear upon a necessary and great occasion. But what great occasion was here for St. Paul to do it? Ans. Very great; the false apostles did accuse him for a vain glorious and inconstant man. This accusation did redound to the discredit of his ministry, the dishonour of the gospel, the destruction of the church; therefore he solemnly protests, that no inconstancy or worldly motives did cause him to delay his promises: but a wise and spiritual consideration of their good, a willingness to spare them, and an unwillingness to use severity upon them. Hence learn, That the ministerial power which God giveth the officers of the church ought to be managed with much holy prudence, and Christian commiseration: The end of their power should always be in their mind, which is edification, and not destruction.

24 Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand.

As if the apostle had said, "Though we have a ministerial power, yet we have not a magisterial dominion over you, to treat as we please the professors of the gospel, or to punish those that walk not according thereunto." Learn hence, That though Christ has invested the officers of the church with a ministerial power, yet they have not thereby any dominion over the faith of believers; Not that we have dominion over your faith: He adds, But are helpers of your joy. He doth not say, We are helpers of your grace, helpers of your faith, helpers of your holiness, though this is necessarily implied: but helpers of your joy and comfort. Note thence, that a special part of the minister's work, consists in administering to the comfort and consolation of such as stand in need of it, and are qualified for it. Our first work is to help the graces, our next to help the comforts, of our people. The Spirit of God is a sanctifier, and then a comforter: Joy is not the first stone in God's building; grace and holiness is first, comfort and consolation next. For by faith ye stand; ye have stood and do stand steadfast in the faith; that is, the generality and body of you; though some among you deny the resurrection, yet the best and greatest part of you are found in the faith, and steadfast in the faith. Our apostle doth not unchurch them, because of some disorders among them, nor because of some heretical doctrines found with them, but endeavours to reform their disorders, that so when he came unto them, he might not come with his rod, but in the spirit of meekness.

CHAP. II.

Our apostle having, in the former chapter, vindicated himself from the imputation of levity and inconstancy charged upon him by the false apostles, because he resolved to come to this church at Corinth, and promised so to do; but contrary to his intention, was providentially obstructed in the performance of his promise: He comes in this chapter to vindicate himself from the aspersions of too much rigour, and too great severity towards the incestuous person; assuring them that it was no pleasure to him to make them sorrowful; and that no manner of severity should be exercised by him, any farther than was absolutely needful in order to the reforming of evil manners that were found amongst them. Accordingly, he thus bespeaks them, ver. 1.

BUT I determined this with myself, that I would not come again to you in heaviness.

2 For if I make you sorry, who is he then that maketh me glad, but the same which is made sorry by me?

The occasion of St. Paul's writing again to the Corinthians, and deferring for the present to come unto them, is here intimated. There was an incestuous person in the church of Corinth who had married his father's wife; if she were his own natural mother, the sin was prodigious and unnatural, that the child of her womb should be the husband of her bed; if she were his mother-in-law, it was against the law of reverence, and an heinous sin for the son to uncover the father's nakedness. And it was an aggravation of the sin, that the person committing it was a Christian, a member, and, as some think, a minister of the church of Corinth. St. Paul, in his former epistle, chap. v. commands them to excommunicate this incestuous person, which accordingly they did; and this spiritual physic, applied to the offender, had a good effect upon him; for, being punished by the church, he punisheth himself; and being cast out of the church, he casts away his sin. Happy is it, when the church's censures are so executed, as to bring offenders to a sight and sense of their sins, in order to a deep humiliation, and thorough reformation. Now, says the apostle, I determined not to come unto you in heaviness: that is, one great reason why I put off my journey to you, was this, that my coming amongst you might neither occasion sorrow, nor create heaviness, either to you or myself; for I delight not in censuring and chiding, when I can otherwise avoid it: For if I make you sorry, and myself with you, who is it that can make me glad, but he that is made sorry by me? that is, nothing can make me glad, but the reformation of the fallen person. Where note, That nothing adds so much to the joy and comfort of the ministers of Christ, as the recovery of revolted souls from under the empire and dominion of sin and Satan. We joy with them, and rejoice in God for them; we live as we see any of you stand fast in the Lord, we die as we see others stick fast in their sins.

3 And I wrote this same unto you, lest when I came, I should have sorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice having confidence in you all, that my joy is the joy of you all.

As if the apostle had said, I gave you a sharp reproof in my former epistle, but it was in such love, and upon a good design: namely, to procure such a reformation of life and manners among you, as might prevent my sorrow when I come unto you: For as your grief is my grief, so my joy is the joy of you all. As the ministers of Christ and their beloved people are one, so their griefs are one, and their joys one; they rejoice together, and mourn together; their griefs and sorrows are mutual, and their joys and comforts are reciprocal.

4 For out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears; not that you should be grieved, but that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you.

Here our compassionate apostle tells them, That what he had wrote in his former epistle with some severity and sharpness, concerning the incestuous person, was so far from being written with any intention to grieve them, that it was a real affliction to him, a very heavy pressure upon his heart, which fetch abundance of tears from his eyes, and consequently was an effect of the greatest love imaginable. Hence note, That when the ministers of Christ do execute church-censures, if they do not dispense them with tenderness and compassion, so as to let the offenders see that what is done is not of abundant love unto them, they will never be the better for them, nor be bettered or reclaimed by them. Doth a civil judge weep when he passes sentence upon a malefactor? Much more should an ecclesiastical judge mourn, when he pronounceth the censures of the church upon notorious offenders. Behold the apostle here declaring with what anguish of spirit, and grief of heart, he wrote to have the sentence of excommunication executed and inflicted on the incestuous Corinthian; "Out of much affliction and anguish of heart, I wrote unto you with many tears."

5 But if any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me but in part: that I may not overcharge you all.

As if the apostle had said, This incestuous person, who hath caused so much grief to me by his sin, hath caused no little grief to you also, to the sounder part of you, even to all but those who were partakers with him in his sin; he hath grieved me in part only: you, as well as myself, having been grieved by him, and afflicted for him. Not only the ministers, but members of the church are affected with, and afflicted for, the scandal of professors' sins. St. Paul grieved but in part for the incestuous person's sin; the sounder part of the church mourned with him. Or, secondly, "He hath grieved me but in part, that I may not overcharge you;" It is as much as if he had said, "The grief and sorrow which I have had for the sin and scandal of this notorious offender, I am far, very far from charging upon the whole church; I dare not load you all with that imputation, as if you were involved in the guilt of it. 'Tis not only injurious, but very unjust to cast the dirt of professors' sin upon the face of their profession, or to charge the guilt of a particular person's mis-carriages upon the whole church or Christian society to which he doth belong. As religion justifies no man's faults, so no man's faults should condemn religion."

6 ¶ Sufficient to such a man is this punishment, which was inflicted of many.

Observe here, 1. The nature of that punishment which the holy apostle thought, and adjudged to be sufficient for the guilty person's sin, and that was excision, not destruction: excommunication, not death: The rejection of such a sinner from the communion of the church, by church-censure and discipline, was the punishment pronounced. Observe, 2. By whom and before whom this punishment of excommunication was executed and inflicted, namely, by the officers and governors of the church, (who had and have the power of the keys) in the presence, and with the consent of the whole church. In the primitive church, we have reason to believe, when any offender was to be excommunicated, the people were acquainted with the crime; the guilty person pleaded in their presence, they judged as your jury-men do of the matter of fact, they consented to the condemnation; but the sentence was not pronounced by them, but by the governors and officers of the church before them, and in their presence: And as the church or body of the people consented to the offender's rejection, so likewise to his re-admission to the communion of the church; but their actual admission was by the pastor and governor of the church, and not by the people. Contrary to this primitive practice is the modern practice of those, who have snatched the keys of the hands of the pastors (where Christ placed them) and put them into the hands of the people.

7 So that contrariwise, ye ought rather to forgive him, and comfort him, lest perhaps such an one should be swallowed up with overmuch sorrow.

8 Wherefore I beseech you, that ye would confirm your love toward him.

Observe, 1. The great duty which the apostle directs the Corinthians to the performance of, towards this sorrowful offender, to forgive him, to comfort him, to confirm him: that is, to absolve him from the sentence and censure of the church: no longer to continue their aversion to him, but to restore him to the church's communion, to re-admit him to their fellowship and society, to comfort him with the notice of God's pardoning mercy, and to confirm their love to him, by shewing, that their excommunicating of him was with design to reform, not to ruin him: to recover him by repenitance, and not to drive him to despair. This is the importance of the three several words which are used here, Forgive him, comfort him, confirm him. From whence note, That in notorious crimes, which give great cause of scandal to the church, the comfort of the offender depends not only upon his peace and reconciliation with God, but also upon the relaxation of the censures of the church, and his re-admission to the church's fellowship and communion; Forgive him, and confirm your love towards him. Observe, 2. The reason offered by our apostle why this penitent offender should be forgiven and comforted; namely, "Lest he should be swallowed up with over-much sorrow." Learn hence, 1. That sorrow even for sin itself may be excessive and over-much. 2. That excessive and over-much sorrow swalloweth up a person; it may swallow him up in the gulph of despair, and, as a consequent of it, in the gulph of death. As worldly sorrow causeth death, so may religious sorrow also even sorrow for sin. We may dishonour God by an excessive mourning, even for God's dishonour. Sorrow is not of any worth in itself, but only as it serves to a spiritual end and purpose: and when it is excessive, not only the comforts, but the gifts and usefulness of the person sorrowing, are in danger to be swallowed up by it. Quest. But when is sorrow for sin excessive and overmuch? Ans. When it obstructs the exercise of our graces, when it hinders the performance of our duties, when it hurts our health and overwhelms nature, when it perverts reason, swalloweth up faith, hindereth our hope, prejudice our joy, and unfits us both for doing and suffering the will of God: in a word, that sorrow for sin which keeps the soul from looking towards the mercy-seat, that keeps Christ and the soul asunder, and renders a person unfit for the service of God, and for the communion of saints, is a sinful sorrow.

9 For to this end also did I write, that I might know the proof of you, whether ye be obedient in all things.

10 To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive also: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it in the person of Christ;

11 Lest Satan should get an advantage of us: for we are not ignorant of his devices.

Observe here, 1. Our apostle declares what was his end in writing his former epistle to them, namely, this amongst others, to exercise their obedience, and to make trial what regard they would shew to his apostolical authority; whether they would be as obedient to his directions in absolving of penitents, as they were before in inflicting church-censures upon bold offenders: "For this end did I write, that I might have a proof of you." Observe, 2. The apostle declares his own forwardness to forgive penitent offenders himself, as well as make known his desires that they should do it: "Whom ye forgive, I forgive also in the person of Christ;" that is, as you forgive him, so do I; and I absolve him by Christ's authority, as I excommunicated him in Christ's name, 1 Cor. v. 4. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. As he delivered the incestuous person to Satan in the name of Christ, so in the name and person of Christ he releases him, and relaxes the sentence against him. The power of excommunication and absolution, of binding and loosing, of casting out, and receiving into the church, is by Christ committed to church-governors, who are to execute this power in the person of Christ; that is, in the name, and by the authority of Christ. Observe, 3. The arguments with which, and the motive by which, he presses the church at Corinth to forgive the incestuous person, and to re-admit him into their society, lest Satan get an advantage over us. What advantage? Ans. An advantage to lead them into sin thus, by their abusing that power which God had given them for edification, to the destruction of a person, by making them guilty of spiritual murder by their over-rigorous proceeding against him, by driving him to despair, by tempting him to apostacy. Satan sometimes, by too great slackness of discipline, seeks to lull sinners asleep in the bosom of the church; and sometimes by too great severity endeavours to drive them to despair. The force of the apostle's words lies thus: I advise you to continue the severity of discipline no longer towards this penitent offender, but receive him again into your communion with all tenderness and speed, lest Satan should circumvent you and over-reach you, and make use of your rigour to your own ruin, by rendering your doctrine hateful, and your discipline detestable; for we are not ignorant of his devices, his contrivances, plots and stratagems laid against us. Learn hence, 1. That Satan is a master in the art of deceiving souls: He is full, very full of cunning methods and devices, to circumvent persons, and catch them in the net of his deceits. Learn, 2. That it concerns all persons, but especially the ministers of the gospel, to be well acquainted with, and not ignorant of any devices or plots of Satan. Satan has a multitude of devices, by which he undoes, entangles and deceives souls; and no Christian ought to be ignorant of them, lest he be circumvented and undone by them: Many are his devices for drawing us into sin, for drawing us off from duty, for drawing us into temptation, for drowning us in despair: our wisdom will be, not to dispute, but to resist, for by resisting, our temptations will be fewer, and our strength greater, James iv. 7. Resist the devil and he will fly. Where note, that the promise of conquest is made to resisting, not disputing with Satan; to parly with him, is the way to be overcome by him.

12 Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, 13 I had no rest in my spirit, because I found not Titus my brother: but taking my leave of them, I went from thence into Macedonia.

14 ¶ Now thanks be unto God which always cause thus to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the favour of his knowledge by us in every place.

Observe here, 1. The unwearied diligence of this great apostle in travelling from place to place, and carrying the gospel with him from one city and nation to another: I came to Troas, and from thence to Macedonia. Observe, 2. The success which the holy apostle had in preaching the gospel with unwearied diligence in those places: A door was opened unto him of the Lord. This either signifies, 1. The free liberty which he had to preach the gospel in those places; the door of his mouth was not shut by persecutors, the enemies and opposers of the gospel; but the word of the Lord had a free course in the labours of its ministers. Or, 2. This opened door may signify and import the great and gracious success which God gave the apostle in his work; as God by his providence opened the apostle's mouth to preach and publish the glad tidings of the gospel, so by his holy Spirit he opened the people's hearts to receive and entertain the glad tidings of salvation which the gospel brought. Acts xvi. 14. "The Lord opened Lydia's heart, that she attended to the words which were spoken of Paul." Observe, 3. How careful the apostle is to ascribe the entire praise, and to return the whole thanks to Almighty God for all the gracious assistance and success which he had received in his ministerial service: "Thanks be to God which causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place." As if the apostle had said, "Blessed be God, although our enemies have been many, and our difficulties great, yet God has given me and my fellow apostles such resolution of mind, that we have not only encountered with them but triumphed over them, in a powerful conversion of so many from Heathenism to Christianity; and has enabled us to spread the sweet odour of the gospel far and near, by our laborious preaching of it from place to place." Then is the word, and God in the word, glorified, when the sword of the Spirit is taken into the hand of the Spirit; when he girds his sword upon his thigh, as most mighty, and rides on triumphantly, conquering and to conquer, in the hearts of his people, till he has consummated his victories in a glorious triumph over all the powers of hell and darkness, "Thanks be to God that causes us to triumph in Christ."

15 For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish.

16 To the one we are the savour of death unto death; and to the other the savour of life unto life:

Observe here, 1. The title given to the gospel, and to the preachers and dispensers of it; they are a savour, an allusion probably to the ointment of sweet perfume, which the high priests under the law were anointed with. The breath of the gospel is a sweet odour or smell, and God's faithful ministers are they that carry it, and blow it abroad to perfume sinners that lie stinking in their sins. Observe, 2. The contrary effects which the preaching of the gospel has upon those that sit under it; it is the savour of life unto some, of death unto others: Here it was so, the apostle's ministry was a savour of life to the believing Gentiles, of death to the unbelieving Jews; all men to be reckoned in a state of life or death of perishing, or being saved, according as they do, or do not receive the savour, and relish the doctrine of the gospel. But how comes the preaching of the gospel to be the savour of death unto some? Answer. Partly through pride, in not enduring to be reproved by the gospel; partly through prejudice against the ministers of the gospel; partly through slothfulness, in neglecting to come under the sound of the gospel; and partly through cursed infidelity, in not believing the message which the gospel brings. Thus is the gospel, which was ordained for life, the savour of death unto death. Observe, 3. The sweet support which God gives his faithful ministers in the discharge of their duty, though their doctrine fails of desired success; "they are a sweet savour unto God, as well in them that perish as in them that are saved." Lord! how would thy ministers be of all men most miserable, shouldst thou require the success of their labours at their hands; shouldst thou say, "Either reconcile my people unto me, or I will never be reconciled unto you;" But we shall be rewarded by thee, according to our faithfulness, not according to our people's fruitfulness. The faithful ministers of Christ are a sweet-smelling savour in the nostrils of God, as well in them that perish, as in them that are saved: Though Israel (their people) be not gathered, yet shall they be glorious: God will reward them, secundum laborem, non fructum: the nurse shall be paid for her care and pains, though the child dies at the breast.

And who is sufficient for these things?

As if the apostle had said, So great and so weighty is the work of preaching the everlasting gospel to a lost world, that neither myself, nor any of my fellow apostles, are sufficient for it of ourselves; Who is sufficient? That is, none are sufficient without proportionable strength and help from God, neither man, nor angel: To preach the gospel as it ought is a mighty work, a weighty work. If any think otherwise, it is either their ignorance or inadvertency that makes them think so. What? Is it an easy matter to search into the deep things of God, the great mysteries of the gospel, which have an unfathomable depth? Is it easy to instruct the ignorant, to convince the obstinate, to resolve the doubting, to reduce the wandering, to know the state of our flock, to visit the sick as we ought, to speak to them, and pray for them, as persons upon the confines of eternity? What! is all this, and much more, a trivial work, and common performance? No, verily: as there is no service more honourable than that of the ministry, so there is none more arduous and laborious; and therefore the greatest men, that ever God employed in and about this work, have been ready to sink under the apprehension of the insuperable difficulties that do attend it. If we consider how a gospel minister ought to excel in knowledge, in utterance, in prudence and conduct, in exemplary piety, in patient contending with a people's frowardness and perverseness, we need not wonder at our apostle's exclamation or expostulatory question in the words before us; Who is sufficient for these things?

17 For we are not as many, which corrupt the word of God: but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ.

Observe here, 1. The character which the apostle gives the false apostles who were crept in amongst the Corinthians; they were corrupters of the word of God; they did sophisticate and adulterate the sincere word of God, by intermixing their own pride and passions, their own inventions and imaginations, with the doctrine which they delivered. False teachers deal with the word, as some vintners deal with their wines; they imbase them in their nature, that they may advance them in their price, and thereby increase their own profit; they deliver the word of God in subtilty, but not in sincerity. Observe, 2. The declaration which the apostle makes of his own uprightness and integrity in preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ: As of sincerity, as of God, and in the sight of God, speak we in Christ; that is, we act as men of sincerity in what we do, as men taught of God, and sent by God, as men acted by the power, and guided by the Spirit of Christ, and all this as in the sight of God; we speak as from God, of God, in obedience to his command, and with an eye at his glory. He is a better preacher that speaks with an upright heart, than he that speaks with an eloquent tongue; he that acts from religious principles, for holy ends, as in the presence of the all-seeing God, and with a fixed eye at the glory of God in what he preaches, he is an interpreter, one of a thousand.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle in this chapter intimates to us how much the reputation of a minister's person is needful and necessary in order to the success of his ministry; and because the false apostles did seek by all artifices to lessen St. Paul's esteem among the Corinthians, he shewed that their conversion to Christianity was a full evidence of God's owning and approving of him as his ambassador, and a sufficient commendation of his person and ministry amongst them; which ministry he proves to be far more excellent than that of Moses, as the gospel of life and liberty is more glorious than the law of condemnation.

DO we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation to you or letters of commendation from you?

2 Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men;

3 Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshly tables of the heart.

Our apostle here expostulates the case with the Corinthians, why they would at any time hearken to the false apostles, who, by reflecting upon his person and ministry, made it needful for him to vindicate both from contempt and scorn. As if he had said, "What do I need to begin again in this second epistle, as I did in the first, to commend myself and the effects of my ministry among you? Or need I commendatory letters either to you or from you, as the false teachers amongst you have? No, verily, you yourselves, by your conversion to Christianity, and embracing the faith of the gospel, are a better attestation and testimonial to the world, of the success of my ministry, than any written epistle is or can be: For you are an epistle written in my heart; that is, your conversion by my ministry, is the joy and rejoicing of my heart; there it is that I continually carry a thankful and honourable remembrance of you, and bear you upon my heart, whenever I go in and out before the Lord. And as my epistle, you are known and read of all men; that is, all Christians far and near take notice of you as a church which God has eminently blessed my ministry to the conversion and edification of." But, lest the apostle should seem too assuming in calling the Corinthians his epistle, in the next words he calls them the epistle of Christ, ver. 3. Ye are the epistle of Christ ministered by us; that is, your faith and conversion was the work of Christ's Spirit, though wrought by my ministry; he having wrote his law in your hearts after a more excellent manner than any thing that can be written with ink and paper; not as the ten commandments of old were written, in tables of stone, but in the fleshly tables of the heart; that is, in your hearts made soft and pliable, and ready to obey the word and will of God, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, using my ministry as the pen or instrument in his hand in order thereunto. Learn hence, 1. That it is a very great favour from God, when his ministers can see the success of their labours in the hearts and lives of any of their people; when they can say, Ye are our epistle. Learn, 2. That nothing doth so highly commend our ministry as our people's proficiency; their improvement in knowledge, their steadfastness in the faith, their growth in grace and holiness, is beyond all verbal commendations and acknowledgments whatsoever. Sermons fetch not applause from men's renown, the people's practice is the preacher's crown. Learn, 3. That whatever success the faithful ministers of Christ meet with, either in the work of conversion or edification, among a people, they attribute the whole efficiency of it unto God, ascribing nothing more than a bare instrumentality to themselves: Ye are the epistle of Christ, says the apostle, ministered by us; Christ has written his law in your hearts by my ministry: As if he had said, Christ is the writer, the pen is the minister, the ink the Spirit, the paper or table that receives the impression is the heart, and the law of God the writing writ therein and thereupon.

4 And such trust have we through Christ to Godward;

Observe here, How the apostle encourages himself from the experience he had of the present success of his ministry, to hope for the favour of farther and future success: Such trust or confidence have we, through the grace of Christ, of the constant efficacy of our ministry, that he will still own and honour it, succeed and bless it. When God has rendered our labours acceptable and successful amongst a people, either for conversion or edification, it should encourage us to trust in God for the efficacious assistance of our ministry, and rendering us yet more successful amongst them, and a greater blessing to them.

5 Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves ; but our sufficiency is of God ;

6 ¶ Who also hath made us able ministers of the New Testament, not of the letter, but of the Spirit : for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle having made an apology and defence for himself, and his ministry, against those that did calumniate him, in the former verses : In the verse before us, he acknowledges his own inability for this work, and that his whole sufficiency for service was from God ; and this without doubt he mentions not only out of humility, but out of prudence also, in order to stop the mouths of those who might be apt to think he had too high an esteem of himself : As if the apostle had said, " Far be it from me to think that I could procure the success of my ministry, that I have any such sufficiency of myself to convert souls ; no, no, my sufficiency and success is all from God ; for alas ! there is no proportion between such a sublime and supernatural service as that of the gospel-ministry is, and the impotency and weakness of man : " Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God. Observe, 2. The free and full acknowledgment which the apostle makes of the great things which God hath done for him and by him : He did not find, but made him a minister, an able minister ; yea, an able minister of the New Testament, or new covenant ; not a preacher of the law of Moses, but of the gospel of Jesus : Who hath made us able ministers of the New Testament. To be a sufficient and successful gospel-minister is a very great favour from God to any person : The clay of the gospel is better than the gold of the temple ; the rags of the evangelical, more rich than the robes of the Levitical preacher : It is a great honour to be, and a greater favour to hear, the meanest gospel-preacher, than to hear all Moses' lectures. Observe, 3. How our apostle here insensibly slides into a comparison which he makes between the law of Moses and the gospel of Christ, in which he magnifies and prefers the latter above the former ; the law he calls the letter, the gospel the Spirit ; that is, a ministration of the Spirit. The letter killeth ; that is, the law condemneth and curseth the sinner, the transgressor of it ; but the Spirit of Christ revealed in the gospel, enableth, as well as directeth, to obey, and so giveth life. Note, here, How false the Quakers and others gloss is upon these words :—They by the letter, will understand the whole written word of God, contained in the scriptures of the Old and New Testament, the law and gospel both ; and by the Spirit, will have to be meant the inward and immediate teachings of the light within them. Others by the letter, understand the literal and historical sense of scripture in general ; and by the Spirit giving life, they understand the mystical and spiritual sense of scripture ; but it is evident from verse 3, that by the letter he understands the law engraven in stone, the law as delivered by Moses with an appearance of the glory of the Lord upon mount Sinai : And by the Spirit, is meant the blessed Spirit of Christ given to the apostles to enable them to preach the gospel, and conferred upon all believers that did obediently hear and receive it.

7 But if the ministration of death written and engraven in stones, was glorious, so that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses, for the glory of his countenance, which glory was to be done away :

8 How shall not the ministration of the Spirit be rather glorious ?

Our apostle, in this and the following verses, goes on with his comparison betwixt the law and the gospel, and shews the transcendency of the latter above the former.—Where note, 1. He calls the law again a killing law, or a ministration of death ; because it condemns men for the breach of it, to temporal and eternal death, without opening to them any door of hope. Note, 2. This law (he speaks of it by way of diminution) was only written upon, and engraven in stone ; whereas the gospel is written in the fleshly tables of men's hearts. Note, 3. How the apostle declares that this ministration of the law was glorious, glorious in the minister of it, Moses, who had such a lustre upon his face, that the children of Israel could not bear the sight of it ; and glorious in the manner of giving it : There was a great deal of the glory and majesty of God attended the giving of the law to Moses ; the ministration of the law was glorious. Note, 4. The comparison which the apostle makes between the law and the gospel, and the preference which he gives to the one above the other. 1. As the glory of Moses' face ceased after a while, so the glory of the law ceased at the coming of the gospel. 2. The law was delivered by angels to Moses, but the gospel was delivered to the apostles by the Son of God, who is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person. 3. Whereas the glory of Moses did more and more decrease ; the glory put upon the apostles, and derived from Christ, was still more and more increasing upon them. But, 4. The chief glory of the gospel, which the apostles here insists upon, is ministration of the Spirit, in the large effusions of it under the gospel-dispensation, giving spiritual and eternal life to believers, instead of death spiritual and eternal coming by the law. Well therefore might our apostle here say, the ministration of the Spirit, or the gospel, is much more glorious ; and consequently a greater reverence and honour is due to it, and to the ministers of it.

9 For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory.

10 For even that which is made glorious had no glory in this respect, by reason of the glory that excelleth.

11 For if that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious.

Observe here, 1. The different titles given to the law, and to the gospel ; the former is called the ministration of condemnation, because it condemns men eternally for the violation of it; the latter is called the ministration of righteousness or justification, because it discovers to us the only way for a sinner's justification before God, namely, by the righteousness of the Mediator. Observe, 2. That the apostle comparing the law and the gospel together, acknowledges that there was surpassing glory in the latter above and beyond the former. Indeed God's institution stamp an excellency upon the Jewish worship, and the law given them had both an intrinsic glory in it, as it was a revelation of the will of God; and also an accidental and adventitious glory, as it was attended with the solemnity of thunder and lightning, fire and smoke, and a voice like the sound of a trumpet, at the promulgation of it; yet says the apostle, compared with the gospel, the glory of the law, or Jewish worship, had no glory in it at all, by reason of the glory that doth excel; as the moon compared with the sun, is so outshined by it, that its brightness is little taken notice of. True, indeed, the law was a revelation of God's will as well as the gospel, but with this happy advantage on the gospel's side: The law was a revelation of God's will, as to duty and as to condemnation, in case of non-performance of that duty; but the gospel is a revelation of God's will, as to grace and mercy, as to remission of sin and eternal life. Observe, 3. Another argument produced here by the apostle, to prove the ministration of the gospel to be much more glorious than that of the law; namely, because it is much more durable and abiding: Verse 11. If that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious. The force of the argument lies thus: That which is durable and permanent, is far more excellent than that which is temporary and transient. Now the law or Jewish dispensation is vanished; its ministration is ceased, and all the legal ordinances are abolished; but the gospel-state remaineth to the end of the world. It is called a kingdom that cannot be moved, Heb. xii. 28, therefore the gospel-ministration, which is eternal, fixed and abiding, must needs be more excellent and more glorious than the legal dispensation, which was temporary, transient, and vanishing.

12 Seeing then that we have such hope, we use great plainness of speech.

13 And not as Moses, which put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not steadfastly look to the end of that which is abolished.

14 But their minds were blinded. For until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the Old Testament; which veil is done away in Christ.

15 But even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart.

16 Nevertheless, when it shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away.

Here the apostle draws an inference from the foregoing discourse; that seeing himself and the other apostles had such hope, that their ministry was thus glorious, such confidence and assurance of the perfection and perpetuity of their ministry, they did now use great plainness, freedom, and boldness of speech in preaching and publishing the gospel; and did not imitate Moses, the minister of the law, who put a veil over his face; which was a sign of the obscurity of the legal dispensation, and of the blindness of the Jews, who could not see the end and accomplishment of that ceremonial and typical administration, which was to be abolished by Christ and his gospel: But their minds were then, and still are, blinded by prejudice and unbelief, and the same veil remaineth to this day spread over Moses' writings, and not taken away in the reading of the Old Testament; which veil is now done away by the doctrines of Christ contained in the New Testament; nevertheless, when the hearts of the Jews shall be turned unto the Lord, and they own and acknowledge Jesus Christ, then the veil shall be taken away from the Jews, and they shall then clearly understand and see what is now concealed and hidden from their eyes. Learn hence, 1. That there is a natural veil of blindness and ignorance upon the minds of men, which hinders their discerning and understanding gospel mysteries. Learn, 2. That there is upon the understandings of the Jews a veil of unbelief and rooted prejudice against Christ and his holy religion; they wilfully shut their eyes, and said, They would not see; and God has judicially closed their eyes, and said, They shall not see. Learn, 3. That by reason of this veil upon their hearts, they cannot look to the end of that which was abolished; that is, to Jesus Christ, who was the end and scope at which the whole ceremonial law did aim and tend. Learn, 4. That when the Jews shall be called home, and converted to Christianity, the veil shall be removed from their hearts, and they shall then understand the tendency and meaning of the whole ceremonial law, and observe its fulfilling and accomplishment in our Lord Jesus Christ; When they shall turn to the Lord, the veil shall be taken away.

17 Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

As if he had said, Christ is that quickening and life-giving Spirit, who takes away the veil from off our hearts; and where that Spirit, that all-glorious and all-powerful Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty; that is, clearness, and no more veil; freedom from the yoke of the legal administration, a liberty and freedom from sin, a liberty unto righteousness, a freeness and readiness of Spirit to do good, a liberty of address and approach to God, a liberty of speech in prayer before God. Thus the Spirit of the Lord is a free Spirit.

18 But we all with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord.

That is, we who live under the light, and enjoy the liberty of the gospel, with open face beholding as in a clear glass the glory of the Lord Jesus, as Moses did the glory of God in the mount, are by degrees changed into the same image with him, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord working in us, and transforming us into his own likeness. Learn hence, 1. That the word and ordinances of God are the glass wherein we have now a sight of the glory of God. Learn, 2. That the sight of God in his ordinances is transforming, as well as the sight of him in heaven; the glory into which we are changed, is our conformity to that holiness which shineth in the word. Vision, or the sight of God here in his ordinances, assimilates as well as in heaven; perfect vision produceth perfect assimilation; but the souls present assimilation, or imperfect conformity to God here, is gradually carried on by daily communion with him. All sorts of communion among men have an assimilating power and efficacy: He that converses with vain company, grows more vain, and he that delights in holy and spiritual company, grows more serious than he was before: But nothing so transforms the spirit of a man, as communion with God in his ordinances doth; none so like him, as those that converse most frequently with him. Learn, 3. That if the sight of God in the glass of an ordinance be so assimilating, how transforming will be the sight of God in heaven, when we shall there behold and see him face to face? If the vision of Christ here be so influential upon believers, what an illustrious and infallible efficacy will the immediate, clear and perfect sight of his glory have in heaven? 1 John iii. 2. We shall be perfectly like him, when once we shall see him as he is.

CHAP. IV.

This chapter, together with a considerable part of the Epistle, is apologetical or excusatory; in which the apostle vindicates his office and dignity from the prejudices which either his sufferings which attended him in the dispensation thereof, or the suggestions of false apostles, and deceitful workers might have raised up against him. With these men he puts himself in the balance, and without either vanity or vain-glory prefers himself before them in point of fidelity and sincerity in the work of the ministry; as also, in point of diligence in the service whereunto he was in special mercy called. And accordingly thus he speaks:

THEREFORE, seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy we faint not;

2 But have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully, but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

That is, seeing we have such a glorious ministry, far more excellent than that of Moses, mentioned in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, as we have received mercy or special favours from God in committing it to us, so we faint not under the difficulties and pressures to which it doth expose us. Having received mercy we faint not; but have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, all fornication and uncleanness, all ambition and covetousness, which the false apostles allowed themselves in: Not walking in guile or craftiness; nor handling the word of God deceitfully, as they do; but by manifestation of the truth, commending ourselves to every man's conscience, as persons acting in the sight of God. Learn hence, 1. That the ministry of the gospel is a very glorious ministry, far excelling the Mosaic dispensation. 2. That it is a special favour from God to be judged faithful, and put into this ministry. 3. That no troubles or trials, no difficulties, dangers or distresses, should cause any of the faithful servants of God to faint, who have received mercy or favour from God to be put into the ministry: Seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not. Observe, next, How the apostle, having vindicated and extolled his ministry, does in the second verse declare and assert his fidelity in the discharge of his ministry: Not handling the word of God deceitfully, but commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Hence learn, That the apostles delivered the gospel, in all things necessary to be known, believed, and practised, with great plainness and sufficient perspicuity; otherwise, they could not be said to manifest the truth to every man's conscience.

5 But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost:

As if he had said, We preach the gospel plainly: But if men do not understand and believe it, will not embrace and obey it, it is not an argument of the gospel's obscurity, but of our hearers incredulity. The gospel is not hid from men for want of clearness, but only by means of their own voluntary and wilful blindness: If our gospel be hid. Here note, 1. St. Paul's claim and interest in the gospel which he preached, he calls it his gospel; not as if he was the author of it, but because of his instrumentality in the promulgation and establishing of it, it was a divine treasure committed to his care and trust; it was not his gospel, by way of original revelation, but by way of ministerial dispensation. Note, 2. The Corinthians non-proficiency under the gospel, specified, or at least supposed. If our gospel be hid; that is, if the word, which we preach with the greatest plainness, in the greatest simplicity and sincerity, if it be hidden from the minds and understandings of men, so as to miss of its convincing power, and converting efficacy, the fault is not in the gospel, but in them that sit under it. Note, 3. The heavy doom and judgment which the apostle passes upon all such persons as sit under the external dispensation of the gospel, and yet are no ways enlightened nor improved by it, but remain blind and ignorant, obstinate, and unreformed. It is a sad symptom and foreboding sign of a lost people. Learn hence, 1. That there are many, very many, who sit under the external dispensation of the gospel, unto whom the gospel is an hidden gospel. Learn,

2. That the gospel being hid from a people who have long enjoyed the light and benefit of it, is a sad symptom, yea, a certain sign of a lost people. Such blindness, under the clearest light, is like the covering of the face, or tying the handkerchief over the eyes, in order to the turning off the obstinate sinner into an eternal hell.

4 In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them.

Observe here, 1. The title given to Satan, he is styled the god of this world; not properly, but because the honour and homage of a god is challenged by him, and by a multitude of sinners given to him. He is called by our Saviour the prince of this world, and by the apostle the ruler of the darkness of this world; because he ruleth over a great part of the world, and they are his subjects, or rather his slaves. Observe, 2. The way and course which Satan takes to secure his subjects obedience to himself; he blinds their eyes, that they may never know a better prince, see a better way, or understand a better state, than he hath drawn them into.—Satan blinds the understandings of men by the efficacy of divers lusts, which are bred and nourished in their hearts. Now the streamings of sensual lusts from a corrupt heart, do blind the understanding, and beset the judgment, that the sinner can neither see nor know the excellency of spiritual objects. O bloody and barbarous prince, that puts out the eyes of all his subjects, darkens the mind and understanding, takes away the thinking, considering, and reasoning power of the soul, that they neither see nor consider spiritual things, nor have any distinct apprehensions of them! Observe, 3. The character of the persons whom Satan the god of this world, have blinded; Such as believe not; that is, both such as want the means of faith, and such as enjoy the means, but want the grace of faith: The former is the cause of the Pagan, the latter of the Christian world. Lord! how many live under the light of the gospel, that never had heart to receive it, or will to obey it! How great a part of the Christianized world do reject Christ! though called by his name, yet will not own his authority, or submit to his government. The nobles of the world think themselves dishonoured by submitting their necks to Christ's yoke; the sensualists of the world will not lay down a lust for him that laid down his life for them; the worldlings of the earth prefer their dirt and dunghill before the pearl of great price. O how few amongst them that profess Christianity do love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity! Observe, 4. The great end and design of the devil's agency, in blinding the minds of men with ignorance and error, with passion and prejudice; "lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ should shine into their hearts," to the ruin of him and his kingdom. As the sun casts its beams upon blind men, but they receive not the light of it, so, though the light of Christ's glorious gospel shines before the eyes of them whom the god of this world has blinded with the hopes and desires, with the possessions and enjoyments of this world, yet they receive it not. Observe, 5. The glorious title here given to Christ. The image of God; that is, 1. His substantial and essential image, being God of God, very God of very

God. Christ considered with respect to his divine nature, is the express image of his Father's person. 2 Christ is his image as Mediator, and with reference to the gospel, in which he has given us glorious demonstrations of the power and wisdom, of the grace and holiness, of the mercy and goodness of God towards us; all which, as in a glass, are represented to us, and presented before us. In both these respects Christ is called, the image of God.

5 For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.

In these words, our apostle further manifests his fidelity and integrity in preaching the gospel, by shewing that he sought to advance Christ, and not himself, in preaching of it. Here note, 1. The duty practised by St. Paul: We preach. How mean and ignoble soever this office of preaching is esteemed by some men, who value not their own or other men's souls, and therefore no wonder that they undervalue the means of making them happy; yet will the faithful ministers of Christ magnify this part of their office, not by pomp and state, nor by scorn and superciliousness, as thinking it beneath them to preach, but by an humble and painful attendance upon the ministry, which they have received of the Lord; and will dispense the word with evidence and perspicuity, with faithfulness and sincerity, with power and authority, with courage and boldness, and with exemplariness of conversation; not preaching angelical sermons, and leading diabolical lives. Observe, 2. The subject matter of the apostle's preaching; not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord. But when may persons be said to preach themselves? Ans. When they make themselves the authors of their own ministry, running before they are sent, and are self-created preachers; when they make themselves the master of the preaching, venting their own passions, and prejudices, and private opinions, instead of the doctrine of Christ; and when they make themselves the end of their preaching, aiming rather at pleasing others, and profiting themselves, than at the glory of God, and the good of men's souls. But what is it to preach Christ? We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord. Ans. When he is the author of our ministry, and we receive our mission from him; when we make him the object of our preaching; when the subject-matter and substance of it is Jesus Christ, either explicitly or reductively; and when we make him the end of our preaching, designing to promote the honour and interest of Christ by our ministry, that his people may be gathered, his body edified, his saints perfected, his enemies subdued, his gospel propagated; and he finally admired in all them that believe. Observe, 3. In what capacity the apostle looked upon himself in the church of Christ; not as a lord, but as a servant: Ourselves your servants. There is an honour belonging to Christ's ministers, but verily that honour consists in service which we owe to the church of Christ: Servants we are to the souls of men, but not to the humours of men; at the same time that we are servants to them, we are to rule over them, and they are to obey, and submit unto us as those who watch for their souls. Therefore it is added, Servants for Jesus' sake: that is, servants in order to the promoting of his honour, and his church's interest:—"We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake."

6 For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

(Observe here, The faithful and humble acknowledgment which the apostle makes, how himself and his fellow-apostles came to preach Jesus Christ so convincingly to others; namely, That Almighty God, who at first by his omnipotent word produced light out of darkness, by no less efficacy and power brought him, a lost sinner, out of the darkness of Pharisaism and sin, and shined into his and their hearts with a glorious light, to the intent that he and they should communicate and impart this divine light of the knowledge of God, which shineth in the face of Christ unto others. Learn hence, That ministers must know Christ themselves, before they can make him known to others; Christ must be revealed in them, before he can be revealed by them; he must shine into their hearts by his Holy Spirit, and give them an experimental acquaintance, in their own souls, with what they deliver and make known to others. Every truth ought to be the transcript of our own experience, and be preached first to our hearts, and then to our hearers. Who can savingly enlighten others, that is in the darkness of ignorance, or sin, himself?

7 ¶ But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

In the foregoing verses we find the apostle magnifying his office, extolling his ministry, and vindicating his fidelity in the discharge of his duty. In this verse, observe, 1. He compares the gospel he preached to a treasure: We have this treasure; a treasure for the enriching and edifying of the church. The gospel is a treasure for its worth and dignity, for its abundance and variety, for its closeness and secrecy. This treasure Christ keeps under lock and key, only intrusting those with it whom he calls to it, and furnishes for it. They are no better than thieves and sacrilegious robbers, who without a mediate call or warrant from Christ, do assume this trust, and break open this treasure. Observe, 2. The repository in which this treasure is laid up, in earthen vessels: So the apostles and ministers of the gospel are called. Where note, The word of description, they are vessels; and the word of diminution, they are earthen vessels. 1. The preachers of the gospel are represented by a word of description, they are vessels: Thus vessels are not natural, but artificial instruments. No man is born a Christian, much less a minister, but made such. Vessels are not of equal capacity; some are less, others greater: Thus the ministers of the gospel have gifts and graces of different degrees and excellencies. Again, vessels are not for reception only, but for effusion also; as they receive and retain, so they let out what is put into them: The ministers of Christ are not only to receive and lay up, but to lay out this heavenly treasure, which is not impaired by imparting. Finally, vessels are not the originals of what they have, but all they contain is poured into them, and received by them. A mine has treasure in its own bowels, but it is put into the chest. Thus the preachers of the gospel are not the authors, but the receivers only, of those truths they publish: 1 Cor.

xi 23. "I have received of the Lord what I also delivered unto you." Note farther, The word of diminution, they are earthen vessels. The preachers of the gospel are divine in regard of the sublimity of their doctrine, but human and earthen in regard of the frailty of their condition. Their being called earthen vessels, may denote the meanness of their condition, which for the most part is little and low in the world: As the poor receive the gospel, so are they very often poor and low that publish the gospel, necessitous and indigent, earthen vessels. Again, it may denote the frailty of their persons, and the contemptibleness of them. Earthen vessels are little set by, stand in open places, used by every hand, and at every turn; while plate, gold and silver vessels, are laid and locked up with great carefulness. Thus it is often with the preachers of the gospel, they are objects base and vile, contemptible and despised in the eyes of the world, vessels wherein there is no pleasure; yea, with some, not only our persons are despicable, but our very office and function is contemptible. In a word, as our mean condition and base estimation, so our bodily constitution proclaims us earthen: our bodies are earthen, because formed of the dust of the earth, because subject to flaws and cracks, and to be broken in pieces; we that preach eternal life to others, are dying men to ourselves; and whilst the word of life is in our mouths, many times death is in our faces. Observe, lastly, The reason assigned why this treasure of the gospel is committed to earthen vessels, men; not to heavenly vessels, angels; namely, That the excellency of the power might be of God, and not of us: From the weakness of man, the instrument, there redounds great honour to God, the agent. This precious treasure of the gospel is lodged in such weak and worthless vessels, that as the power is from God, namely, the awakening, convincing, quickening, heart-changing power of the word is from him: So the glory, the entire glory and complete praise, may be attributed and described to him, "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power might be of God, and not of us."

8 We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair;

9 Persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed:

10 Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body.

11 For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh.

12 So then death worketh in us, but life in you.

13 We having the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak;

The false apostles and some weak Christians having taken offence at the manifold and great sufferings which St. Paul, with his fellow apostles, had met with in the course of their ministry: In these verses, St. Paul shows the church at Corinth, that there was no reason at all why any should be offended at his sufferings, or any cause why the false apostles should object, that if he had preached the gospel sincerely, Almighty God would never have suffered him to be persecuted and afflicted so severely; namely, because all his afflictions were so graciously moderated, and himself so powerfully upheld by God, that he sunk not under the weight and burden of them. We are troubled, says he, on every side, but not overwhelmed with our troubles; we are often perplexed, but not so as to despair of God's help and succour; we are persecuted by men, but not forsaken of God; cast down indeed, but not killed by the fall. So that there is in our sufferings a resemblance and representation of the death and sufferings of Christ Jesus. We bear in our bodies a memorative conformity to our dying Lord, that it may appear how mightily we are supported by the quickening power of the Spirit of Christ, under all our afflictions. As if the apostle had said, "Behold and admire in us the almighty power of Christ, exerted towards us, in upholding these earthen vessels (our frail bodies) notwithstanding the many thousand knocks they have met with in carrying about that heavenly treasure, the holy gospel, with which God has intrusted us." Observe next, He rejoices in the cause of his sufferings: We are delivered unto death for Jesus' sake; for our owning, preaching, and practising the doctrine of Jesus. Blessed be God we suffer not as evil-doers, but for well-doing; we suffer for the sake of the best person, and in the best cause that ever the world was acquainted with. He adds, "We are delivered unto death, that the life of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh;" that is, the infinitely wise God suffers us to be thus afflicted, that in and by the sufferings which our mortal flesh does sustain and undergo, he might make it evidently manifest that Christ is risen from the dead; and, as a living Head, conveys the necessary influences of strength, support, and comfort, as to all his members, so more particularly to us his ministers; by which we are enabled, without fainting, to suffer the hardest things with patience, courage and constancy. Observe, lastly, He declares to them the great advantages which they reaped by his afflictions: Death worketh in us, but life in you; that is, the preaching of the gospel exposes us to death, but unto you it brings eternal life. Our death is your life, our sufferings are your advantage, we having the same faithful spirit which was in the saints under the Old Testament, and particularly in holy David, Psal. cxvi. 10, who says, "I believed and therefore spake; I was sore afflicted." Now as he believed and trusted in God for deliverance out of his many and great troubles, so, in like manner do we believe and trust. From the whole, note, 1. That a perplexed, and persecuted, and afflicted, and distressed condition, was the lot and portion of the members, but especially of the ministers of Christ, in the first and purest ages of the church. Christ espoused his church to himself upon the bed of his cross, his head begirt with a pillow of thorns, his body drenched in a bath of his own blood: And if the head was crowned with thorns, it is unsuitable that the feet should tread on roses. Note, 2. Though all Christ's followers have drank of the same cup with himself, yet the dregs of the cup have usually been put into the hand of the ministers of the word; We that live are always delivered unto death: Most of the apostles were by the rage of tyrants, put to cruel deaths, and offered up a bloody sacrifice. The calling of ministers is honourable, but their outward condition is deplorable; their embassy is glorious, but their usage is often grievous: God sends them forth with renown, the world entertains them with reproach. Note, 3. God doth not bring his people into a suffering condition, and then leave them; when they suffer for him, they are not forsaken by him: The voice of despair is not heard in the dark night of their calamity: But God has either the castle of providence, or the ark of promise; the all-sufficiency of his power, or the abundance of his grace: These, every of these, and all these, are for his people's retirement in the greatest storms and tempests: "We are troubled, yet not distressed; persecuted, but not forsaken."

14 Knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you.

15 For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God.

A double reason is here assigned, why the apostle bare his sufferings with such invincible courage and Christian patience. The first is drawn from the advantage which would redound to the church by his sufferings: All things are for your sakes; that is, all the straits we are put to, turn to your advantage: If we die, it is to confirm you by our sufferings: if we be delivered, it is for God's glory and your good, "that the abundant grace might by the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God." Whatever we meet with, tends to the confirming of your faith, and the increasing of your thankfulness. A second reason is drawn from the joyful issue of his sufferings: He and his fellow-apostles steadfastly believed, that Almighty God, who raised up Christ from the dead, would in like manner raise them from the grave of their sufferings, yea, from the grave of death; and both soul and body shall be presented with them, to be eternally glorified together. Learn hence, That how different soever the lot and portion of God's children and servants be in this life, some more, others less afflicted; yet having all, at the same time, faith in God for a joyful deliverance out of their afflictions, they shall all meet in the morning of the resurrection, and be by Christ presented unto God as persons redeemed by him, and shall eternally be glorified with him: "He which raised up Jesus, shall raise us up also by Jesus, and shall present us with you."

16 For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.

The original word for fainting, signifies to shrink back, as cowards in war, or to sink down as a porter, under the pressure of some heavy burden: For this cause, we faint not. For what cause? Namely, this, that though their bodies were weakened by affliction, and they were daily decaying as to the strength and vigour of the outward man; yet as to their inward man, the strength and vigour of their minds and spirits, were day by day renewed. Oh happy apostle! the cold blasts of persecution beating upon thy outward man, did, by a spiritual antiperistasis, increase the heat of grace within; thy soul is made fat with blows upon thy body, and battens with pricking and beating; every stone thrown at thee knocked thee nearer to Christ, the chief corner-stone: Under all the storms and billows of affliction, thou, like Noah's ark, wert lifted up nearer heaven; and after every encounter, thy salvation was nearer than before. Well therefore mightest thou declare and say, For this cause we faint not.

17 For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Still our apostle proceeds in assigning reasons why all the afflictions which himself and others met with, were not only tolerable, but joyous; namely, because, 1. His afflictions were light. 2. Because they were short. They were light; But how? Not considered in themselves; so they were hard and heavy; thrice was he beaten with rods, five times he received forty stripes save one; but light compared with the glory expected. Again, they were short; but for a moment compared with eternity. Mark the gradation: For affliction there is glory; for light affliction, a weight of glory; and for light affliction, which is but for a moment, an eternal weight of glory. Observe farther, The apostle doth not barely say, that glory will be the consequence of affliction, but that affliction will be the cause of glory; it worketh for us. But how? Not as a meritorious cause: For alas! how can our afflictions deserve this happiness? What proportion can there be betwixt light and momentary afflictions, and an eternal weight of glory? But they work for us, as they are sanctified by God to us. His infinite mercy and goodness, his covenant truth and faithfulness, make his saints' afflictions a whipping-post to their corruptions; they purge out iniquity, and take away our sin, if we belong to God as his covenant children. But for wicked and obdurate sinners, alas! it is much otherwise: Instead of being refined from their dross, and purged from their filth, by being in the furnace of affliction, it boils their scum and impurity more into them; and, like flints in the fire, they fly in the very face of God their refiner.

18 While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen. For the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal.

The last reason is assigned here, why the apostle was kept from fainting in and under the pressure of the most heavy afflictions: He looked not at present, but future things; not at things seen, but unseen; not at things temporal, but eternal. Observe here, 1. What it was that the apostle, when on earth, made his main scope, his chief aim, grand design, and grand end. This is signified to us in the original word σκοπεῖν, which signifies to look as the archer doth at the mark he shoots at. There were some things which he, his fellow apostles, and all serious Christians with them, looked at. This is specified, first, negatively,

We look not at things seen; at the things of this life, at sensible objects, be they bitter or sweet, be they comforts or crosses: Temporal things are temporary things; and we mind them not, as the men of the world do, who make them their chief and principal aim, and scope: No, we leave the world to the men of the world: We look not at things which are seen. But, secondly, This is specified affirmatively, We look at the things which are not seen; the things of another life, things which are objects of faith, and not visible to fleshly eyes; we look at these, we make these our aim and scope. And the reason is subjoined why they made these things the matter of their choice, the objects of their desire and endeavour. This is intimated in the word (for;) For the things which are seen are temporal; that is, all the visible things of this life, whether comforts or crosses, whether prosperous or adverse, be it health or sickness, liberty or restraint, poverty or riches, honour or disgrace, life or death, they are all προσωρινὰ for a while, only for a short season, as the word signifies; therefore we do not much eye them, we trouble not our heads much about them; they are things of an higher nature we look at, such as neither eye hath seen, nor ear heard; and these are the durable things; for the things which are not seen are eternal. Learn hence, 1. That temporal things are things that are seen, do take up the heads and hearts, the minds and thoughts of the men of the world, and are the sum of their desires, and the substance of their endeavours: We look not at the things which are seen, but there are those that do; we make them not our aim and scope, but others look at them, wholly at them, can see nothing beyond them, and desire nothing besides them. Learn, 2. That things unseen, the things of eternity, and the invisible encouragements of another world, are the mark and scope which every real Christian is aiming at, and contending for: We look at the things which are not seen, and make them our aim and scope. Learn, 3. That the things not seen, or the things of another life and world, are eternal things; that is, such things as admit of no changes and alterations, of no gradations or successions, of decay or consumption, of no future hopes and expectations, of no mixture or moderation, of no recovery or revocation, of no period or conclusion. Oh eternity! eternity! that vast, that boundless ocean of eternity! how does it swallow up our thoughts with wonder and amazement! God help us daily to consider of it, duly to prepare for it, and not to prefer the trifles of time before it, but make the wisest provision for the longest duration. Learn, 4. That which puts the weight upon things not seen, and renders them the proper objects of a Christian's aim and choice, is this, because they are eternal: That which chiefly casts the scale, and maketh things not seen to preponderate, is because they are eternal things. It is eternity which transcendeth all expression, all conception, much more all our comprehension, that puts an infinite weight upon unseen things: The things which are not seen are eternal; This meditation, well digested, would work in us an holy indifferency towards all temporal things; it would moderate our esteem of them, our desires after them, our delight in them, and our grief for the want and loss of them; and sweeten all those troubles and trials, all those sufferings and afflictions, which we meet with in our passage through time unto eternity. Lord, take off and turn away our eyes, from things which are seen, and help us to "look at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

CHAP. V.

Our apostle having at the latter end of the foregoing chapter, recorded the sufferings of himself and other believers for the sake of Christ, and the testimony of a good conscience; he comes in this chapter to give a reason why he did so courageously and perseveringly labour in the work of the ministry, notwithstanding the many difficulties and great dangers which he met with on every side, for commending himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. And he tells us, it was the well-grounded hopes of a future immortality which did support and bear up his spirit under all the pressures of human life. From whence we learn, that the difficulties and distresses of good men in this life, although they should end in death itself, are matter of no great terror to those who have a well grounded confidence and good assurance of their blessed immortality. For thus our apostle speaks :

FOR we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Observe here, 1. Our apostle compares the body of a believer to an house, to an earthly house, and to an house of tabernacle; to an house, because of its comely fabric and composure, as also in regard of the inhabitant that dwells in it, the never-dying soul; to an earthly house, in regard of the matter of which it is composed, and in regard of the means by which it is sustained; and to an house of tabernacle, because such buildings consist of slight and mean materials, they are soon set up, and as soon taken down — Observe, 2. The necessity of this earthly tabernacle of the body's dissolution by death, it must down and be dissolved. 3. The believer's future happiness, after the body's present dissolution asserted and declared; "They have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Learn hence, 1. That it is the pleasure and will of God, that his people should for a short time remain in this earthly tabernacle of the body. Learn, 2. That this earthly tabernacle of the believer's body, sooner or later, must by death be dissolved. Learn, 3. That after the dissolution of this earthly tabernacle of the body, all the faithful have an eternal habitation, a building of God, not made with hands, in the highest heavens. Learn, 4. That it is both the duty and interest of every sincere and serious Christian, to labour for the certain knowledge and full assurance of this happy privilege, and be able to say, We know, &c.

2 For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven :

For in this, that is, in this ruinous earthly tabernacle. Observe here, 1. The strength and vehemency of the saint's affection, we groan; the word signifies such a groaning as of a man that has a load or burthen lying upon him, which makes him fetch his wind from his very bowels: As there are groans which proceed from sorrow, so there are groans which arise from desire and hope. Thus here, We groan, earnestly desiring. Observe, 2. What is the subject which the apostle's groaning-desires were carried out after; namely, to be clothed with a celestial body, instead of that clogging body of earthly corruption which here they carried about with them, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon, &c. Learn thence, That such as do believe and wait for a blessed immortality, do groan for it, and earnestly desire it, because of the miseries and pressures by sin and sorrow in this present life, because they have already a taste of the happiness and glory of the life to come, and because the Holy Spirit doth excite and stir up these groaning desires in the hearts of believers: Rom. viii. 23. "We also, that have the first fruits of the Spirit, do groan within ourselves."

3 If so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked.

That is, If so be at our passage hence, we shall have the happiness to be of the number of those who are found clothed with glory, or clothed with holiness and good works to fit us for our clothing in glory, that we may not be found naked, in our natural turpitude of sin and spiritual nakedness, which will render us abominable in the sight of God. Learn hence, That none can groan or long for heaven but such as are clothed with a gospel-righteousness, that of justification, sanctification, and new obedience: None shall be clothed upon with glory hereafter, but such as are clothed with grace and holiness here.

4 For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burthened: not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

Note here, That this groaning desire, again mentioned by the apostle in this verse, with respect to the burthen of the body, to get rid of it, is not either an unnatural desire, or a discontented desire, or a desire of death as death, or a desire to be unhoused, and without clothing for the soul; but he would be better clothed with a celestial body, that his mortal part might be swallowed up by immortal glory. As if the apostle had said, "As weary as I am of life, by means of sin and sorrow, by reason of corruption and affliction, yet I would not barely, for the sake of that, desire a dissolution, but for the hope's sake of eternal and immortal life." — Learn hence, 1. That whilst the saints live in this earthly, mortal body, they are burdened with a heavy load of sin and affliction. 2. That believers thus burdened, do, in an holy manner, groan and long for a better state. 3. That in that better state, mortality shall be swallowed up of life. 4. That in that life, we shall be clothed again with our own bodies, glorious and heavenly: "We groan, not to be unclothed but clothed upon."

5 Now he that hath wrought us for the self-same thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit.

That is, He that hath wrought and appointed us, he that hath prepared and fitted us for this glorious change, and hath set our souls a-longing for this immortal state, is God; who hath also given us by his Spirit those holy affections, fervent desires, and faithful endeavours, which are the earnest of heaven before we enjoy it. Learn hence, 1. That Almighty God doth fit and frame his people for that happy state of bliss and glory, which he has designed them for, and appointed them unto. "He that hath wrought us for the self-same thing, is God." Learn, 2. That to the intent his saints may look and long for that glorious and immortal state with the greater vehemency and desire, he has already given them an earnest and foretaste of it, by his Holy Spirit in their hearts.

6 Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord.

We are confident, that is, by the Holy Spirit comfortably assured of a better state. They who have the earnest of the Spirit, may be confident of their future glorious state; or we are confident; that is, we are of good courage, fearing neither death nor danger in the way of our duty. "Knowing that whilst we are at home here in the body," that is, whilst sojourning in the body as pilgrims and strangers, we are absent from the Lord: That is, we are detained from the blessed sight and enjoyment of God, and kept out of the possession of that happiness which makes heaven. Here the apostle plainly intimates, that whilst we remain in the body, we are detained from our happiness, and that as soon as we leave the body, we shall be admitted to our happiness. Learn, 1. That a Christian is not in his own proper home whilst he sojourneth in the body, and lives in his earthly tabernacle here below. His birth and parentage is from heaven, his treasure and inheritance in heaven, his kindred and relations and best friends are there, and there shall he longest abide. Learn, 2. That the true reason why the saints count themselves here not at home, is because they are absent from the Lord whilst present in the body: "Whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord."

7 For we walk by faith, not by sight:

That is, our condition here in this world is such, that we cannot see God face to face, but by faith only: whilst we are in the body, we do not see and enjoy, but believe and expect. Faith is the thing in expectation, sight is the thing in fruition: Faith is a cloudy discovery of things at a distance, sight is a clear view and apprehension of things that are present. Learn, 1. That faith is for earth, and sight is for heaven. 2. That till we have sight, it is a great advantage that we have faith. 3. That if we now have faith, we may be well assured, that ere long we shall have sight.

8 We are confident I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord.

The original words for we are confident and willing, denote first courage and undaunted boldness, with respect to death, and complacency and satisfaction in it. We are willing; The translation is too flat, ευδοκουμεν, we are well pleased. It is a grateful and desirable thing to us to leave the body, yet not in an absolute, but comparative consideration. We are willing rather; that is, rather than not see and enjoy the Lord, rather than be always here sinning and groaning. "We had rather be absent from the body, and present with the Lord." Learn, 1. That our happiness in the world to come, lies in our being present with the Lord. 2. That we are present with the Lord, as soon as the soul quitteth and takes its leave and farewell of the body. 3. That a state of separation from the body, is much more preferable to the saints than that of dwelling in the body. 4. That this desire, preference, and choice, arises from that confident assurance which they have of a better state, and of their interest in it. We are confident, I say, &c.

9 ¶ Wherefore we labour, that whether present or absent we may be accepted of him.

The word signifies to labour ambitiously, as an ambitious courtier labours for his prince's favour. We labour, whether present in the body, or absent from the body, whether living or dying, that our persons and our services may be accepted with him, whenever we appear before him. Learn, 1. That to be accepted with the Lord, is a very high honour: To have our persons accepted, and our performances acceptable, are high favours; the former is the ground of the latter, and Christ is the foundation of both, Ephes. i. 6. Learn, 2. That it is a gracious person's great ambition and desire, his aim and scope, his design and endeavour, that living and dying he may find acceptance with God, and his actions be such, as God may well like and approve of. "We ambitiously labour, that whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him."

10 For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

These words are fully descriptive of a future judgment. In which observe, 1. The necessity of a future judgment. We must, willing or unwilling. 2. The universality of this judgment. We must all. 3. The person by whom, and before whom, we must be judged, Christ. 4. The manner of this judgment, All must appear, and be made manifest, both persons and actions. 5. The matter about which we shall be judged, The things done in the body. 6. The end of all this inquisition, to be punished or rewarded, according to our actions. Learn, 1. That there will certainly come a day, when every person that ever lived in this world, shall certainly be judged by Jesus Christ: "We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ." Learn, 2.

That every man's judgment and sentence at the great day, shall proceed and be pronounced according to what he has done in the flesh, be it good or bad; That every one may receive the things done in his body, &c.

11 Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men; but we are made manifest unto God; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

That is, knowing the terror and dread of that terrible and dreadful day, in which Christ will judge the whole race of mankind; and being persuaded of the truth and certainty of it ourselves, we endeavour to persuade all men, by all means, to fly from the wrath to come, by repentance and faith, that they may be found of God in peace in that solemn hour. Learn hence, That the knowledge and consideration of the present terrible judgments of God, and the future terrors of that great day, should move the ministers of God to persuade, and their people to be persuaded, to a careful and serious preparation for it. Such ministers as know and consider the terrors of the Lord, will both persuade others, and be persuaded themselves, to look after reconciliation and acceptance with God; that when Christ comes terribly, they may appear comfortably: Knowing the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men. It follows, but we are made manifest unto God, and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences. As if the apostle had said, We hope God hath discovered our sincerity unto you in some measure, as he is an observer of it, and witness to it himself.— Learn hence, That then a minister has the full assurance of his sincerity, when he has the approbation of God, and his own conscience, and also a testimony in the consciences of his people. This is gained by the purity of our doctrine, by the piety of our lives, and by the prudence of our conduct: When these are evident and manifest to the consciences of our people, how convincing is it to them, and comfortable unto us!

12 For we commend not ourselves again unto you, but give you occasion to glory on our behalf, that you may have somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart.

As if our apostle had said, "We commend not ourselves to you upon our own account, as if there were any need of it, with respect to us; but only to give you an occasion to vindicate us, and to glory to others on our behalf, when need requires, that you may have wherewith to answer the calumnies of the false apostles, who gloried much in outward appearance of piety and zeal, but not in purity of heart and upright intentions." Learn hence, That though the ministers of Christ have no itching desire to exalt themselves in a way of self commendation, yet they are sometimes constrained to it in a way of self-vindication, and this is not only lawful but a duty; because scandals cast upon a good man reach farther than himself; they reflect upon others as well as himself, yea, they reflect upon God himself, therefore to be wiped off and rolled away.

13 For whether we be besides ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause.

The holy apostle was sometimes so zealously transported, and carried forth in his high actings for Jesus Christ, that the false apostles represented him as a frantic person, crazed, mad, and what not: "Be it so, says the holy man, it is unto God, and his cause, and to propagate his glory, and not my own: Or if I be sober in my words and actions, it is for your benefit, not my own." Learn hence, That wicked and carnal men account and represent the holy servants of God as a sort of madmen. Workings of grace are sometimes so far above reason, that they seem to be without reason:— There are several acts of holiness, which the profane world esteem as madness; as eminent self-denial, great seriousness in religion, their burning zeal, their holy singularity, their fervours of devotion, their patience and meekness under sufferings and reproaches.— All these acts of holiness represents the saints as madmen to carnal man.

14 For the love of Christ constraineth us.

That is, the infinite love of Christ, in dying for us, constraineth us to live unto him, and do the utmost services for him. Some understand it passively, for the love that Christ beareth us; others take it actively, for the love which we bear to him. Now, this love is said to constrain. Some think it a metaphor from a woman in travail, that strives to be delivered of her burthen; others, that it signifies to have one bound, and so much under power, that he cannot move without leave. The expression denotes the absolute empire which the love of Christ had over him, ruling all the inclinations of his heart, and the actions of his life. It signifies the sweet violence and force of love, by which the soul is overpowered, and cannot say nay; it does wholly possess us, rule and command us, keep us in its power, and make us do whatever it would have us to do. Learn hence, That the love of Christ has such a constraining power, and obliging force and efficacy, upon the soul, that it inclines it to a willing performance of all duties, though attended with the greatest difficulties and dangers. Love is the spring of action, 'tis a forcible and compelling, 'tis an invincible, unconquerable affection: And it has such an influence from the consideration of what Christ is in himself, and of what he has done for us, and designed for us.

Because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead:

15 And that he died for all, that they which live, should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

If one died for all, then were all dead. Some understand it of a death in sin; all were in a state of sin and death, when Christ died for them. Others understand it mystically, when Christ died for all, all were then dead; that is, dead in Christ unto sin; intimating that when Christ died, all believers were dead in him to sin and the world. As Christ died for sin, so ought all to die unto sin. Farther, Christ dying once for all, proveth the verity of his satisfaction, and the sufficiency of his satisfaction. What virtue was there in that death which merited life for all! And what love was there in our God to appoint one for all, and to accept one for all! That one so worthy in himself, that one so dear to God, should die, should die so willingly, should die so painfully, should die so shamefully, should die under a curse, to absolve from guilt, and discharge from condemnation! Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us! Observe next, The great end and design of Christ in his death and resurrection for us; namely, 1. Negatively declared, that we should not live unto ourselves, to our own ease, profit, or honour; gratifying our own wills, inclinations and corrupt desires, serving our own interest and ends; but positively, to live unto him, according to his word and will, in obedience to his commands, and with an eye at his glory, who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. Had Christ only died for us, the favour had been inexpressible and unrequitable, and required us to live to his name and glory; but when he not only died for us, but rose again, and lives for ever in heaven, to pour down fresh benefits upon us, and to do good offices daily and hourly for us, how endearing are our obligations to love him, and to live unto him! Learn hence, 1. That by virtue of Christ's death and resurrection, Christians are both obliged to, and have obtained the grace of newness of life, and holiness of conversation. Learn, 2. That it is the duty, and will be the endeavour, of all those that are quickened by the Spirit of Christ unto newness of life, to refer all their actions not to themselves, but unto him: None can do both, live to Christ and self together. His we are already; by creation, by redemption, by sanctification, by voluntary resignation, we live by him. Our spiritual life is from him, we expect hereafter to live with him; let us therefore now live unto him, even unto him that died for us, and rose again.

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

These words, probably, were spoken by the apostle, to rebuke the carnal boastings of some Jews, who gloried in their having seen Christ in the flesh before he died. The apostle directs them to a more spiritual knowledge of him, now since his resurrection, as more suitable to his glorified state: q. d. "What though you have eaten and drunk in Christ's presence when on earth, all that corporeal familiarity is ceased; 'tis his spiritual gracious presence which now you are to depend upon, and value yourselves by." For henceforth know we no man after the flesh; we value no man for his outward advantages, for his wisdom, riches, or learning. Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, seeing and conversing with him when here on earth, yet must we know him so, and enjoy him as such, no more. Our carnal affections and relations to him must ever cease, now he is exalted into a spiritual and glorious condition. Learn hence, 1. That a bare knowing of Christ after the flesh, ought to cease among Christians. There is a knowledge of Christ after the flesh, since his ascension into heaven; namely, by a naked profession of his name, without a conformity to his laws, and by acts of sensitive affection: Some by reading the history of our Saviour's passion, others by seeing in the sacramental elements, a tragical representation of his crucifixion, do find their human passions stir and move; but, if it rests here, without drawing forth our love to his person, and quickening our obedience to his commands; all this is but knowing Christ after the flesh to no spiritual or saving purposes. Learn, 2. That bare knowledge of Christ after the flesh will do us no good, be of no comfort or advantage to us, as to our eternal salvation: It is not a fond affection to his person and memory, but obedience to his laws that Christ values. It is observable, that an outward ceremonious respect to our Saviour's person was very little regarded by him, when he was here upon earth; a serious attention to his doctrine was infinitely preferred by him before all that. Our love to Christ is better shewn by religious services, than by passionate affections. We find, St. John xx. when Mary fell at Christ's feet, after he was risen, and embraced him, when she held him by the feet and worshipped him, when in an humble and affectionate devotion she lies prostrate before him, Christ forbids it, Touch me not. He rejects all these external testimonies of her love, which proceeded only from human affection; but he directs her to a more acceptable service, namely, to run and carry tidings of his resurrection to his disconsolate disciples; Go to my disciples, and say, &c. From whence I infer, That it is much more acceptable to Christ to be about his service, and doing good in our place and station, than performing any offices of human love and respect unto his person. Seeing then, that this ceremonious respect pleased Christ, neither when on earth, nor now he is in heaven, henceforth know we no man after the flesh: Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet henceforth we know him no more.

17 Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away: behold, all things are become new.

As if the apostle had said, If any one amongst you pretend to be a Christian indeed, engrafted into Christ by baptism and regeneration, and is a member of his body, he is by regeneration made a new man, all the faculties of his soul are renewed, his principles, affections, and practices are all new: Old things are passed, or passing away daily, the old carnal inclinations of mind are wearing off, the old will is changed, the old life is reformed; and, in a word, whatever was old and carnal, is now become new and spiritual, Behold, all things are become new; new affections, new inclinations, new dispositions, a new course, and a new conversation. Nothing is new physically; he is the same person, he has the same faculties: But all things are new qualitatively, he is renewed in the spirit of his mind. Learn hence, 1. That all such as call themselves the disciples of Christ, and own themselves to be his followers, are and ought to be new creatures. This implies a real and inward, a thorough and prevailing change both in heart and life; not a civil change, barely from profaneness to sobriety; not a sudden change, only under some great affliction or awakening providence: not a change from one sect or party of professors to another: But the change of the new creature consists in a new mind, a new will, a new judgment, new affections, in a new conversation, not in a new form or profession; the change of the new creature introduces the life of God, and produces the nearest likeness to God. Learn, 2. That this new creation, wrought in a man by the word and Spirit of God, is an indubitable evidence of his interest in Christ, and title to salvation; for where the new creature is, there all the saving graces of the Spirit are, as a pledge and an earnest of glory and happiness.

18 And all things are of God,—

That is, all those things fore-mentioned belonging to this new spiritual creation, are of God, as the author and efficient cause of them. Learn, that God is the original author of the new creature, and of all things belonging thereunto. This appears partly from the nature of the work. 'Tis a new creation; and partly from the objects of this work, the persons wrought upon. They are averse from God, in enmity to him, and rebellion against him, dead in sin, under the dominion of Satan. Well, therefore, might the apostle say, All these things are of God.

—Who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation:

19 To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

In these words the apostle gives us a short, but full account of the grand doctrine of a sinner's reconciliation unto God by the death of Christ, which is the principal subject and substantial part of the gospel. Where observe, 1. The privilege itself, reconciliation; this is twofold: Fundamental, in the death of Christ, he is our peace; God laid the foundation of our peace and reconciliation with himself in the death of his Son: Actual, in the application of it, on our part, by faith. The death of Christ rendered God reconcilable: Faith renders him actually reconciled. Observe, 2. The author of this reconciliation, God the Father; he was the person wronged by sin, declaring his anger against the sinner: Hence we are said to have access to the Father, through Christ, and by the Spirit. The Son brings us to the Father, and the Spirit directs us to the Son: Christ takes away God's enmity against us, and the Spirit takes away our enmity against God. Observe, 3. The medium or mean by which we become reconciled to God, Jesus Christ. Christ was the meritorious cause of this privilege: Christ is the centre of that agreement between the justice of God, and the mercy of God. Observe, 4. The parties at variance, and made one by reconciliation, God and the world, God and mankind. Almighty God, in consideration of Christ's death, did so far reconcile and forgive the offending world, as to offer them pardon of sin, and salvation by a Redeemer, upon a condition of their believing acceptance: But none are actually reconciled but believers, who actually accept the terms and conditions of peace and reconciliation by faith, which is a necessary receptive qualification. Learn hence, That there is a happy peace and reconciliation made in and by Jesus Christ, between an offended God, and an offending world.—Reconciliation is a repairing of decayed friendship, or the making up of a breach between two that were formerly friends, but now at variance. The reconciliation is mutual, because the enmity is such; yet the scripture speaks more of our being reconciled to God, than of God's being reconciled to us, because we are in the fault, and not God; we the cause of the breach, we offended God, not God us; and because we have the benefit of this reconciliation, and not God, 'tis no profit to him that we are at peace with him; and because all the difficulty of being reconciled lies on our part, and not God's.

20 Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.

Observe here, 1. The minister's office and employment declared: they are ambassadors for Christ, ambassadors from God to man; and, as ambassadors, they have their mission, their commission, from a great Prince, about great concerns; they must be faithful to their instructions, they are inviolable by the law of nations, and their embassy must be received, upon pain of displeasure. Where let us remark, the wonderful goodness and wisdom of God, in appointing men, of the same level with us, and not angels superior to us, to dispense the mystery of reconciliation to us. As God deals more familiarly with us in this way, (for we cannot bear the voice of God or the sight of angels) so there is more certainty in this way, because ministers must deceive their own souls, if they deceive us: And herein God magnifies his own power, and lets us know, that the efficacy of the gospel is from him the author, and not from man the dispenser. Observe, 2. The minister's duty discovered; in God's name, and Christ's stead, to intreat, beseech and persuade sinners to become reconciled unto God. Here note, 1. That God and man were once friends, 2. That God and man are now enemies. 3. That man, and not God, first made the breach of friendship, and occasioned that unhappy controversy, which is now depending between God and man. 4. That though man was first in the breach, yet God is first in the offer of reconciliation. 5. That therefore it is the highest duty and chiefest interest of man to accept of terms of peace, and reconciliation with God. 6. That in order to all this, the great duty incumbent upon the ministers of the gospel is this, with all earnestness to press upon people the doctrine of reconciliation, and to use all arguments with them, to persuade them to become reconciled unto God.

21 For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

Observe here, 1. The spotless innocency of our Lord Jesus Christ, as Mediator, declared: He knew no sin, that is, practically and experimentally; he knew it not so as to commit it in the least degree; he was a pure, innocent, and sinless person: But theoretically and speculatively he did know sin: He well understood its nature, its effects, and fruits: None knew the bitter fruits of sin so well as our blessed Saviour. Observe, 2. God's ordination of Christ, with reference unto sin: He hath made him to be sin; not made him a sinner, but a sin-offering, a sacrifice for sin.

Made; that is, ordained a sacrifice to expiate sin, and to bear the punishment due to sinners. Observe, 3. The end of this ordination with respect to us, That we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Here note, The righteousness of the Mediator is called the righteousness of God; because, 1. It was the righteousness of that person who was God. 2. Because the only wise God found out and appointed it. And, 3. Because it is accepted by God; and the penitent believer, for the sake of it, looked upon as righteous and justified. Learn hence, 1. That sin must have a sacrifice. He hath made him to be sin; that is, a sin-offering, or a sacrifice to expiate sin. Under the law the sacrifice was called sin, because the sin of the person was laid upon the sacrifice: there was a sort of a translation of the sin from the sinner to the sacrifice. Learn, 2. That Jesus Christ was made a sacrifice for our sin: Our guilt was imputed to him, and our punishment was borne by him: which made Luther call Christ the greatest sinner in the world; not that he had any sin in his nature, or in his life, but because the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all. Learn, 3. That Jesus Christ's being made sin for us, is the meritorious cause and means of our being made the righteousness of God in him. Surely God may be as just in pardoning us, who have no righteousness of our own, as in condemning his own son, who had no sin of his own. Have we broken his royal and righteous law? yet Christ has kept it, and fulfilled all righteousness. Have we sinned against mercy? yet Christ has suffered without mercy; And all this by the ordination and appointment of God the Father, who made his own and only Son "to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

CHAP. VI.

Our apostle having dispatched the apologetical or excusatory part of his epistle, comes now to the hortatory part of it. St. Paul's epistles excel both in matter and method. Their matter is principally reconciliation with God, and justification through faith in Christ; what subjects either so sweet or so profitable? Their method is by way of doctrine and use; a method, which, if it be despised, St. Paul's writings cannot be duly valued. In the last words of the foregoing chapter, he positively asserted the great doctrine of reconciliation through Christ. Now, in the beginning of this chapter, he draws inferences from that doctrine, by way of application. The first of which we have in the following words:

WE then as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain.

Here note, 1. The nature of the ministerial function: The ministry is a work; an arduous and laborious work:

neither angels nor men are of themselves sufficient for it, without proportionable assistance from God. Ministers are workers. Note, 2. They are workers together, they join together with one voice, with one cry, beseeching sinners to be reconciled unto God. All the ministers of Christ are fellow-labourers, workers together in God's harvest-field; that which is the work of one, is the work of all; they should all join in it, and rejoice together in the success of it: not only labour with, but bless God for the services and successes of each other. Lord! how sad is it to see the ministers of God divided in their work and way, when one rejoiceth in that which to another is the cause of mourning! Note, 3. Ministers are workers together with God, as well as with one another; they are subordinate instruments working by him, but not co-ordinate causes producing with him the work of conversion in the souls of men; not as if they could communicate any power or strength to the working of grace, by the preaching of the word, 1 Cor. iii. 5. "Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed?" Observe, 4. The exhortation, or cautionary direction given, We beseech you, receive not the grace of God in vain; where, by the grace of God, is meant the doctrine of the gospel: because it is graciously and freely bestowed upon a people, and because the matter and message which it brings is grace. The law discovers God's will, the gospel discovers his good will: And by receiving this grace in vain, is meant, the receiving the gospel unfruitfully, unprofitably, and ineffectually; when we do not receive it with a due estimation, with fervency of affection, with a fiducial application; when it doth not purify the heart, reform the life, and save the soul. It is not the receiving of the gospel into our houses, into our heads, into our mouths; but into our hearts, that will bring us to heaven.

2 (For he saith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.)

These words are taken from the prophet Isaiah, xlix. 8. They are a promise which God the Father made to Christ as Mediator, That in the great work of saving his church, the Father would accept and succour him, as the Head of the church: I have heard thee in an accepted time, in the day of salvation. Here note, There is a two-fold day of salvation; the one was Christ's day, for the purchase of salvation; the other is our day, for the application. 1. Christ had a season assigned him for the impetration or purchase of salvation: And he set in, and complied with that season, and it became an acceptable time with respect to him. 2. We have also our season allotted to us by God, for the application of Christ and his benefits to our souls. Behold, now is our accepted time, now is our day of salvation; let us prize it highly, and improve it faithfully. 'Tis a day, and that is but a short space of time: 'tis a day, and therefore continually spending: 'tis a day, therefore when once gone, is irrecoverably gone. Our working day is a wasting day: 'tis a day, and that will be followed with a night, in which none can work, but only lament their folly in not working. Behold, then! now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation.

3 Giving no offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed :

Observe here, 1. The nature and quality of the work which the ambassadors of Christ are called to; and do labour in a ministry. Observe, 2. What was the desire and aim, the care and endeavour, of the apostle then, ought to be the study of every minister now; namely, to avoid offence, and that universally, both as to persons and things, giving no offence in any thing. Observe, 3. What was the ground and reason of this care and endeavour to give no offence, namely, that the ministry be not blamed. Learn, That it is the standing duty of all the ministers of Christ, so to perform their ministerial office, that they give no just offence in any thing to any person, that so the ministry committed to them may not be blamed. We must give no offence by unsound doctrine, by personal reflections; no offence by gross, careless, and negligent omissions, or by rude and irreverent indecencies, or by any affected singularities in our administrations; but especially, give no offence by a bad life and scandalous conversation.

4 But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses.

5 In stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings.

Observe here, 1. The great care which the holy apostle took to approve himself unto God, in the exercise of his ministry: In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God. Observe, 2. What an approved minister must do and endure, in order to the obtaining the ends of his ministry: If he be called to it, he must bear up against all discouragements, and encounter all oppositions; let the way be what it will, fair or foul, a green carpet way, or dirty poachy way, he must stick at nothing, but go through thick and thin, patiently enduring afflictions of all sorts, and cheerfully undergoing sufferings of all kinds, and exercising all manner of self-denial, for the gospel's sake. Behold here, how the ministers of Christ, that will approve themselves unto God, must run all hazards, and venture through all extremities: They must work in heat and cold, in fire and frost, in all sorts of providences from God, in all sorts of aspects from men, fearing neither the face nor frowns of any: For though every gospel-minister attains not to St. Paul's zeal, and holy fortitude and courage, yet he has a truth of zeal, and such a firmness of resolution, as will, according to his measure, carry him through a world of evils and incumbrances, in the doing of that good which duty and conscience doth oblige him to, and call for; "in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in labours, in watchings, in fastings."

6 By pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned.

7 By the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left.

8 By honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report.—

The apostle, in the foregoing verses, had declared how many difficulties and dangers must be encountered by him that will attain the ends of his ministry, and approve himself unto God in integrity and uprightness: here he shews by how many ways and means the work of the ministry is promoted, and how the ministers of the gospel must be qualified for it; namely, by pureness of conversation, by knowledge of divine mysteries, and study of the holy scriptures, by long-suffering under all provocations, by kindness towards all men, by the gifts and assistances of the Holy Ghost, by the word of truth clearly preached, and by the power of God confirming it; by the armour of righteousness, which completely covers and protects us on the right-hand and on the left, both in prosperity and adversity; by passing through honour and dishonour; by going through evil report and good report. Here note, That the ministers of God do approve themselves, and trial is made of them, as well by the things on the right-hand as on the left. A minister of Christ is tried as well by honour as disgrace, as well by praise as by disparagement. The good report which we meet with in the world, is certainly as great, yea, a more dangerous temptation, than the evil reports we pass under: 'Tis a great trial to a minister to be dispraised and despised, to have dirt thrown undeservedly in his face; but verily, it is as great a trial to be praised, commended, and applauded, to be lifted up in the thoughts and upon the tongues of men. Solomon has an excellent proverb to this purpose, Prov. xxvii. 21. "As the fining-pot for silver, and the furnace for gold, so is a man to his praise;" that is, a man is tried by his praise, as really as silver is tried in the fining-pot, or gold in the furnace: Whenever a minister is praised, he is tried; his humility is tried, his self-denial is tried; when he is praised by men, he is tried whether he can give the entire praise to God: When people cry up such and such a preacher, they put him into the fining-pot; and he that is but dross, consumes. Let ministers remember there are trials on the right-hand, as well as on the left; that passing through honour, and going through good reports, are great trials, as well as passing through dishonour and evil reports. God prepare us for both.

—As deceivers, and yet true;

9 As unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed;

10 As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich: as having nothing, and yet possessing all things.

As if the apostle had said, Verily, our life is made up of seeming, but not real contradictions. The wise men of the world look upon us as deceivers, but we are the true dispensers of the word of life unto them; we are looked upon by the world as unknown, obscure persons; but we are well known to God and good men by our doctrine and miracles:

we are as dying persons daily, by our passing through so many perils, and by being exposed to continual persecutions, and yet you see we are still alive, and we are sometimes chastened by God, as well as persecuted by men, but we are not killed, nor given over unto death. Outwardly we are sorrowful, but inwardly always rejoicing in God, and in the testimony of a good conscience; in worldly goods and outward circumstances we are very poor, yet making many spiritually rich in grace and good works. We have nothing we can call our own, yet in Christ all things are ours. Hence observe, What has been the lot and portion of the faithful ambassadors and ministers of Christ from the first beginning of Christianity: the dirt of a thousand scandals had been thrown upon their faces, which in the day of Christ's appearance will be as crowns upon their heads. Observe, 2. That all outward evils are to be received by the ministers and members of Christ, in the same manner, and with the same mind, that good things are received with: Honour and dishonour, good report and evil report, must be entertained with the same evenness and constancy of mind, because God is the same in all variety of estates. Though men change their opinions of us, yet God changes not his judgment concerning us. He loves his ministers and members when poor, as well as when rich; when the world smites, as well as when it smiles upon us: Therefore, if God be the same to us at all times, it is our wisdom and duty to keep the temper of our minds, and to be always the same to him and to ourselves. Whatever we meet with from the world, we have no reason to be dissatisfied if our integrity be safe. Observe, 3. How rich the apostle was without earthly riches, and how abounding in wealth, when he had nothing of worldly treasure to rejoice in: Having nothing, he yet possessed all things. But how? and in what sense? Ans. He and they possessed all things: 1. In Christ, by whom they had a title to all things. 2. They had all things in the covenant, favour, and grace of God: He hath all things who hath him that hath all things. 3. They had all things virtually, in that contentment of mind which they did enjoy: They possessed all things in possessing themselves, and wanted nothing which they could deny themselves. The contented man is only rich; he is not rich that has much, but he that has enough; that man is poor that covets more. 4. They possessed all things eventually; they had the good of all things, when they had not the actual possession of all things; their poverty was a blessing, and their very wants in the event worked for good. 5. They possessed all things, in future expectation; they looked and longed for heaven and everlasting happiness; which would swallow up their desires with fruition; for he that overcometh, shall inherit all things, Rev. xxi. 7. Thus is this apostolical paradox unriddled, As having nothing, and yet possessing all things. True faith apprehends and enjoys all things in God, which it wanteth in the creature.

11 O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you. Our heart is enlarged.

12 Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels.

13 Now for a recompence in the same (I speak as unto my children) be ye also enlarged.

These words are very pathetic, and expressive of St. Paul's most affectionate and ardent love towards the Corinthians, whom he had been an happy instrument to convert unto Christianity. He tells them, his mouth was opened to them, not to receive, but to bestow; his mouth was open to fill them with the treasures of gospel-knowledge, not to be filled by them; and his heart, as well as his mouth, was open unto them, and at their service: If therefore they were straitened in affection towards him, who was thus enlarged in heart and mouth, by tongue and pen towards them, it must be through mistakes and misapprehensions on their part; therefore, in a way of recompence, he challenges it as just and fit, that the same reciprocal love be bestowed upon him their spiritual father, as he had manifested towards them his beloved children. Learn hence, That there is no stronger love, nor more endeared affection, between any relations upon earth, than between such ministers of Christ and their beloved people, whom they have been happily instrumental to convert to God: O ye Corinthians, our heart is enlarged towards you.

14 ¶ Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?

15 And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?

The holy apostle closes this chapter with an exhortation to avoid all intimacy with idolaters, either in civil affairs, in marriages, or in religious worship, lest they be brought into communion with their idolatry; there being no more agreement between a believer and an idolater, than betwixt light and darkness, betwixt Christ and Satan. And, as we must not join with idolaters in spiritual communion or religious worship, so should we have no communion with them in marriages; that having proved a dangerous snare to the souls of many, our divines have justly pronounced such marriages sinful: Nay, it is both wise and safe to have as little civil communion with idolaters as we can; and when we are necessitated to have civil communion with them, we must utterly avoid all sinful communion with them, that is, all communion with them in their sins. Learn, That to associate with idolaters, or to join in affinity with them, but especially to communicate with them in their idolatrous worship, is a God-provoking and wrath-procurring sin: Be ye not unequally and unsuitably yoked with unbelievers.

16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God: as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

This form of questions evidently implies the absolute inconsistency between believers and idolaters, and the danger from communion with them: And the apostle's calling be-lovers the temple of the living God. represents both their dignity and duty: their dignity, in having the Spirit of God to dwell in them, and work in them; their duty, to be purified and adorned for his habitation. Observe, Believers are a spiritual temple, in which the Holy Ghost dwells: This dwelling implies propriety, tranquillity, security, readiness, and fixity of abode. Observe, 2 That the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit in good men as in a temple, being the highest honour and most perfect felicity of the reasonable nature, should oblige them to universal holiness, and to avoid all communion with idolaters.

17 Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you;

18 And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

As if the apostle had said, "Go not then to the idol's temples; join not with idolaters in communion, to avoid persecution: but come out from amongst them as an holy people separated to the Lord, and defile not yourselves with any unclean thing; and while you are pure, and cleave to God, he will own you for his sons and daughters." Observe here, 1. A pressing exhortation to make a full separation from unclean persons and things, particularly from all idolaters, and idolatrous worship; Come out from among them: The words are taken out of Isa. lii. 11, where the prophet exhorts the remnant of Israel to come fully out of unclean Babylon. Learn hence, That God expects and requires his saints should make a separation from all uncleanness, but especially from the uncleanness of idolatry. God expects a separation from us, from all unclean courses, from all unclean company, from the presence and appearance of all uncleanness, from communion with idolatrous churches, and from communicating with what is sinful in the truest churches of Christ upon earth. Observe, 2. A quickening encouragement to back this exhortation; I will receive you, and be a Father to you. Here is a two-fold promise, 1. Of reception, I will receive you. 2. Of adoption, I will be a Father to you. God will receive them both into his house and heart. Learn hence, That Almighty God will, as a Father, undoubtedly receive all those into his family and favour who renounce communion with all impurity. As he is almighty, he is abundantly able, and as he is a Father, he is graciously willing, to recompence all the services and sufferings of his children, for the honour and interest of his name and truth. It is sufficiently known how this text hath been misapplied by separatists, to very bad purposes; 1. To justify their schismatical separation from the best and purest of the reformed churches, under pretence of finding greater purity amongst themselves: Whereas nothing will justify a separation from a church, but that which makes a separation between God and that church. If the church's way of worship (in their opinion) be faulty, they presently pronounce it false, and they must not join in false worship; whereas no man offers any worship to Almighty God that is not false worship, if all that is faulty be false worship: If Christ doth not disown his church for that faultiness, we ought not to desert her for it. 2. Others would seek occasion from these words, to justify their practice, in refusing to come to the Lord's table, where some vicious persons are apprehended to be, lest they should pollute the ordinance, and these touch the unclean thing; whereas the presence of a bad man at the sacrament pollutes the ordinance only to himself; for unto the pure all things are pure; and who will neglect a certain duty, to escape an uncertain danger? True, we must not own such worship as we know God rejecteth; but as God pardoneth the faulty imperfections of other men's worship, and our own also, thus must we bear with our own and one another's failings, that are tolerable, so far as we cannot cure them. Woe unto us, had Almighty God no more charity for us than we have for one another! A defective worship is not a false worship; sinful defects in the administration of ordinances, do not hinder the saving effects of ordinances; a wise and good man is certainly as great an enemy to separation, as he is to superstition: Doctrines crying up purity, to the ruin of unity, reject; for the gospel calls for unity, as well as for purity.

CHAP. VII.

HAVING therefore these promises, I, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

These words are argumentative, and infer the indispensable duty of Christians to preserve themselves untainted from the idolatrous impure world, by the consideration of the promises specified in the preceding chapter, I will dwell in you, and walk in you; and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people: A promise which contains the highest honour, and most perfect felicity, of the reasonable nature. Now from hence he infers, That Christians having such promises, such helps and assistances, should cleanse themselves from all sinful pollution, and endeavour after perfection in purity and holiness: Having therefore, &c. Observe here, 1. The title wherewith the apostle addresses himself unto them, Dearly beloved; this expresses both the truth and also the strength of his affections towards them: by this appellation he recommends his counsel to their acceptance: For, as light opens the mind by clear conviction, so love opens the heart by persuasive insinuation. Observe, 2. The matter of the address, and that is, to cleanse ourselves from all pollution both of spirit and flesh, and the changing of us into the unspotted image of God's holiness. The pollution of human nature is intimate and radical, diffused through all the faculties of the soul, and members of the body; we are therefore to pray for, and endeavour after renewing grace, and to be always advancing in holiness on earth, till we arrive at perfection in heaven. Observe, 3. The motive exciting hereunto; namely, the exceeding great and precious promises assured to us from the mouth of God, Having these promises, let us cleanse ourselves. Observe, 4. The means to help us therein, the fear of God. This grace has an eminent causality and influence in a Christian's sanctification; it is a powerful restraint from sin both in thought and act, by considering that God's pure and flaming eyes see sin wherever it is, in order to judgment. An holy fear of God, and an humble fear of ourselves, will both restrain us from sin, and engage us to obedience. From the whole, learn, That the promises of the gospel lay the most powerful obligations upon Christians to endeavour after, and strive for the attainment of pure and perfect holiness. As the pollution is universal, so must the cleansing be; and though thankful we must be for the least measure of sanctifying grace received, yet not satisfied with the greatest, short of our perfection; perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

2 Receive us: We have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man.

3 ¶ I speak not this to condemn you: for I have said before, that you are in our hearts to die and live with you.

4 Great is my boldness of speech toward you, great is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all our tribulation.

Observe here, 1. The duty which St. Paul exhorts the Corinthians to, namely, to receive him, their apostle, into their kind affections into the bosom of their love, Receive us; that is, into your best affections. The ministers of Christ are very desirous of a large share and interest in their people's love; well knowing, that if they be prejudiced against their persons, they will reap no benefit by their doctrine. Observe, 2. The solemn protestation which the holy apostle makes of his integrity and uprightness towards the Corinthians, "We have wronged no man, corrupted no man, defrauded no man;" that is, we have wronged none in their reputation by slander, we have corrupted no man's judgment by error and false doctrine, we have defrauded no men of any part of their estates, either by force or fraud. Learn hence, That the holy servants of God, especially the faithful ministers of Christ, may justify themselves, and make solemn protestations of their own integrity and uprightness, especially when they fall under jealousy and suspicion by the enemies of religion. As it was the continual practice of the false apostles to discredit St. Paul's ministry, and reflect upon his person; so it was his constant care to counter-work them, by a professed vindication of himself, and all his actions. Observe, 3. The fervour of the apostle's affection towards his Corinthian converts, You are in our hearts to live and die with you; that is, you lie and are lodged so near our hearts, that we could live with you, and die for you, to promote your spiritual and eternal welfare. Behold how large a room the people of God have in the affections of his ministers, how near do they lie to their hearts; and so passionately desirous are they of their people's salvation, that they could even lay down their lives, and die, to promote their temporal and eternal advantage. Observe, 4. How the apostle gloried in, and was comforted by the Corinthians, in the midst of all his afflictions, by the report he had of their repentance, obedience, and liberality; "Great is my glorying in you: I am filled with comfort, and exceeding joyful in the midst of all my tribulations." As if he had said, "Verily, the report I have had of your repentance and reformation upon the receiving of my former epistle, has filled me with such a weight of joy, as overbalances all the afflictions and tribulations which I meet with for the gospel." Learn hence, That the repentance and reformation of any of our people, by the blessing of God upon our ministerial endeavours, is matter of great rejoicing and glorying to us the ministers of God, who desire, above all things, the conversion, edification, and salvation of the souls of the people: "Great is my glorying in you; I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful."

5 For when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side: without were fightings, within were fears.

6 Nevertheless God, that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus;

7 And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me: so that I rejoiced the more.

Observe here, 1. When the apostle was come from Ephesus to Macedonia, how great a conflict he had, both from without and within: From without, by persecution and opposition both from the Jews and Gentiles; and from within, by fears lest the false apostles should have perverted any of his young converts from the simplicity which is in Christ; or fearing lest the Corinthians, being tender and weak in the faith, the violence of persecution, and the strength of temptation, should cause them to apostatize from their religion, and backslide from their holy profession. Observe, 2. A most endearing title given to Almighty God; He comforteth all those that are cast down. This is his dear title: He esteems himself more honoured with the amiable and endearing title of a Comforter and a Father, than with the glorious title of a Creator and a Sovereign. He is more pleased in doing us good, than we can be pleased in receiving of it; and can as soon forget himself, as forget his children. Observe, 3. The instrumental means which God made use of, for the apostle's consolation, support, and relief; namely, the coming of Titus. First, God comforteth us by the coming of Titus. Mark, he doth not intitle Titus, but God, by Titus, to the comfort he received. Whoever is the instrumental cause, God is the principal efficient cause of our consolation and comfort. It shews an holy flame of heart, when we stay not in creatures, but are carried to God as the author of our comforts and crosses. Secondly, The glad tidings and good news which Titus brought, as touching the Corinthians earnest desire to have all things amiss rectified, their sorrow expressed for the sin reproved, their fervent affection towards the apostle, their grief for offending him, their zeal to vindicate him; all these were matter of comfort and exceeding consolation to the apostle, under all his disquietness in Macedonia. Learn hence, That when troubles, both from without and within, do oppress the minds, and even sink the Spirits of the ministers of God; if they can but see the success of their labours in the lives of their people, that they are humbled for sin, and turned from it; this is matter of unspeakable consolation at present, and will be their crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ: When Titus told us "of your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind; I rejoice the more."

8 For though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent. For I perceive that the same epistle made you sorry, though it were but for a season.

9 Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

As if the apostle had said, Although in my former epistle I wrote somewhat sharply to you, by reason of the many abuses that were crept in amongst you; I do not now repent of that severity, because it produced a thorough and effectual reformation: Though at first I did repent of it, being unwilling to put you to grief; for I was troubled myself, because I was necessitated to trouble you. However, now I rejoice, not in your grief, as such, but because your sorrow was a godly sorrow, and wrought repentance, which is so necessary to forgiveness; so that my plain-dealing with you has evidently been no damage, but an advantage to you. Learn hence, That the faithful ministers of Christ must by no means omit the duty of sharp reproof, nor neglect to bring the censures of the church upon notorious offenders, how ungrateful soever the work is either to themselves or others. Learn, 2. That there is good ground to hope, that when the censures of the church are duly executed, they will have their desired effects, by bringing the offenders to repentance; and by repentance to remission and salvation: I rejoice, that ye sorrowed to repentance, for ye sorrowed after a godly sort.

10 For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of:

Note here, That sorrow for sin will be of no advantage or avail upon us, if it be not godly sorrow, or a sorrow according to God, as it runs in the original. Now it may be called a sorrow according to God, when it is a sorrow wrought in us by the Spirit of God, in obedience to the command of God, and with an eye at the glory of God; when it has sin, and not wrath, for its object; sin, as a wrong to God, as a contempt of his sovereignty, and a contrariety to his holiness. Again, It is then a godly sorrow, when it puts us upon an high prizing of Jesus Christ, who became a sacrifice for sin; and prompts us to a cordial and unfeigned forsaking of all sin to such a turning from it, as is resolved against all returning to it.

—But the sorrow of the world worketh death:

The sorrow of the world may be taken two ways, 1. For the sorrow of worldly men, whose sorrow for sin is only a vexing of their hearts, not a breaking or humbling of their hearts; which being separate from true faith, and without any purpose to leave sin, worketh death, by wearing out the natural life lingeringly, and sometimes destroying the natural life violently, as in the case of Judas. 2. By the sorrow of the world, may be understood a sorrow for worldly things, a sorrow for worldly losses and disappointments. This is sinful, when it is excessive; and as it is prejudicial to the soul, so doth it hurt the body, and hasteneth death. Worldly sorrow is a killing sorrow; "Godly sorrow worketh repentance: But the sorrow of the world worketh death."

11 For behold this self-same thing; that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge. In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.

The apostle, in the foregoing verse, had declared, that godly sorrow, or a sorrow wrought by the Spirit of God, worketh true repentance, and produceth a thorough reformation, not to be repented of: Now in this verse he proves, that the Corinthians sorrow for the incestuous person's sin, was of this nature, namely, a godly sorrow, because it produced such excellent effects and fruits as godly sorrow is wont to do. Seven of which he here reckons up. 1. Care, or an holy carefulness to amend what is amiss for time to come, by shunning and avoiding all occasions and temptations that lead to sin. He that truly repenteth, is careful not to sin again. 2. Clearing of themselves, that they did not approve the fact of the incestuous person, but did inflict the church's censures upon him, and so put away evil from amongst them. 3. Indignation against sin; this is found where godly sorrow is found; the heart rises, swells, and boils against sin; we are then angry and sin not, when we are angry at sin, and with ourselves for sinning. 4. Fear; a true penitent fears to offend; and that he may not offend doth nourish in himself an holy fear of God, and an humble fear of himself: There is found with him a fear of reverence, from an awful apprehension of the holiness and Majesty of God, and also a fear of diligence and vigilance, watching and warring against sin, that it may not set upon us and surprize us for the time to come. 5. Vehement desire, after a thorough reformation, and to rectify whatever is amiss; a desire to be rid of all sin, and in the mean time conflicting with it and groaning under it. 6. Zeal; this is an affection in a true penitent, compounded of love and anger. Be zealous and repent, is Christ's own call, Rev. iii. 19. This will make a penitent persist in the exercise and expression of his godly sorrow for sin, and persevere in his course of mortification, in defiance of all opposition made against him. 7. Revenge; this is the result of zeal, when our zeal boils into revenge, and puts us upon self-castigations; not so much upon our bodies with whips and scourges, but by the abatement of lust which stirrath in us, bulletting the flesh, and bringing it into subjection. And this revenge leads the penitent also to make satisfaction for wrongs done, either by open confession or secret restitution; "In all things you have approved yourselves to be clear of this matter." As if the apostle had said, "By these forementioned acts of yours, the body of you hath shewn that you did not approve of the incestuous person's sin, but evinced by your sorrow for it, that you are clear of it." Learn hence, 1. That there is no way to get clear of the guilt of other men's sins, but by duly mourning for them: Now you are clear of this matter. Learn, 2. That true repentance for sin, clears us from the guilt of it, both in the sight of God and man; and if so, it is both uncharitable and unchristian to stigmatize or reproach any person for the sin, which we either know or believe he hath truly repented of.

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, not for his cause that suffered wrong, but that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you.

Here our apostle tells them, that he did not write so passionately and severely to them, only or chiefly for the incestuous person's sake who had done the wrong, that he might be punished, not for his sake that had suffered the wrong, namely, the injured father, out of a particular kindness to have him righted; but that his general care, solicitude, and concern for them, the whole church of Corinth, to remove sin and scandal from them, might appear unto them.

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed by you all.

That is, in all the forementioned effects and fruits, signs and evidences of a true repentance, which were found in you, and are matter of great comfort to you, we are also comforted with you; and we also had a superadded joy, for the joy that Titus conceived, upon his understanding of your affairs; also your ready compliance with the duties and directions given you in my former epistle, did wonderfully refresh and rejoice his spirit; and in all these your consolations and comforts am I comforted. Hence learn, That such is the intimate and endeared union between the ministers and members of Jesus Christ, that they are comforted with one another's comforts, and afflicted with each other's sorrows and sufferings.

14 For if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed: but as we speak all things to you in truth, even so our boasting which I made before Titus is found a truth.

15 And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling you received him.

16 I rejoice, therefore, that I have confidence in you in all things.

Observe here, How the apostle had formerly taken occasion to speak boastingly, and not without assurance, concerning the church at Corinth. "Now says the apostle, whatever I said of you, is as infallibly and certainly true, as what I have heretofore either written or spoken to you." Happy is it when a minister's commendations of his people unto others, are not contradicted or gainsayed by the people themselves, but confirmed greatly. Here, what St. Paul had boasted of the Corinthians, Titus found a truth. Observe, next, With what inward affection Titus did embrace and receive the Corinthians, remembering with what great deference and regard they had received him; he is greatly affected towards you, upon his finding you so obedient to me. Nothing doth more endear a people to the ministers of Christ, than to find them obedient to their spiritual guides in things pertaining to godliness and religion: "The affection of Titus is more abundant towards you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all." Observe lastly, What confidence the apostle had, that the church of Corinth would hearken to, and comply with his future admonitions, exhortations, and reproofs: I have confidence in you in all things. It is a blessed thing when the ministers of the gospel and their beloved people have a mutual confidence in each other, and when that confidence on either side is not broken, but preserved and increased between them all their days; when they can say of each other, as doth the apostle here, "I rejoice that I have confidence in you in all things."

CHAP. VIII.

The design and scope of our apostle, in this and the following chapter, is to excite and stir up the Corinthians to a liberal contribution of their charity towards the poor saints in Jerusalem and Judea; and this he does by several arguments; as, namely, by the example of the Macedonians, by commendations of their former forwardness by the example of Christ, and by the special benefit and advantage which would certainly redound to themselves thereby. The former of these arguments is propounded, ver. 1.

MOREOVER, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia;

2 How that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy, and their deep poverty, abounded unto the riches of their liberality.

The first argument which our apostle makes use of to excite the charity of the Corinthians, is drawn from the example of the Macedonians, into whose hearts God had poured that excellent grace of charity: insomuch that the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, Bseræa, and other churches in the region of Macedonia, though under great trials and afflictions themselves, yet such was their joy in, and their affection to the christian profession, that notwithstanding their deep poverty, they abounded in their liberality towards the necessities of the poor saints in Jerusalem and Judea. Note here, 1. The root from which all acceptable charity to the members of Christ must arise and spring, namely, from the grace of God; from an inward principle of love to God, in obedience to his command, and with a pure and fixed eye at his glory. Liberality to the poor distressed members of Christ, as such must flow from that habit of divine love, by which men are taught of God to love one another; for though, from a natural sympathy and compassion men may relieve the afflicted, as men, yet without a gracious inclination they cannot do good to them, as members of the household of faith. Charity then is here called the grace of God, because it proceeds from a gracious disposition wrought in the heart by God, as the root and spring, the motive and attractive of it. Note here, 2. The condition which the churches of Macedonia were in themselves; when they thus liberally and cheerfully administered to the necessities of others, they were first under great affliction, and then in great poverty themselves; and yet the riches of their liberality are here said to abound.—From whence learn, That poverty excuses not from charity: if we have nothing actually to give, God accepts the inclination of the mind, and a willing desire. If we have but little to give, God will accept of our mite, and reward us for that little, if given for his sake. It is not the quantity of the gift, but the good affection of the giver, that God's eye is upon. If we give but a cup of cold water to a disciple, and as a disciple, God accepts it and rewards it, provided we have nothing better to give; for if our charity be not in some degree proportionable to what we have, it will not be acceptable, but we shall miss of its reward.

3 For to their power, (I bear record,) yea, and beyond their power, they were willing of themselves;

4 Praying us with much entreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints.

Three things are here recorded as the glory of the Macedonians' charity. 1. It was profusely liberal, beyond their ability: "To their power, yea, and beyond their power, they were ready." Though, generally speaking, we are to consult our own ability and present circumstances in all our charitable distributions; yet there may be, and sometimes are, emergent occasions as may make it a necessary duty to administer to others' necessities far beyond our own ability. 2. Their charity was purely voluntary: they were willing of themselves; that is, unsolicited by the apostles, unasked by any other, only prompted to it by the grace of God: they made a collection amongst themselves freely and cheerfully. 3. Their charity was accompanied with importunity to the apostle to receive and distribute it. He was so far from entreating them to give, that they entreated him to receive their collection, and to take care for its conveyance to them, and distribution among them: "praying us with much entreaty, that we would receive this their gift, and fellowship of ministry to the saints."

5 And this they did, not as we hoped; but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God:

As if the apostle had said, "Verily these Macedonians, in the liberal distribution of their alms to the poor christians, have exceeded our hopes and expectations." Wherein? First, They gave their own selves to the Lord, and then unto us by the will of God. They gave themselves, their own selves, first to the Lord. To give a man's self to the Lord, is more than to give all his estate to him, though, strictly speaking, it is rather a debt than a gift: for we owe ourselves to the Lord. And, oh, how infinitely shall we gain by this giving! he gains all, who gives his all to God: God will return it with advantage to him.—Next, the Macedonians, says the apostle, gave themselves unto us by the will of God; that is, they resigned themselves up to us, to be employed by us in such services as we thought meet. It seems they were ready to assist the poor saints, as well with their persons as with their purses. From the Macedonians giving themselves first to the Lord, and then to the church's service, in all charitable distributions, we learn. That he that does not first dedicate himself, will never dedicate his estate to God; but he that by a deliberate and voluntary dedication gives himself to God, will keep back nothing that he requires from him: yea, he will look upon all that he has and is, as the Lord's: not an inch of his time, not a penny in his purse, but it is to be employed by, and improved for God. He looks upon God as the owner and proprietor of all, and himself as the steward and dispenser only: Oh! let us, in imitation of these noble, though poor Macedonians, first give ourselves to the Lord, and then we shall never withhold any thing that is ours from him.

6 Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same grace also.

7 Therefore, as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also.

8 I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love.

Here our apostle proceeds to make use of several other arguments to persuade the Corinthians to the exercise of the duty and grace of charity: as namely, 1. Because he had desired Titus to go to them; and as he had in his last visit begun to stir them up to this duty, and to exercise this grace, so he would farther promote and bring it to perfection. And, 2. Because they abounded in other graces and gifts; as namely, in faith, in utterance, and knowledge, &c. therefore they ought to abound in this grace also, otherwise they would not be complete in the whole will of God. 3. Because hereby they would testify the sincerity of their love to the saints. It is not good words, but charitable deeds, that evidence the truth of our love to our fellow members in Christ; not saying, Be ye warmed or be ye clothed: but distributing to their necessities according to our abilities. Yet, observe, The apostle doth not command their purses, and require so much of them for charity: he mentions no particular sum, much less doth he command them to give away all their estates, and live upon a common stock, and leave nothing to themselves which they could call their own, for if a man has nothing of his own, there is no room for liberality. There must be prudence when in the exercise of our charity, prudence in finding out proper objects for our charity, prudence in timing of our charity, prudence in the measure of our charity, and prudence in the end which we propound to ourselves in the exercises of our charity.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich.

Here we have the grand motive used by the apostle to excite their charity, namely, the example of Christ, who impoverished himself to enrich us, and emptied himself to fill us; therefore should we be ready to administer unto others: "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." &c. Observe hence, 1. A description of Christ in his divine nature, as God: he was originally, essentially, and eternally rich: that is, in his Godhead. All the riches that Christ now has in his state of exaltation, he had from all eternity; before his humiliation, with respect to his divine nature, he was rich. Observe, 2. A description of Christ in his human nature, he became poor; that is, in the day of his incarnation, when he assumed our flesh, and was made manifest in our nature, he impoverished himself: though he was rich, yet he became poor. Observe, 3. The persons for whose sake he did thus impoverish himself: "For our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." Observe, 4. The moving, impelling, or impulsive cause of this condescension in Christ, and that was the graciousness of his nature: "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." Observe, 5. The use and improvement which the apostle makes of this gracious dignation and condescension in Jesus Christ, and that was by way of argument, to excite the believing Corinthians to exercise their charity towards the poor saints which were at Jerusalem. Learn from hence, That the extensive charity and wonderful compassion of Christ towards us sinners, has both the force of an argument to excite us to, and also the nature of a rule to direct us in, the exercise of our charity towards all our fellow-brethren and members of Christ: "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," &c.

10 And herein I give my advice: for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be forward a year ago.

11 Now therefore, perform the doing of it; that, as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have.

12 For if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

Here the apostle proceeds to a fresh argument for the quickening and exciting the Corinthians' charity, drawn from their own reputation. He had heard, that a year ago, upon writing his former epistle, they had made several collections, at several times, as their gains came in; his advice therefore is, that they perfect and complete the good work which they had undertaken; and that as there was a readiness and willingness of mind then, so there might be a performance of their good resolutions now: for whatsoever is given to God, is accepted according to what a man has, and it is not expected he should give according to what he has not. Learn hence, That God interprets and accepts the charity of men, according to the largeness of their hearts, and not according to the straitness of their fortunes. It is not so much the quantity of the gift, as the good-will and cheerful mind of the giver, that God looks at: "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted." Learn farther, That to do any good with a willing mind, be it little or much, is very acceptable to God; if there be little of the purse, and much of the heart in it, provided that little be what we can well spare, The Lord hath a great respect unto it. Learn lastly, That as we must give, so God will accept what is given, according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not. What is due to another, either by debt or duty, in making provision for those of our own family cannot be charitably given, as being not our own.

13 For I mean not that other men be eased, and you burdened:

14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want, that there may be equality:

15 As it is written, He that had gathered much had nothing over; and he that had gathered little had no lack.

Observe here, The humble modesty and holy prudence of the apostle, in what he demanded of the Corinthians by way of charity for the poor saints in Judea. He tells them freely, he did not design to lay a load upon them, to ease others, or to make others rich by making themselves poor; but that there might be an equality in supplying the wants of one another, that now you abound, you may supply them; and when they abound, they may supply you; yet mark, We must not by the equality mentioned here, understand it so, as if the wisdom of the divine providence had ordained levelling, or making all men equal in the portion of the good things of this life: but so far christianity seems to require this equality, that we should not suffer others to lack the necessary comforts of this life, whilst we abound with them, and can spare them, and suffer them to sink in their sorrows, whilst we swim in fulness. Learn hence, There is a debt of mercy and pity, of charity and compassion, of relief and succour due to human nature, and payable from one man to another; and such as deny to pay it the distressed in the time of their abundance, may justly expect it will be denied themselves in the time of want. To confirm this, the apostle draws an allusion from the gatherers of manna in the wilderness; some gathered more, and others less; but they that had more, were to give them that had less: in like manner would Almighty God have it, that they which have great riches, should impart of their abundance, to them that are in want; otherwise, Almighty God will shrink their heap into some equality with them whom they refused to relieve. With what measure we mete, in acts of charity, as well as in acts of justice, it shall be measured to us again.

16 ¶ But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he accepteth the exhortation; but being more forward of his own accord he went unto you.

18 And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches;

19 And not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind.

As if the apostle had said, I thank God that Titus was as forward to move you to this good work as myself; for he did not barely yield to it my request, but of his own accord, was ready to come to you about it. And with him we sent Luke, a beloved brother, whose service for the gospel has made him honorable in all the churches, and who was chosen by the church, to go with us in his deaconary service, namely, the ministration of your charity to the glory of God, and evidencing the readiness of your mind to so good a work.—Here note, 1. The holy apostle's constant custom and practice, to refer all good in us to God as the author and producer of it; "Thanks be to God, that put this into the heart of Titus." Note 2. That a minister of the gospel, who declines being chargeable to his people himself, may yet put on confidence, and be bold and importunate in urging them to charity for the service and supply of others. Note, 3. That St. Paul's importunity for collecting this charity at Corinth, shows how much the case was altered, since at Jerusalem, Acts iv. they sold all and laid it at the apostle's feet: and as that was not intended for a constant and universal practice, so we see how quickly the love of christians grew more cold. To procure this charity, St. Paul writes, Titus is sent, exhortation is given, arguments urged, and all due means used to accomplish this collection for the poor distressed christians. Note, 4. That amongst christians, renowned for gifts and parts, costly duties come hardly off, else what need this ado? And yet it is not the cheap duties of religion (such are prayer, hearing the word, and receiving sacraments) but the costly duties of charity, that must evidence the truth of our faith and love, which are certainly dead, if barren and destitute of these fruits.

20 Avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this abundance which is administered by us;

21 Providing for honest things, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men.

22 And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you.

Note here, The holy wisdom of this great apostle, in joining some other persons with himself, as Titus and Luke, &c. in the distribution of this charity; lest evil-minded men should suspect him of dishonesty, he takes care to cut off all occasion of suspicion, that he either kept any part of this large contribution to himself, or distributed it unfaithfully unto others; "Avoiding this, that no man should blame us." Note, 2. The reason also assigned by the apostle for this his prudential management; namely, because as a minister and a christian he was obliged to provide and take care that all things be done blamelessly in the sight of men, as well as faithfully in the sight of God. The apostle, by this his example, recommends to all ministers and private christians, a prudential foresight of such scandalous imputations, as they may be exposed to by the world, let their sincerity in their actions be what it will; and let us see how we ought to provide against them: any one of these upright persons alone, either St. Paul alone, Titus alone, or St. Luke alone, were sufficient to be intrusted alone with the distribution of this charity; but the apostle did not know what a censorious world might say; and therefore to cut off all occasion, and to prevent all suspicion, he wisely appoints several persons to be witnesses of this action. If there be not, in some cases, over-much caution, all is too little, and not enough.

23 Whether any do inquire of Titus, he is my partner, and fellow-helper concerning you; or our brethren be inquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ.

24 Wherefore show ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our boasting on your behalf.

Observe here, What pains the apostle takes to answer all cavils and objections that might hinder the free collection and regular distribution of this charity. Some might pretend, possibly, to say, then (as many amongst us do now) "We know not into whose hands this charity-money may fall: we know not whether ever they shall be the better for it, for whom it was intended." Therefore, says St. Paul, if any make that objection, that they do not know Titus, and inquire after him, or his trustiness, tell them he is my coadjutor, my partner, and fellow helper in converting you to christianity; and if the other two be inquired after, they are our brethren the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ; that is, the instruments of his glory: therefore let these messengers see, and the churches which did dispute them, the proof of your love to me, and to the saints, and that I did not boast of your liberality in vain. Note here, The high honor which St. Paul puts upon the ministers of the gospel, in calling them the glory of Christ, that is, the glory of the gospel of Christ, the glory of the christian profession, the instruments of Christ's glory, by whom his honor and glory is greatly promoted; persons, who, by their exemplary gloriousness, did bring much honor and glory to Christ. This title, I conceive, shows both our dignity and duty: our dignity in that Christ accounts us his glory when we are found faithful to him: as the faithfulness of an ambassador redounds to the glory and honor of the prince that sends him: and it points out our duty to promote the glory of Christ, to pray and endeavour that he would use us as instruments for the advancement of his glory; that as we glorify him on earth, he may glory in us, and be glorified by us, before his Father in heaven, and we be presented faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. Amen.

CHAPTER IX.

The argument of this is the same with that of the foregoing chapters: namely, to excite the Corinthians to a liberal and cheerful contribution towards the poor saints at Jerusalem, which were then under pressing necessities: and having laid several arguments before them, to quicken them to the duty, he comes now to give directions concerning the right and acceptable performance of the duty, advising them to give liberally, because God had abundantly blessed and increased them; and cheerfully, because the Lord loveth a cheerful giver.

FOR as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you:

2 For I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago; and your zeal hath provoked very many.

Observe here, The holy art and skill of this wise and great apostle, in prompting forward and putting on those Corinthians to this work of pious charity: he insinuates their present forwardness, to provoke them to farther forwardness: he tells them, it was superfluous for him to use farther arguments with them; for their forwardness was known unto him, and boasted of by him to the Macedonians, that the christians in Achaia (of which Corinth was the chief city) had made a proposal to supply the poor saints of Judea a year ago: and that their zeal therein had provoked very many to the like forwardness. It is very happy, when the ministers of Christ find their people forward and ready to every good work, to costly works of charity especially; yet it will be their wisdom, by commending their people for what they have done, to encourage them to do farther; not only for increasing their own reward, but for provoking many to do the like; "I know the forwardness of your mind, and that your zeal hath provoked very many."

3 Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be in vain in this behalf; that, as I said, ye may be ready:

4 Lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me and find you unprepared, we (that we say not, you) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting.

5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

As confident and fully persuaded as the apostle was of the readiness and willingness of mind that was found in the Corinthians towards this charitable contribution, yet he judgeth it both expedient and necessary to send the brethren before to them, to get all things ready, the collection finished and over: that so when he himself, and the Macedonians should come to Corinth, he might not be put to the blush for them, having made great boasts of their charity, but finding no deeds: and also he desires their collection may be ready, with respect to themselves, that so their beneficence may appear to be their own free bounty, and not a collection difficultly extorted from them, as from covetous men, who give grudgingly and unwillingly. Note here, That it is very lawful for the ministers of Christ to use an holy craft, and innocent guile, to draw men to a speedy compliance with their duty; sometimes by engaging their reputation in it, and sometimes alluring them by just praises to the doing of it. Thus our apostle did here. Note, 2. That the readiness which St. Paul here presses them to, is not the readiness of the mind, but the readiness of the action: he was well satisfied, that they were ready in their preparation of mind long ago, but he presses them to finish the collection of which he had so much boasted to the Macedonians. Note, 3. How the blessed apostle did consult the Corinthians' honor and reputation equally with his own, and was as desirous to prevent reflections upon them, as upon himself; at his coming among them. Note, 4. That a liberal free-giving to the saints in distress, is called here χαρις και ευλογια, grace and blessing; we translate it bounty: It is called grace, because an heart to give liberally is wrought in us by the grace of God; the world shuts up our hearts till God opens them; and if the heart be open, the hands will not be shut; and works of charity are a blessing of God with our substance, and the way and means to produce his blessing upon our substance. Giving to distressed saints in proportion to what God has given us, is by Almighty God, accounted a blessing of him, and a blessing of our fellow brethren; and whoever thus blesses God shall be blessed by him. Note, 5. That the Corinthians being a very rich and wealthy people, the apostle stirs them up to an abundant charity. Where God gives much, he expects much: but how many, alas! grudge God a little of his own! And how difficultly is that little drawn from them like drops of blood! Whereas, to give alms purely to satisfy the importunity of others, or out of shame, misses of its reward before God.

6 ¶ But this I say, He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly: and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully.

7 Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver.

Here the apostle comes to direct the Corinthians, how and after what manner they should give their alms; so as to secure a blessing; namely, deliberately. 1. As he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; as he determined and resolved within himself. When a christian gives, he must take care that it be his own act as much as he can. Some men give what they did never intend, and bestow what they did never choose or design to bestow: importunity extorts charity from some; they give, to get rid of the noise, and purchase their quiet with their alms: whereas, the liberal man devises liberal things, the good man lays by in store what he intends, to bestow in alms. 2. Freely, bountifully; for he that soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully; that is, he that giveth liberally to the poor, shall be liberally rewarded by God; no wise man will pinch his ground of the seed. The proportion, or how much every one should give, cannot be determined, because that must be measured according to the ability of him that giveth, and according to the necessity of him that receiveth. 3. Cheerfully, not grudgingly, or of necessity: for the Lord loveth a cheerful giver. In all thy gifts show a cheerful countenance, says the wise man; let us give with the same cheerfulness that we would receive, and be as willing to give, as the needy are to receive; nay, it is our duty to seek out objects: for some of Christ's members have as great modesty as they have necessity, and cannot speak for themselves: and let none think that this liberality will prejudice their estates; no, it is men's lusts that undo them, and not their charity.

8 And God is able to make all grace abound towards you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work:

9 As it is written, He hath dispersed abroad: he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever.

Here the apostle tacitly answers the common objection against liberal alms-givings; men are afraid they shall want themselves, what they give away to others; no, says the apostle, God is able to make all grace and mercy shown by you, to abound the more towards you; that you having a sufficiency of the comforts of this life, may abound in every good work of charity towards others. As if he had said, "Be not afraid to give, nor sparing in giving; for hereby you make God your debtor, and you will find him an all-sufficient pay-master; he will repay you both in temporals and spirituals. Thou shalt receive silver for thy brass, gold for thy silver, grace for thy gold, a treasure in heaven for thy dross on earth: nay, your gold and silver will multiply here, as seed sown, when scattered with a wise and prudent hand." The apostle here engages God's all sufficiency for it: God will show his all sufficiency, in giving you an all-sufficiency in all things: only we must remember, that we are to allow time; for Almighty God loves to be trusted upon his word; and those that will not give him credit, let them try if they can improve their estates better, or put them into safer hands.

10 ¶ Now he that ministereth seed to the sower, both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness.

11 Being enriched in every thing to all thankfulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God.

Some look upon these words as a prayer, others as a promise, that as Almighty God blesseth the increase of the earth so largely, that it sufficeth for the nourishment of men; and for seed to sow again; in like manner would he supply all their wants, and grant them ability to supply the wants of others, and plentifully reward them for all the fruits of their righteousness and mercy: and they being thus enriched by the goodness of God, and exercising all bountifulness, towards their brethren, much thanksgiving and praise upon that occasion is given unto God. In these last words is couched an argument farther to press the Corinthians to this liberality; namely, that it would cause both the ministers of Christ, the dispensers of this charity, and also the poor saints, the receivers of it, to offer up incessant praises and thanksgivings to God for the same.

12 For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God :

13 Whiles by the experiment of this ministration, they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and you for liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men :

14 And by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding grace of God in you.

Still our apostle proceeds, by way of motive, farther to excite and stir up the Corinthians to this charitable contribution, from sundry considerations; namely, first, That it would be a very seasonable supply to the church's wants, who were at this time in great want of it: now, the seasonableness of any mercy, adds greatly to the worth and value, to the pleasure and sweetness of it. Secondly, That it would occasion repeated praises and incessant thanksgivings to God, for many persons, and upon many accounts. Thirdly, This distribution of yours, says the apostle, will be a convincing experiment, evidence and demonstration of your professed subjection to the gospel, and that your faith is not barren and ineffectual. No better evidence of our real subjection to the gospel of Christ, than a cheerful compliance, not with the cheap, but with the costly duties of christianity. Lastly, For your alms, you will engage a stock of prayers going for you: this will procure, yea, provoke them to pray night and day for you, day, not only engage prayer for you, but it will also draw forth their love and fervent affection towards you, make them very desirous of your acquaintance, having received such an experiment of the grace of God that is in you.

15 Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

Here the apostle concludes his discourse upon this great argument, with a doxology, praising and blessing God for putting it into their hearts, in so liberal a manner, to relieve the necessities of the saints, by which so much glory did redound to God, and so much honor to the christian religion. This he calls, not barely, an admirable, but an unspeakable gift; because a gift by which God was so much glorified, the gospel adorned, the poor saints so much comforted, and they themselves so plentifully rewarded:—

Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift. But if the Corinthians' charity was an unspeakable gift, what was the gift of Christ? the gift of God to a lost world to whom this title of unspeakable doth best agree; who is the author and finisher of all grace, and particularly of this noble grace of charity in the hearts of his people; for he sends his holy Spirit, and pours into their hearts his most excellent grace of charity, the very bond of peace, and of all virtues, without which, whosoever liveth, is counted dead before him.—Eternal thanks then be to Christ for this admirable gift of charity, and thanks be to God for the unspeakable gift of Christ. Amen.

CHAPTER X.

Our apostle having, in the former chapters, pleaded with the Corinthians on the behalf of the poor christians in Judea, he comes in this chapter, to plead for himself, and to vindicate his authority from the contempt cast upon it by the false apostles, who pretended to say, that when he was personally present, he was humble and mild; but when absent, severe and bold: thus unworthily interpreting his gentleness, condescension and winning affability to be no better than a fawning upon them for false ends: wherefore he gives them, in this chapter, to understand, that he was well acquainted with their vilifying reflections and calumnies, which were both unreasonable and unjust, and that he resented them as such.

NOW I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you :

2 But I beseech you, that I may not be bold when I am present with that confidence wherewith I think to be bold against some, which think of us as if we walked according to the flesh.

Observe here, 1. The charge brought unjustly against St. Paul by the false apostle, namely, that when he was present with the Corinthians, he was low and humble enough to some degree of baseness; but when absent, that then he writes like a lord to them, and exercises an authority with pride and imperiousness over them. The greatest apostle, no more than the meanest minister of Jesus Christ, cannot expect protection from slander, and false accusation. Observe, 2. The pious and prudent course which the apostle takes for his own necessary and just vindication; he beseeches them, by all that meekness and gentleness, which according to the command and example of Christ, he desired to express towards them, firmly to believe that he desired nothing more, than not to be forced to use his power with that boldness towards them, which he feared he must use against the false apostles, who accused him of too much servility and meanness in his behaviour amongst them, and reproached his ministry as carnal and self-seeking.

3 For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh;

That is, "Although I yet dwell in the body, and consequently am not free from human infirmities and weaknesses; yet neither my ministry nor my life are from fleshly principles, by fleshly means, or fleshly ends." The best and holiest of men in this life walk in the flesh; they are clothed with a mortal body, but they do not war after the flesh, they do not fight under the banner of corrupt nature. Here note, The christian life described; it is a warfare; we war; it is a life of vigorous opposition. The christian has many enemies to conflict with, and to contend against, both outward and inward enemies; in a passive sense, he is a man of strife and contention, his hand is against many, and many hands against him; he doth not manage a war for the flesh, but against the flesh: and in the next verse, tells us with what weapons he managed this war.

4 (For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds:)

5 Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.

Observe here, 1. That as the life of every christian is a continual warfare, so the ministers of the gospel are more eminently men of war; they fight against principalities and powers; and the devil draws up his full strength to pull down the office of the ministry, which is erected for the pulling down the strong holds of him and his kingdom. Observe, 2. The weapons which these spiritual warriors, the ministers of the gospel, do make use of in their conflict and combat with sin and satan; The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but spiritual. They are not carnal or fleshly weapons, that we use, neither fraud nor flattery, nor force; but spiritual armor, with which we batter the fortresses of sin and satan, namely, the sword of the Spirit, the word of God, the plain and persuasive preaching of the gospel, the Holy Spirit, miracles of all sorts, eminent wisdom and patience, exemplary zeal and courage in executing and inflicting the censures of the church upon the disobedient. Observe, 3. These weapons are called mighty; but mighty through God; that is, as quickened by the power, and presence of God's Spirit. Then is our ministry mighty, when made mighty through God. The spirits of darkness cannot be conquered but by spiritual weapons. It is as possible to make an impression with your finger upon a wall of brass, as for the best sermon in the world to make an effectual impression upon a sinner's will, without the co-operation and concurring assistance of the Holy Spirit: "The weapons of our warfare are spiritual and mighty through God." It is the Spirit that gives them their success and efficacy: there is a real spiritual power and energetical presence of Christ, in his own institutions and appointments. When the sword of the Spirit is taken into the hand of the Spirit, it works wonders. Observe, 4. The great and good execution which these particular weapons do effect and accomplish, when thus accompanied with the power of God; they are mighty to the pulling down of strong holds. By which some do understand a particular beloved lust: a special sin, by which satan keeps and holds possession of the sinner's heart. Others understand it more generally of every thing that opposeth, resisteth, and hindereth the success of the gospel; and particularly the stubborn will of the sinner, which is so strong an hold that no power short of an Almighty power, can influence it to surrender: Casting down imaginations or reasonings, and proud conceits, and particularly unbelief, in which sinners fortify themselves against the convictions of the word, disdaining to submit themselves to the abasing, humble, and self denying way of the gospel. But behold the glorious conquest which the gospel of Christ obtains over sinners thus fortified against it; "It casts down imaginations, and pulls down every strong hold." Thus the ministry of the gospel spoils satan of his armor, in which he trusted, by showing the sinner, that all this can be no defence to his soul against the wrath of God. Observe, 5. The improvement of the victory: the gospel doth not only lead away these enemies spoiled, but brings them into captivity and obedience to itself. O happy and blessed conquest! Sinners do not only lay down their arms, and fight no more against Christ, but they repair to his camp, and fight for him with those reasonings of theirs which before were employed against him. O! blessed victory! where the conqueror and conquered both triumph together.

6 And having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled.

That is, having in a readiness that which will revenge all disobedience upon refractory and stubborn offenders (namely, the power of excommunication) and both authority and ability to inflict such corporal punishment as he judged fit, by delivering them unto satan; which power he resolved to make use of, when the greater part of them were, by their obedience to his admonitions, reduced to good order again. Where note, That the apostle defers the excommunicating and censuring the offenders amongst them, they being very many, till he had, by exhortation and argument, brought over as many as possibly he could unto obedience. There is no place for severe remedies, when the diseases have taken and infected the whole church: the offenders in the church when very many cannot be easily punished; for when great multitudes are concerned, they are like to draw great multitudes after them. The apostle's practice in this case here, is a good pattern for our imitation, not to be too forward, rash, and hasty in denouncing the censures of the church, but to proceed prudently and gradually: first using all fair means and gentle methods, and waiting with all patience for the reducing them to their duty who will be reduced, and then revenging the glory and honor of God only upon such as will by no means be reclaimed or reduced.

7 Do we look on things after the outward appearance? If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's.

Because the false apostles had taught the Corinthians to despise St. Paul, upon the account of his mean appearance: he here expostulates with them, and desires to know whether they would judge of men by outward appearance, or by inward worth? As if he had said, "Are ye so weak as to judge of me by my outward person, by my bodily presence, by the meanness of my garb, by the smallness of my stature, by my outward aspect and countenance? but if you will judge of me, and the pretended apostles, by ministerial gifts and authority received from Christ, surely I have as much to show of these, as they can pretend to show; for in nothing was I behind the very chiefest apostles. There is no judging of men, much less of ministers, by outward appearances. Much real worth sometimes lodges within, when nothing but what is despicable and contemptible appears without.

8 For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed.

As if the apostle had said, I have not only an equal power and authority with those which despise me (the false teachers) but I have an authority and power which they can not, dare not, will not pretend unto; namely, the power to inflict corporal punishment upon obstinate and contumacious offenders, and delivering them up to satan; which power, if at any time I make use of, it is for edification, not for destruction. This rod is not to be used rashly, but discreetly, by me. Observe we, and learn from hence, an excellent rule, Never to handle the censures of the church (those edge-tools) but with care and caution, with an intention to reform, not to ruin; to save, not to destroy: the church's power is for edification, not for destruction.

9 That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters.

10 For his letters (say they) are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible.

11 Let such an one think this, that such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such we will be also in deed when we are present.

Our apostle here goes on, vindicating himself from the aspersions and reflections which the false teachers cast upon him. They told the Corinthians, that St. Paul's letters were indeed severe and authoritative, terrifying and affrighting: but his personal presence was weak, and his speech contemptible. Tradition tells us, that Paul (according to his name) was a man of a very little stature, and his voice answerably small; whence probably, the false apostles took occasion to raise this report of his presence and speech. St. Chrysostom saith, that St. Paul's stature was low, his body crooked, his head bald; and when it is added, that his speech was contemptible, it cannot be understood as if it were so for want of eloquence, but it is thought, this refers rather to some infirmity, or natural impediment, which the apostle might have in his speech. The gift of knowledge and learning, and the gift of utterance and elocution, as they are distinct in their nature, so they are separable in their subject, and do not always go together; a person of the profoundest knowledge is not always happy in elocution and utterance. However, in these false teachers we see the constant method and practice of impostors and seducers; namely, to asperse and lessen all that stand in their light. This is an old way of insinuating into the people. The false apostles feared they should never reign at Corinth, but by bringing St. Paul into disesteem with the Corinthians; therefore they say, "his letters are weighty, but his bodily presence weak." But the apostle, ver. 11, gives them to understand, that they should find him the same both absent and present: and that his deeds then should appear as awful as his words now; that when he came again, he would not spare but punish all disobedience. Note here, That the thing which St. Paul would have his accusers fear, was, that by the miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost given to him to inflict corporal punishments upon disobedient persons, they should speed as Elymas did, Acts. xiii. 8. who was smitten with blindness, &c.

12 ¶ For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise.

13 But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you.

14 For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ.

Observe here, 1. St. Paul's just charge, which he brings in against the false apostles, for their pride and vanity, in commending themselves, and comparing themselves with such as were like themselves: "The measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves amongst themselves, are not wise." The reason why many think themselves wiser than they are, is, because they compare themselves with those that are below themselves, and not above them in understanding and knowledge. It is an excellent mean to keep us from pride to consider how many are above us in knowledge: and there are thousands so much excelling us in understanding, that our knowledge is but ignorance, our feeling but weakness, our faith but unbelief, our fruitfulness but barrenness, compared with theirs. Observe, 2. As the pride and vanity of the false apostles, so the great modesty and humility of St. Paul, the true apostle of Christ Jesus: "but we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure which God hath distributed to us." Where note, The apostle makes his apostleship or preaching of the gospel, to be, as it were, his spiritual exercise, or running a race, to which he here alludes: declaring that he kept his providence, his stage, his compass of ground which God had marked out to him; beyond or out of which line, whosoever pretends to run, doth over extend himself, and boast without his measure. Observe, 3. That the apostle's line, or measure, reached as far as Corinth, where Christ never had been preached; thither he came, and there he first planted the christian faith amongst them; and he takes occasion from thence, to advance himself above the false apostles. 1. That he could show a commission to preach to the Corinthians; a measure by which God had distributed the Corinthians to him, as his proper province, which none of them could pretend unto. 2. That whereas they went out of their line, leaping from one church to another, he went on orderly in the conversion of churches to the faith, from Judea, through all the interjacent provinces, till he came to Corinth. 3. That whereas they came to those churches where the gospel had been already preached, and so could only boast of things made ready to their hands, he preached the gospel where Christ was not named before.

-15 Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labors: but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly.

16 To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand.

Here the apostle tells the Corinthians, that he would not boast of other men's labors, nor pretend any title to those christians at Corinth, nor any where else, whom others had converted, as the false apostles did; notwithstanding he declares his hope, that when the gospel should have an eminent success amongst them, and thereby their faith be increased, that the increase of their faith would increase his joy and comfort, his present advantage and future reward; because it was the fruit and increase of the seed which he had himself sown amongst them. The apostle also doth farther declare his hopes, that he should preach the gospel beyond Corinth in the regions of Achaia, where it had not been preached before; he being unwilling to enter upon other men's labors. Here note, That though ordinary ministers are fixed in particular places, and confined to particular churches; yet the apostles had a commission to go into all places, and preach the gospel over the whole world, and were tied to no certain place or people. Note farther, That the apostle seems to prefer an instrumentality in the work of conversion, before being instrumental in the work of edification. The false apostles could only pretend to build upon other men's foundations, and carry on a work by others made ready to their hands: but the apostle preferred preaching the gospel where Christ had never been heard of, as being unwilling to build upon another's foundation, to boast of another man's line. It is a special favor now vouchsafed by God to us his ministers, if he puts the honor upon us, to make us instruments in his hands, either for conversion, or edification, either for bringing home, or building up a people. Happy we, if when our predecessors have labored before us, we enter into their labors, and see the seed, which they sowed with a laborious hand, flourishing in the lives of our people, to the joy of our hearts. Ere long, both he that sowed, and he that reapeth, shall rejoice together.

17 But he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

These words are a reasonable exhortation to all the ministers of the gospel. 1. To take heed that they glory not in themselves, or in any services or performances of their own. As it is the highest act of grace to make our boast of God all the day long, so it is the highest act of corruption, to make a boast of any thing we either have or do, though but for a moment. Alas! what have we, that we have not received? Or what do we, wherein we have not been divinely assisted? And if so, why should we glory? Verily, when man is most bent and set upon these gloryings, God delights to check him therein, and spit upon his glorying; and so jealous is God of his glory, that he seldom suffers a proud minister, that assumes and arrogates to himself, to be either serviceable or successful in his work. 2. These words are an exhortation to all the ministers of the gospel, as not to glory in themselves, so to glory in the Lord; that is, 1. To glory in the work of the Lord, that we promote his kingdom, his honor and interest, in the world. 2. To glory in the help of the Lord: the Lord is a master in covenant with us, and that a covenant of grace, in which every command hath a promise annexed to it, a promise both of assistance and acceptance. 3. To glory in the reward of the Lord, expected by us, and secured to us, by purchase and promise, the private christian's labors shall not be in vain in the Lord, much less his faithful ministers, who have borne the burden and heat of the day; let them then glory in the Lord and not in themselves, seeing all the good that is in them, and their actions, comes from him, and their recompence of reward is secured by him.

18 For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.

Three things are here observable, 1. The proneness which is in human nature to admire, applaud and commend itself. Man is a proud piece of flesh, and a little apprehended excellency in himself presently puffs him up, and he looks big with conceit: it is rare to see a man rich in gifts, and poor in spirit; poverty of spirit is better than all the riches of gifts: yea, it is the truest riches of grace. Observe, 2. Though a man is prone to commend and admire himself, yet self-commendation is no unjust praise, but rather disparagement, a shameful indication both of pride and folly. He that commendeth himself, is not approved either of God or wise men; the same word in Hebrew, signifies to praise yourselves, and to be foolish, because there is no greater evidence of folly than self-commendation; yet sometimes, a wise man is forced to boast of his own performances, rather in a way of self-vindication, than by way of self-commendation. Observe, 3. That it is God's approbation, and not our own commendation, which is matter of true praise and real honor. When God and conscience bear witness to our sincerity, we need neither our own nor others commendation; the open-testimony of God, and the silent applause of our own conscience, is above all commendations whatsoever.

CHAPTER XI.

Our apostle is forced, in this chapter, for his own vindication, to enter upon a just and necessary commendation of himself; he gives us a large catalogue of his sufferings and services, not to grace himself, but to glorify God thereby; not that his person might be had in any undue admiration, but for the vindication of himself and his apostleship, from the contempt of those who preferred the false apostles before him. And accordingly, he bespeaks the Corinthians to bear with his seeming folly a little, in commending of himself after this unusual manner. Thus he addresses them. verse 1.

WOULD to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly; and indeed bear with me.

2 I am jealous over you with godly jealousy; for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ.

Observe here, 1. That which the apostle calls his folly is his speaking so much in his own commendation and praise, because ordinary self-commendation has a very great show of folly in it, though not always. As if he had said, "I would you could bear with me a little, in that, which looks like a foolish boasting in me, namely, my glorying in my performances, in my services and sufferings, amongst you; and indeed, you must bear with me herein. Where note, That although the apostle lay under a necessity to commend himself for the vindication of his office, which made him free from folly in this matter; yet because, generally speaking, self-commendation usually proceeds from folly and vanity, and such as did not know the necessity which lay upon St. Paul thus to speak, would be apt to impute folly to him for thus speaking, he therefore calls it folly himself first, and tells the Corinthians, they did and must bear with it. Observe, 2. The reason assigned, which constrained the apostle thus to do it, was his holy jealousy for them. He had, by preaching of the gospel, brought them to know and believe in Christ, and so, by converting them to the christian faith, has espoused them to Christ: he earnestly therefore desired that he might present them a pure and chaste virgin; that is, a spotless church unto Christ. As the Jews say, that Moses espoused Israel to God in Mount Sinai, when he made them enter into covenant with him there; so says the apostle here by converting you to the christian faith, I have espoused you to one husband, even Christ.

3 But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your mind should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.

Our apostle having in the foregoing verses, with a rhetorical insinuation, begged their pardon and their patience, whilst by a just and necessary commendation of himself, he vindicated his person and office from contempt; and having shown, that what he did and said, was the fruit and effect of a pious jealousy, or holy love mixed with fear: accordingly, he tells them very plainly in this verse, that he was really afraid of them, lest as Eve was seduced by the subtilty of the devil, so their minds should be corrupted by false apostles, and seduced from the pure doctrine of the gospel; for as the noblest and most generous wine is adulterated by mingling it with water, so is the doctrine of the gospel corrupted, by mixing with it either philosophical speculations, or Jewish traditions, or any sort of human inventions. Well, therefore, might the apostle say, "I fear lest your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ."

4 For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another spirit, which ye have not received, or another gospel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him.

As if the apostle had said, "It is one Christ, one Spirit, one gospel, and not many which we have preached, and you have received; now, if your new teachers, the false apostles, have another Christ to set forth, more excellent gifts of the Spirit to boast of, another gospel to preach unto you, which I never preached amongst you, let them be heard and received;" but this being impossible, they might well bear with him in his modest boasting and glorying in what he had done and suffered amongst them, by whose ministry they were at first converted to christianity.

5 For I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chief apostles.

6 But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge; but we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things.

Observe here, 1. The great modesty of the apostle in this expression; "I suppose I was not a whit behind the chiefest apostles." He might have said he was equal with them and in some sense superior to them, even the most eminent of them, Peter, James, and John. Indeed the apostleship, as an office, was of equal honor in all the apostles; but even amongst them, some had more excellent gifts, and greater enlargements, and did more signal services than others. Thus one of those stars differed from another; in brightness and glory. But, observe, 2. Before whom it is that St. Paul thus compares himself with the chiefest apostles: it was not before the true, but the false apostles, that he makes this modest boast. He did not contend with any of the apostles of Christ for the upper hand, nor say, I am not behind any of you, or I am better than any of you; but he only gives check to those false apostles, who undervalued him, and poured contempt upon him. He who said at another time, "I am not worthy to be called an apostle," says here, "I am not behind the chiefest apostle." From whence we learn, That the ministers of Christ may stand upon terms of credit with those that vilify their persons, disparage their function, and discredit that honorable work which God hath called them unto. Though all ambitious contending with others is odious, yet no man ought to betray either the truth of God, in his own integrity, lest he should be counted contentious. He purchases the opinion of an humble and peaceable minister too dear; who either pays the faith of God for it, or his own credit; something of reputation being absolutely necessary in a minister, to render his labors successful. Observe, 3. The objection which the false apostles, those proud boasters of their eloquence, made against St. Paul, namely, that he was rude in speech. That the apostle had some imperfection in his speech or utterance, is the opinion of many. Others affirm, that he was an eloquent preacher, from Acts xix. 12. where he is compared to Mercurius for it; but he did not think fit, in his ministry, to use the Grecian flaunting way in ostentation thereof, that so the power of the gospel might not seem to be placed in human wisdom. "However, says the apostle, though I be rude in speech yet not in knowledge; if my language has nothing extraordinary in it, yet sure nothing can be objected against my skill in the mysteries of salvation. But I need not tell you of this, who have had the proof of it in my ministry amongst yourselves." Note we here, The manner and method of St. Paul's preaching; it was grave and serious, pious and ardent, plain and profitable. No doubt he could have acted the orator in the pulpit as well as most. But he chose rather to speak close and home to the consciences of men; in a plain and familiar style, delivering all his evangelical and apostolical precepts so plainly, that the weakest capacities might understand and receive them. Plain truths, without any art or varnish may be conveyed with more warmth and vigor to the conscience, than all the charms of human eloquence from the most fluent and popular tongue.

7 Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that you might be exalted, because I have preached to you the gospel of God freely?

8 I robbed other churches, taking wages of them to do you service.

9 And when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself.

10 As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia.

11 Wherefore? because I love you not: God knoweth.

12 But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occasion from them which desire occasion; that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we.

13 For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ.

14 And no marvel; for satan himself is transformed into an angel of light:

15 Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works.

Observe here, 1. That St. Paul, in his former epistle to the Corinthians, abundantly proved the lawfulness of his taking maintenance from those to whom he preached the gospel: yet here he tells the Corinthians, he preached freely to them, without putting them to any charge, though at the same time, he had subsistence from the brethren of Macedonia. From whence learn, That one church ought to contribute towards the furtherance of the gospel in, and amongst other churches. Here the brethren in Macedonia supplied the apostle with maintenance, whilst he preached to the church at Corinth. Observe, 2. The reason why St. Paul did preach the gospel without receiving any thing for the same at Corinth; namely, to cut off occasion from the false apostles, who sought occasion to traduce and slander him, as a poor indigent fellow that preached for bread, and gloried that he preached freely. Where note, That it is very probable, that these false apostles were some rich men, who took no pay of the churches for what they did, but preached, or rather deceived freely, and would have reproached the apostle as a mercenary preacher, had he taken any thing. From the whole learn, 1. That it is agreeable to the mind of Christ, that the ministers and dispensers of his gospel should be maintained. A maintenance for the ministry, is certainly of divine right. Learn 2. That the apostles themselves did not all work, at least, not at all times, for their livelihood, but generally speaking, did always receive maintenance from the churches: ver. 8. "I robbed other churches, taking wages of them." We do not find the eleven apostles, after the Holy Ghost came upon them, wrought afterwards with their hands for their livelihood, but gave themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word, Acts vi. 4. Learn, 3. That though St. Paul did labor with his own hands at Corinth, and refused maintenance, for the reason forementioned, yet his example doth not enjoin us to work for our subsistence, with the labor of our hands, nor forbid us to take maintenance, when the churches we serve are able to maintain us. St. Paul tells us, when he wrought with his hands, he had then a power to leave working, 1. Cor. ix. 6. He had a right to a maintenance from the church at Corinth, though upon prudential consideration, he did forbear it, and no law of Christ restrained him from it. Learn 4. That there have been persons, all along, from the first planting and preaching of the gospel, who have sought occasion, and taken all occasions, though very unjustly, to charge the ministers of Christ with covetousness, worldly mindedness, and with preaching for filthy lucre sake. It was St. Paul's own case here; and therefore, says he, will I glory in this, that at Corinth, and all Achaia, I have preached freely, to cut off occasion from them that desire occasion, to charge me with covetousness and worldly mindedness, which he would by no means give them an handle for. And thus it continues to this day: let a minister be never so laborious in his office, or inoffensive in his life, if he expects but a moderate part of what is his just due, there are those that will cheat him of one half of his right, and then charge him with covetousness for demanding the other. Observe, lastly, The description and character here given by St. Paul of the false apostles, "They transform themselves into the apostles of Christ." That is, they pretend themselves to be Christ's apostles, and act as if they were such indeed: they take up the doctrine of Christ in some things which the holy apostles taught, but it was that they might weaken the estimation of the true apostles in the hearts of the Corinthians, and set up themselves there.— These false apostles were Judaizing christians, who mingled Judaism with christianity, and endeavoured to bring the christians under the bondage of the ceremonial law. Behold here the first heresy with which the wisdom of God was pleased to exercise the church, even in the apostles' days, that no church, and no age of the church, might pass without some temptation and trial; "they transform themselves into the apostles of Christ, even as satan himself is transformed into an angel of light." Then is satan an angel of light, when he suggests good for evil ends, and under specious pretences of bringing glory to God, doth tempt persons to transgress the will of God. Thus the false apostles would preach error with as great zeal and industry, as the apostles of Christ did preach truth, and use their utmost arguments, persuasions, and motives for embracing of error, which the holy apostles did for the entertainment of truth, seeming to do the same things that the true ministers of Christ did. It is very possible for men to be really satan's instruments, animated and taught by him to do his work, against the interest of Christ and his truth, and yet at the same time, pretend to excel and go beyond Christ's faithful ministers in preaching truth and holiness. So that the highest pretences to truth, orthodoxy, free grace, purity, and unity, are no sufficient evidences of a true ministry. Satan and his ministers, who love to transform themselves sometimes into angels of light, may pretend to all these, and are, notwithstanding, the sworn enemies of Christ and his kingdom.

16 I say again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little.

17 That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting.

Here our apostle returns again to his own just and necessary vindication of himself: he acknowledges it unbecoming and unseemly in itself to boast much: and that boasting is the usual mark of a fool; but it is no folly when the interest of God and souls require it: it was only seemingly, and not really, his folly; though it had the appearance of folly, in ostentation; yet with respect to the scope, the aim, and end, and design of it, it was needful and necessary. But yet he tells them, that what he had before spoke, and was now farther about to speak, he spake not of the Lord: that is, as if the Lord commanded any such boasting and glorying in ourselves as for ourselves. He did not pretend to have any special command from God, to enlarge so conspicuously in his own commendation: for the Spirit of God nowhere advises us to commend ourselves, or to glory either in the sufferings we have undergone, or the services we have done: yet what the apostle here said and did, though not after the Lord, yet was it not contrary to the Lord, or to the direction of his word, which nowhere commands us to conceal what grace God has wrought in us, or the good done by us, upon a fitting occasion, and with a sincere design, that he, and not ourselves, may have the praise and glory of it.

18 Seeing that many glory after the flesh, I will glory also.

19 For ye suffer fools gladly, seeing you yourselves are wise.

20 For you suffer, if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man smite you on the face.

21 I speak as concerning reproach, as though we had been weak: howbeit, whereinsoever any is bold, (I speak foolishly,) I am bold also.

Here our apostle, with some kind of salt and smartness, reflects upon the Corinthians (whom ironically he calls wise men) for suffering themselves to be imposed upon by their false teachers, to be tyrannized over, to be spunged upon and exhausted, to be brought again into bondage to Jewish ceremonies, to be smitten on the face; that is, to be upbraided to their very faces, because they had subjected themselves to so mean and weak a person as Paul, a tent-maker. However, he assures them, that in any thing according to the flesh, wherein the false apostles could glory, he could glory also. Here note, That by glorying after the flesh, is meant glorying in any external privileges and outward advantages, particularly in glorying that they were the seed of Abraham according to the flesh; for the Jews had a very high opinion of themselves, as being the seed of Abraham, and the only people of God, by visible profession, at that time in the world; having contemptible thoughts of all others, whom they called the profane, and the people of the earth, likening them to dogs. Now the apostle tells the Corinthians plainly, That although there is nothing after the flesh which deserves greatly to be gloried in, yet seeing that the false apostles did pride themselves in these things, he could boast of the same carnal privileges with them, and glory after the flesh as well as themselves; and accordingly thus he speaks in the following verses:

22 Are they Hebrews? [speaking the Jewish language] so am I: are they Israelites? [descended from beloved Jacob] so am I: are they the seed of Abraham? [and not proselytes] so am I.

23 Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool) I am more; in labors more abundant [than any of them,] in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft.

That is I have suffered more for Christ, by stripes, by imprisonments, by daily dying, than any of them have done. Here note, that these false teachers, the Judaizing doctors, were most certainly of the Jewish race; and that they were not only converted to, but did preach up the faith of Christ; but withal, the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the Jewish rites. These teachers went from Judea, and gave great disturbance to all christian churches; as Corinth, Galatia, and Philippi; and we often find St. Paul complaining of them, by the name of those of the circumcision; because they required of such as did embrace christianity, to submit to circumcision and the Jewish law.

24 Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one.

The law in Deut. xxv. 3. allowed forty stripes to be given to them that were worthy to be beaten, but forbade them to exceed that number: but it being their custom to beat them with a whip that had three cords, they must either stop at thirty-nine, or exceed and go to forty-two:—Here observe, That the apostle contending with these false teachers, proves the truth of his ministry and apostleship; not, as elsewhere, from the miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, which did accompany his preaching, but from his sufferings, as being the things which these false apostles could not pretend unto, and so could not glory that they were like unto him in them.

25 Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep.

26 In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils amongst false brethren;

27 In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness.

Behold what a catalogue the apostle here gives of his sufferings and services: he was scourged by the Jews with whips, beaten by the Gentiles with rods, stoned by the rabble, thrice suffered shipwreck, a night and a day tossed to and fro upon the sea, and in great danger of perishing; in journeyings often from one country to another, to preach, plant and propagate the gospel; in perils at sea and land by pirates and robbers; in perils by his countrymen the Jews; in perils in the cities, Damascus, Ephesus, and Jerusalem; in perils in wildernesses and deserts; in perils amongst false brethren, men of the christian profession; in weariness and painfulness, by travelling from place to place; in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, that is, in necessitated hunger often, and in voluntary fastings frequent, for spiritual purposes; in cold and nakedness, that is, very poor and thin in clothing. Lord! what tongue can utter, or what heart can conceive, the pains which the apostle took, or the hazards which he run in preaching the gospel to a lost world? And yet the good man heartily thanks our Lord Jesus Christ for all that, who had counted him faithful, and put him into the ministry. Verily none of the ministers of Christ have any reason or cause to repent of the choice of their office, whatever services they undertake, or whatever sufferings or reproaches it either bath or may expose them to. Alas! what is all that we feel, to what this apostle underwent? And what is all that he underwent for Christ, compared with that transcendent reward which is in the hand of Christ, both for him and us.

28 Besides those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches.

The apostle's burden of outward trouble was discovered before: his burden of inward care is declared now. Besides those things which were afflicting to him from without, the care and business of all the new planted churches was daily upon his heart and hand: besides all his bodily labors by journeying and travelling incessantly from place to place; his solicitous care and thoughtfulness of mind, for the prosperity and happiness of all the churches of Christ, both near and afar off, was great and pressing; the holy man felt as much by sympathy as he did by sense. Many were the personal troubles which he had felt, but more were the church's troubles of which he had feeling; concerning which, he thus expresses himself in the next verse:

29 Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not?

That is, "What particular church, or what particular christian in any of the churches of Christ, is weak in faith or wavering in their profession? Where is the person that is assaulted with inward temptations, or outward troubles, and I do not sympathize with him, yea, both with holy zeal and fervent desire for his settlement and establishing: Sympathy among all the members, but especially in and among the ministers of Christ, is a great christian duty: they ought to have a tender compassion to the whole flock, and also a quick sense both of the sins and of the sufferings of every particular and individual member and part thereof. As Christ, our Head, is afflicted in all his church's afflictions; so ought we, as his ministers and members, to be afflicted in the afflictions of our fellow-brethren. He that has no cross of his own, must take up and bear his brother's; yea, he that has many of his own, must yet bear a part of all his brethren's crosses. Good men ever have been, and are men of tender and compassionate dispositions, ready to mourn over, and lament for, both the sins and sufferings of others, from the overflowings of a christ-like spirit in them. True goodness evermore promotes compassion.

30 If I must needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities.

By infirmities here, we are to understand sufferings, reproaches and disgraces, afflictions and persecutions, for the sake of the gospel. Where note, That the apostle chose rather to glory in what Christ had enabled him to suffer, than in what he enabled him to do for him; he had wrought divers miracles, could speak divers tongues, had done very great and eminent services for Christ; but not a word of these, because these indeed were evidences of the power of God in him, and of the favor of God towards him, but no demonstration of any inherent grace or goodness in him: whereas his patient bearing of such sharp, long, and continual sufferings for the sake of the gospel, were undeniable proofs of extraordinary measures of faith and patience, of holy self-denial and eminent love to God, and consequently were a truer and greater cause of boasting, than extraordinary gifts, and miraculous operations.

31 The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not.

Observe here, How the apostle, in a most awful and solemn manner, appeals to the all-knowing and heart searching God, that the foregoing account of his sufferings for Christ and his gospel, was the exact truth, and no lie. He calls God to bear witness to the certainty of all that he had said of his sufferings and services: and calling him the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is blessed for evermore, affords an undeniable argument to prove the Godhead of Christ; this doxology, blessed for evermore, being a term of honor usually annexed by the Jews at the naming of God.

32 In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me:

33 And through a window in a basket, was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands.

The apostle concludes this chapter, containing a relation of his sufferings, with a remarkable deliverance which God gave him from danger and death, at the city of Damascus, soon after his conversion, of which mention is made, Acts ix. 24, 25. The Jews whom he confuted and confounded with his arguments at Damascus, sought to kill him: to effect which they had, by some means or other brought over Aretas, who was king under the Roman emperor at Damascus, and he engages, with the Jews in persecuting the holy and innocent apostle: he shuts up the gates of the city, keeps his soldiers in arms, and uses all possible means to prevent the apostle's escape. But what saith the psalmist? Psal. cxxvii. 1. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain; either to keep out those whom he will have in, or to keep in those whom he will have out. All the walls shall be an open gate to those whom divine providence will have to escape; as here to St. Paul, being let down over the wall by a rope in a basket: neither was it any evidence of cowardice that the apostle now fled, nor in the least degree sinful: our Lord having given us a particular licence in the case, saying, When they persecute you in one city, fly to another. Besides, the persecution now raised was directly levelled against the apostle in particular: it was therefore piously done in the disciples, and prudently done in himself, to attempt the means of his own preservation. As the husbandman doth not commit all his corn to the oven, but saves some for seed; so doth God in persecution. All are not martyrs: and none shall be so presently: they must first finish their course of obedience, before they finish their course with joy. Happy soul, that can say with this great and good man, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, I am ready to be offered up: henceforth is laid up for me a crown of glory, which fadeth not away." Amen.

CHAPTER XII.

The argument of this is much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, namely, the apostle's just and necessary vindication of himself, his person and ministry from the aspersions of the false apostles, which were certain erroneous Judaizing teachers, who every where disturbed the church's peace, and gave the holy apostle great disquiet. In the former chapter he gloried in his infirmities, that is, in his sufferings, called infirmities; because the best of christians are apt to betray much weakness, and to discover much passionate infirmity in and under them: but in this chapter he comes to another kind of holy glorying, namely, in those extraordinary visions and revelations which he had from God: concerning which he thus speaks:

IT is not expedient for me doubtless to glory, I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord.

That is, "I acknowledge it neither decent nor advantageous, with respect to myself, to go on in farther boasting and glorying, but since it may be necessary with respect to you, I will declare what visions and revelations I have received from the Lord; in which I shall give such an evidence of the favors of Christ to me, and such a testimony of my mission from heaven, as none of these false apostles or deceitful workers can pretend unto." Learn hence, That although glorying or boasting, in itself is so expedient a thing, savors of pride, and is an evidence of folly, when it is not necessary and just, and therefore all christians should be backward to it: yet that which is so inexpedient in itself may, upon a just and fitting occasion, be not only lawful, but laudable, both a necessary and commendable duty. Observe, 2. The present subject matter of St. Paul's glorying; it was heavenly raptures and visions which he gloried in. Learn thence, That divine revelations, acquainting the soul with heaven, are matters most worthy of humble and modest glorying. Oh! if God would vouchsafe to favor us with the sight of what St. Paul saw, what little things would crowns and sceptres, empires and kingdoms, seem to us? How would it make us long, groan and cry, to be with Christ! But though none of us must expect such raptures and ecstasies as the apostles had, blessed be God for that clear revelation of his heavenly glory which the gospel gives, and for that assurance which faith gives, that Christ as our forerunner is entered into, and keeps possession of it, in the name and stead of all believers: he has prepared it for us, and is daily preparing us for that, and in his own appointed time will put us into the actual possession of it; not for a few hours (which was all the apostle enjoyed) but for eternal ages.

2 I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body I cannot tell: or whether out of the body, I cannot tell: God knoweth) such an one caught up to the third heaven.

3 And I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell:) God knoweth.

4 How that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter.

Observe, 1. That the person here spoken of was doubtless himself, otherwise it had been no cause or ground of glorying to him at all; yet he speaks in the name of a third person. Thence note, That they who know most of God, are most modest when they come to speak of themselves. Observe, 2. The description of the person, a man in Christ: that is, a man actuated by the Spirit of Christ, above himself; and also a description of the place: he was caught up into paradise, the seat of the blessed. Learn thence, That there is a third heaven, or heavenly paradise, where are the concerns and hopes of holy souls: and souls are not so closely tied to the body, but they may whenever God pleases, be wrapt up into paradise, or the third heaven. The apostle not being able to tell whether he was in the body, or out of the body, sheweth that somehow the soul was there, though he could not declare nor discover the manner how. Observe, 3. What St. Paul heard when thus wrapt up into paradise, namely, unspeakable words, such as cannot be uttered; or, if uttered, cannot be understood. Learn thence, That the things of the heavenly paradise are to mortal men unspeakable; there is no human language that hath words fit to reveal that part of the heavenly things which God hath shut up as secret from us. Observe, lastly, St. Paul's great humility, both in concealing formerly this extraordinary favor, and now not without some difficulty and disguise mentioning it, though for defence of the gospel, in a manner, constrained thereunto; contenting himself with such a fame as his deportment and outward actions, in serving the interest of Christ, could procure, and no way avoid.

5 Of such an one will I glory: yet of myself I will not glory, but in mine infirmities.

6 For though I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool, for I will say the truth: but now I forbear, lest any man should think of me above that which he seeth me to be, or that he heareth of me.

Here the apostle declares, that although this foretaste of the heavenly glory was worthy to be gloried in, and though he might boast of himself as thus exalted, yet he being purely passive in it, and advanced freely by God to it, he chose rather to ascribe unto God the entire glory of that, and content himself with glorying in such infirmities, and debasing sufferings, as he could strictly call his own, being undergone by him with an invincible courage and constancy of mind. However, he assures them, that if he had a mind to glory of this rapture and revelation, he might do it without folly or vanity, it being most certainly true: but he chose rather to forbear, lest he should thereby give occasion to any to over-value him, and to think more highly of him, than his common behaviour, his ordinary words and actions gave them reason to do. A wise and good man is not ambitious of more applause or commendation than what his personal worth or merits deservedly challenge; he desires no man to think or speak of him above that which he appeareth to be, which is always as he really is, being that in reality, which he is in appearance.

7 And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure.

Observe here, The great and special sin which St. Paul was in danger of by the abundance of revelations, namely, the sin of spiritual pride. Learn hence, That heavenly revelations may be matter and occasion of unmeet and sinful exaltation. The holiest christians, after their most heavenly acquaintance, are not out of danger of spiritual pride, or being too much exalted. Pride is such a sin as the holiest saint is not too fully secured from; no, not when he hath been hearing unutterable words, and seeing the heavenly paradise itself; no, not if he came down from the third heaven, newly from converse with angels, yet bringing an imperfect nature with him, he is not out of danger of this sin, much less is he so when he cometh off his knees from prayer, &c. Observe, 2. The way and means which the wisdom of God made use of for preventing St. Paul's falling into this dangerous sin of spiritual pride, and that was, the giving him a thorn in the flesh; a bodily pain, say some; a bitter persecution, say others; something that was very afflictive to the flesh, say all. Learn hence, That spiritual pride is so dangerous a sin, that it is a mercy to be freed from it, even by bodily pain: God seeth our danger when we see not our own, and will hurt the body to save the soul of his dearest children. Oh, how much better is it that the body should smart, than that the soul should be overmuch exalted! It is an happy thorn in the flesh, which lets the pestilent and corrupt blood of spiritual pride out of the soul. Lord! why do we contend and quarrel with thee for every sickness, bodily pain, or afflictive cross? Can sin be prevented or killed at too dear a rate? Observe, 3. This thorn in the flesh is called the messenger of satan, from whence St. Chrysostom concluded that it was some evil angel that was permitted and empowered by God to scourge and buffet him. The sufferings of the best and holiest persons in the flesh, may be the buffetings of a messenger of satan, and yet be from God. Satan certainly intendeth our hurt, but God overrules him as an instrument to do us good: it is no proof that a man is not a child of God, because satan has a permission to torment his flesh. The messenger of satan was sent to buffet me, says St. Paul, lest I should be exalted.

8 For this thing I besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from me.

Note here, 1. The person prayed to, the Lord: that is, the Lord Jesus, as appears by the two next verses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Here is an instance of prayer directed to Christ, therefore here is an instance of Christ's divinity: prayer made to Christ at all times, in all places, and for all things, is an evidence of his omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence, and consequently of his being truly and essentially God. Note, 2. The subject-matter of this prayer, and that was, for the removal of the affliction; I prayed that it might depart from me; together with the reiterated frequency of it, I besought the Lord thrice. Learn hence, That peace with God doth not make the flesh insensible; a good man may groan under bodily pain, and lawfully pray for the removal of it; yea, be oft in prayer for it; earnest and frequent prayer is not unsuitable to sharp affliction; For this I besought the Lord thrice. Where mark, St. Paul's conformity to his Saviour, who in his agony prayed thrice that the cup might pass, but both of them with profound submission. Note also, That the apostles' gifts of healing were not to be used at their own pleasure (then St. Paul might have healed himself) but for the confirmation of the faith, when it pleased the Holy Spirit.

9 ¶ And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee:—

Observe, In this answer that is given to St. Paul's prayer, that the mercy prayed for, is not in kind given unto him, but the promised grace and strength, which is better than the mercy he prayed for. Learn hence, That the frequent and earnest prayers of the most holy and eminent saints, for deliverance from outward troubles, may not be granted in the kind or thing desired. We are not lords, but beggars, and must leave it to God to determine the matter, the manner, the measure, the time of our afflictions. Note farther, That as in the prayer, so in the answer, St. Paul was conformed to Christ: the one was heard, but not by the passing of the cup; the other was heard, but not by removing the thorn in the flesh; but both were heard by assurance and supply of divine strength; and sufficient grace to help in time of need; He said unto me, my grace is sufficient for thee. Learn hence, That the grace of Christ is sufficient for his people in all their afflictions; sufficient for their preservation, to keep them from falling away from God and godliness, by the temptation which always attends affliction; sufficient for their sustentation, to uphold and support them in and under their heaviest pressures and afflictions; and sufficient to render their afflictions truly advantageous and serviceable to them, to make them more holy, humble, heavenly, conformed unto Christ, &c.

—For my strength is made perfect in weakness.—

This is not to be understood as if our weakness added any thing to God's power, or could make his power perfect: but our weakness renders God's power more illustrious, he delights in and under our weakness, to manifest most of his helping power; as the stars never shine so gloriously as in the sharpest frosty night, so the power of God never appears so signally and conspicuously, as in and under our weakness. Learn hence, That when God, upon our prayer doth not deliver us from bodily sufferings, he will be sure to come in with sufficient grace, and manifest his strength in our pain and weakness. We never thought how much or how long we could bear and hold out, till God made manifest his own strength in our weakness. More of the power of grace is seen in the sufferings of believers, than ever was seen in their prosperity: beg then, O christian! more importunately for divine strength, than for the departing of the thorn: grace is better than ease or health; the one is proper to saints, the other is common to wicked men and brutes.

—Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.

Here our apostle tells the Corinthians, that most gladly he chose rather to glory in his afflictions and tribulations, than in his visions and revelations, because by them he had greater experience of the power and presence of Christ with him, and supporting of him under all his pressures. Learn hence, 1. That the people of God are supported under, and carried through all their sufferings and afflictions, by the power of Christ: a divine power above their own strength, like everlasting arms, is underneath them in the hour of trial. Learn, 2. That to glory in afflictions and tribulations, is an high pitch of holiness and grace; but attainable. To glory in tribulation, is; 1. To rejoice in it. 2. To express that joy outwardly, upon a fit occasion. 3. To express it with a great degree of exultation and boasting: many of the martyrs were so far from changing countenance at the stake, that they sung and triumphed in the midst of flames. Question, But can any comfort be derived from this text for sinful infirmities? Answer, From the power of Christ, in the text, there may. Thus the powerful mediation and intercession of Christ is magnified, in procuring the acceptance of our persons and services, notwithstanding the sinful infirmities cleaving to them; also the power of his grace, will at death be magnified, in purging and purifying his people from all their dross and dregs. There is nothing uneasy to a child of God, but there is something in Christ to alleviate it; affliction is uneasy, temptation uneasy, death uneasy, the wrath of God uneasy, the law, as condemning, is uneasy and displeasing; but Christ has delivered from the curse of the law, satisfied the justice of God, sanctified the cross, sweetened death. Oh, how adorable is the power, how desirable the grace of Christ!

10 Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: when I am weak, then I am strong.

Observe here, 1. The high and heroic pitch which St. Paul's spirit was raised to, he took pleasure in reproaches, and persecutions. Pleasure is a degree beyond joy; though these sufferings were painful to the flesh, yet were they pleasing to the spirit: a christian may not love that which he bears, yet may he love to bear; to bear, is the patience of necessity: to love to bear, is the patience of virtue; to delight to bear reproach or persecution for Christ is expressive of the highest affection towards Christ, and lowest subjection to him. If nature suffers not a saint to take pleasure in reproaches, as such, yet grace enables him to take pleasure in what he is reproached for. Observe, 2. The cause assigned why the apostle took such pleasure in his sufferings and abasements, because they gave him such experience of the power of Christ: inasmuch that when he was most weak in himself, he was then most strong in him; When I am weak, then I am strong; which words are a divine paradox or riddle: the apostle affirms one contrary of another: weakness is contrary to strength; how then can a weak man be strong, when he is weak: the meaning is, that when a christian is most sensible of his own weakness, and most diffident and distrustful of his own strength, then the power of Christ rests upon him, and he experiences divine strength coming in unto him. Christ fills none but the hungry, nor doth he strengthen any but the weak; only by going out of our strength, do we get strength; when in an humble sense of our weaknesses we rest upon Christ, the power of Christ rests upon us.

11 ¶ I am become a fool in glorying: ye have compelled me. For I ought to have been commended of you, for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing.

12 Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs and wonders, and mighty deeds.
(No. 52.)

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong.

Here again does our apostle excuse his boasting, and tells the Corinthians that they had compelled him to it, and ought to have saved him the labor of it, by defending him themselves: for he had done and suffered as much as any of the most eminent apostles, though he looked upon all as nothing; and consequently, his services and sufferings, his miracles, signs and wonders, were sufficient arguments, and undeniable demonstrations that he was indeed an apostle of Jesus Christ. He farther adds, That the church at Corinth had as great and excellent gifts of the Spirit bestowed upon them by his ministry, as any church whatsoever; all the difference was, that whatever was done for them, was done freely: he spared their purses, and put them to no charge. Now, says he, if that be a wrong, I hope you can easily forgive it. Corinth was a very rich and wealthy city; but they loved a cheap gospel: the apostle spared their purses, not because they were unable, but unwilling to draw them. Here Observe, That the people ought to give testimony to their minister's integrity, and do all that in them lies, to support and maintain the honor of his ministry; I ought, says the apostle, to be commended of you. Observe farther, That when the people omit and neglect this necessary part of their duty towards their ministers, it is lawful, and not discommendable, for the ministers of Christ themselves, in a modest humble manner, to declare both what they have been, and what they have done; In nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing. As if the apostle had said, Verily, I am as much an apostle as they who think themselves more than apostles, though you and they, through envy count me nothing, and though I in humility account myself nothing." Thus the ministers of Christ may stand upon terms of credit with any who lay their persons low, that they may disparage their work, and lay that service low to which God hath called them: though the ministers and members of Christ ought in lowliness to submit to one another, yet must they not submit to the pride of lusts of any, how high soever in their own, or others account.

14 Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you: for I seek not yours, but you. For the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

15 And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be beloved.

The apostle here acquaints the Corinthians, that he prepared himself a third time to come unto them, being providentially hindered twice before, yet with a firm resolution not to be any ways burdensome to them: for he coveted not their possessions, but was desirous of their salvation: and as a parent lays up for his children, and takes not from them, so he desired as their spiritual father, to enrich them with spiritual good things, and not to take from them any of their temporal riches. Nay he adds that he was willing to spend and be spent; that is, to spend his time, his strength, his pains, his life; although he met with very undue returns from some of them, who loved him so little, because he loved them so much, showing more kindness to the false apostles, than to him their spiritual father. Behold here an imitable pattern of ministerial diligence and faithfulness, love and affectionateness; the apostle was willing to spend and be spent: not only his purse and pains, but time and strength, life and health. Oh, how tender are some of their carcass, how fearful of their skin, how sparing of their pains, for fear of shortening their days, and hastening their end! Whereas, the lamp of our lives can never burn out better than in lighting others to heaven: is it not better that our flesh consume with industry, and usefulness, than wear out with rust and idleness? As it is the duty, so it is the disposition of the faithful ministers of Christ, to spend and to be spent for souls.

16 But be it so, I did not burden you; nevertheless being crafty, I caught you with guile.

17 Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you.

18 I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps?

Here the apostle answers an objection, which, without any just cause, was made against him by some: it was suggested, "That though he was not burdensome to the Corinthians himself, nor took any thing of them for preaching the gospel, yet that he cunningly and craftily sent others to them; and set them at work to take money for him." Now, to wipe off this aspersion, the apostle appeals to themselves, whether any person he ever sent to them, received any thing of them for his use? Neither Titus nor Luke made a gain of them, but with the same generosity and freedom preached the gospel, and communicated the riches of grace to their souls. When the ministers of the gospel at any time call in the assistance of others to help them in their work, their care is to employ such as near as they can judge, who are of the same spirit, and walk in the same steps with themselves. St. Paul, Titus and Luke, all agree together in carrying on a generous design for the preaching the gospel to the Corinthians freely, and are of the same mind and practice in every thing.

19 Again, think you that we excuse ourselves unto you? we speak before God in Christ: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying.

20 For I fear, lest when I come I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults:

21 And lest when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall bewail many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness, and fornication, and lasciviousness which they have committed.

As if the apostle had said, "Think not that for any sinister or by-ends of my own, I excuse myself so often to you, for deferring so long my promised and intended journey among you, for all I do is with an eye to your advantage.—'Tis your benefit and reformation I am at, for, verily I fear, whenever I come, I shall find those sins unrepented of, and unhumbled for, by many of you, which will be matter of humiliation, sorrow, and lamentation to me: and that I must be necessitated, contrary to my inclinations and desires, to inflict censures and corporeal punishments upon many among you, for the schisms, debates and strifes of some; for the uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness of others." Note here, 1. What great disorders and scandalous crimes were found in the church of Corinth, and yet she retained the denomination and character of a true church: the apostle fears, and not without cause, that he should find debates, envyings, wraths and strifes among them, the usual and necessary consequences of schisms and factions in the church. Note, 2. That notwithstanding all these corruptions and scandalous abuses, St. Paul neither separates himself; nor persuades any to separate from them. Nothing will justify a separation from a church, but that which makes a separation between God and that church, namely, heresy in doctrine, or idolatry in worship.

CHAPTER XIII.

Our apostle being now come to the conclusion of this second Epistle, lets the Corinthians know, that he had a third time resolved to come unto them, and to be sharp against such of them with his ecclesiastical censures, as he found unreclaimed and unreformed amongst them, sparing neither great nor small, one nor other, if involved in the same guilt; which censures of the apostles were many times attended with corporeal punishments, and sometimes with death: what the civil sword is in the commonwealth, that ecclesiastical discipline is in the church, when duly executed, namely, a revenger of all disobedience.

THIS is the third time I am coming to you. In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established.

2 I told you before, and foretel you as if I were present the second time, and being absent now, I write to them, which heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that if I come again, I will not spare:

3 Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you.

4 For though he was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God. For we also are weak in him, but we shall live with him by the power of God toward you.

The apostle having, throughout both his epistles, blamed the Corinthians for several gross enormities found amongst them, and hearing there were some that had not repented of them, he gives them plainly to understand, that he had a full purpose to come unto them with his rod of ecclesiastical discipline and church-censures, and would not spare a man of them, but execute that power on the impenitent, which Christ had given him, by excluding such unclaimable offenders from church communion. Note here, with what wisdom and caution the holy apostle proceeds in the executing and inflicting the severe censures of the church: he uses admonition a first, second, and third time, before he proceeds to the awful sentence of excommunication: "I told you before, I foretel you now, and being absent, I write to you, that when I come, I will not spare." He tells them farther, that they had tempted him hereunto, in that they had required a proof from him whether Christ had owned him as an apostle or not, and would ratify his censures by judgments following them. He shows, that Christ had owned him, and manifested his power in his ministry among them, by converting many of them to the christian faith, by bestowing the gifts of his Spirit upon them, and by many signs and miracles which he enabled him to do in the midst of them. When God calls his servants to the work of the ministry he leaves not either himself or them without witness; he bears testimony to their sincerity, by giving them, in some degree, the seal of their ministry, in the conversion or edification of those they are sent unto: "Since you seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, to you-ward he is not weak, but is mighty in and amongst you." Next, the holy apostle draws a parallel, and makes a comparison between his blessed Lord and Master and himself. As Christ, in his state of humiliation, appeared to be a weak and frail man, by being crucified; but was evidenced to be the great and mighty God, by his rising from the dead: so the apostle, considered in himself, and in respect of his afflictions, appears a weak and contemptible man; but yet they had found, and should farther find, a resemblance of the power and strength of Christ, in his life and ministry; and particularly, they should find him armed with authority from Christ, to execute centures upon the contumacious and impenitent. Though the ministers of Christ, like their Master, when here on earth, are in a state of weakness, poverty, and contempt, yet they are clothed with divine power in the execution of their office, and their ministry is a living, powerful, and efficacious ministry, in the vigorous effects of it upon the hearts of their people; "We are weak in him, but we shall live with him by the power of God toward you."

5 ¶ Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves.— Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?

Here the apostle advises the Corinthians, instead of inquiring after the proof of Christ in him, to examine whether they were in Christ themselves: intimating to us, that such are usually most backward to examine the state of their own souls, who are forward to inquire into the spiritual state and condition of others. "You seek a proof of Christ in me, says the apostle; Oh, rather prove and examine yourselves." Where note, 1. A duty expressed; Examine yourselves; prove yourselves: the word is a metaphor taken from goldsmiths, who with great exactness try their gold; the truth of it by the touchstone, the weight of it by the scale, and the purity of it by the fire. And the repetition of the command, Examine yourselves; prove yourselves; implies the great backwardness that is in men's natures to perform this duty, the great necessity of the duty, and the great diligence and frequency to be used in performing of the duty. Learn hence, That self-examination is an excellent, a necessary and important duty, belonging to every one in the church, and requires great diligence and faithfulness in the performing of it. 'Tis necessary, in regard of our comforts, and also in regard of our graces; for there are counterfeit graces, as well as real; and common graces, as well as saving; and it is a duty that requires diligence and frequency, because the work is difficult, because the heart is backward, because we are apt to be deceived, and willing to be deceived; because many have miscarried without it, and many perish by a negligent performance of it: Therefore examine yourselves; prove yourselves. Note, 2. The subject-matter of our examination, whether ye be in the faith; that is, whether ye be converted to the christian faith, whether the faith of Christ be in you, whether the principle of faith be in your hearts, whether the power of faith be in your consciences, whether the practice of faith be in your lives, whether your faith be the parent and principle of obedience, working love, and working by love. Note, 3. The enforcement or motive to this duty, Except ye be reprobates; that is, counterfeit, adulterate, unsound, and insincere christians, unaccepted of God, and not owned by him. As reprobate silver hath no worth or fitness in it for trading, so such christians as, upon examination, are not found to have the grace of faith in them, more precious than gold, are unapproved of God, and rejected by him. Note, 4. When the apostle expostulates with them, and says, Know ye not your own selves? it implies both the folly and unreasonableness of the neglect of the duty, and all the possibility and easiness of knowing whether Christ be in us, or not, upon a due and diligent inquiry, whether we have experienced the quickening and transforming power of Christ in our hearts and lives. Finally, So great is the benefit, and so sweet the comfort, which flows to us by examination and self-acquaintance, that it will abundantly recompense our care and diligence, in the frequent and faithful discharge of it.

6 But I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates.

As if the apostle had said, "Whatever you, upon examination, shall be found to be, I trust you shall know, and be convinced, that we have not dishonoured Christ, nor shall be disowned of him: but whenever I come to you, you shall find that I am not destitute of the grace and power of Christ; whether for advancing your faith, improving your holiness, or correcting your miscarriages. The ministers of Christ, who are faithful to him in contending with the errors and vices of men, in reproving sin, in censuring sin, shall be owned and approved of God, when the reprobate world shall be condemned by him I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates."

7 Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear approved, but that ye should do that which is honest, though we be as reprobates.

The apostle drawing towards the conclusion of his epistle, shuts it up with prayer, earnestly imploring Almighty God, that the Corinthians might be found doing no evil, which might expose them to his censure, and force him to exercise his apostolical power, in punishing such offenders and offences as he should find among them. And he prayed thus for them, because he had rather have them good, than by punishing their evil manners, have an occasion to testify himself an approved and faithful apostle: for he did not so much regard his own reputation, as their salvation.

8 For we can do nothing against the truth; but for the truth.

The apostle having prayed that the Corinthians might be found doing no evil, in the former verse, and assuring them thereupon, that they would then be secure from his censures and chastisements, he assigns a reason here for that assurance given them; because, says he, We can do nothing against the truth; but for the truth: having our power given us only for edification, and not for destruction. Considering the words, without respect to the coherence, Observe, 1. A negative proposition, We can do nothing against the truth, Oh blessed impotency! 2. An affirmation, or positive assertion, but for the truth. Oh blessed ability? He was as strong as a giant for the truth, but as weak as an infant against it. Learn, That sincere christians in general, and the ministers of Christ in particular, cannot, dare not, will not do any thing against the truth, but for the truth: they cannot, that is, they may not, they are restrained by an outward command from God, who is truth itself: they cannot, that is, they will not, there is a restraint of an inward principle; neither the conviction of their understandings, the clearness of their judgments, nor the holiness of their hearts, will suffer them to oppose the truth. Again, they cannot attempt it; or if they did, they can never effect it; they cannot do it safely, they cannot do it successfully. We can do nothing against the truth in a way of discouragement; nor nothing against it in a way of disparagement: but all our endeavours are for the truth; we embrace it in our judgments, we hide it in our hearts, and practise it in our lives. Whatever talent God entrusts any of his ministers with, whether of parts, power, or estate, it is an opportunity put into their hands of doing service for the truth, and, as such, to be accepted and improved.

9 For we are glad when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we wish, even your perfection.

The apostle may be understood two ways: 1. We are glad when we are weak: that is, when I have no occasion to manifest my apostolical power, in censuring any of you as offenders: But ye are strong: strong in faith, and fruitful in good works. Or, 2. We are glad when we are weak, that is, when we are weakened by never so many sufferings and infirmities, provided you are made strong thereby: for this is what we principally wish and endeavour, even your utmost perfection in knowledge, faith and holiness. No, thing is more desired by the zealous and faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, than to see their people strong in faith, fruitful in good works, persevering in well doing, yea, perfect in holiness and obedience: This we wish, nothing like it, even your perfection.

10 Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present, I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

As if the apostle had said, "Verily I write thus to you, being absent, purposely, to reclaim you, lest being present, I should be forced to use some sharpness towards you, according to the power which the Lord hath given me, tending to your edification always, and not at any time to your destruction." Observe here, With what tenderness the apostle treats these offenders; he tells them, the sharpness and severity in his letters (if they accounted it such) was upon a kind design, to prevent sharpness and severity in his dealings with them, when he came amongst them; yet withal, he assures them, that if matters should come to an extremity, that he must be forced to exercise his apostolical power, in cutting the contumacious off from the church's communion; he would exercise it with a tender regard to their good, not their hurt; for their edification, and not willingly to their destruction. Learn we from the apostle's practice, to execute the censures of the church with great tenderness and affection, with great pity and compassion, with extraordinary dread and caution; not with rashness and indiscretion, or upon every light and trivial occasion, but like a tender-hearted father, with a rod in our hands, and tears in our eyes.

11 Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace be with you.

Here our apostle shuts up his epistle with a pathetic option and affectionate wish of all perfection, consolation, concord and communion, to his beloved Corinthians.—Where note, 1. What a fervent and unfeigned love here is in all the faithful ministers of Christ to the people committed to their charge, and how desirous they are, when they are taking their leave of them, to leave God with them; The God of love and peace be with you. Now God's being with a people, implies and imports these things; namely, the heart of God with them, the help of God with them, and the presence of God with them, and that they shall shortly be with God. Note, 2. What are the particular graces and blessings which the apostle wishes his beloved Corinthians? He doth not wish them earthly honors, worldly riches, sensual pleasures; but perfection of grace, spiritual consolation, mutual love, sweet communion with God, unanimity and concord amongst themselves: sanctifying gifts and saving graces are the best legacies that can be left by the ministers of God unto their people. Be perfect, be knit together: let the schisms and breaches which have been amongst you, be healed: be of good comfort, rejoice in and under all your sufferings for Christ, and the profession of his holy religion. Be of one mind, of the same judgment, if possible, in all things: or if otherwise, let no difference in judgment cause disunion in affection; if in some lesser things your heads be different, yet let your hearts be one. Live in peace, for the Lord's sake, live no longer in division and strife, in contention and wrath; let me hear no more of those debates, envyings, backbitings, whisperings and swellings, which I have reprov'd you for; but especially, live in peace with your teachers and spiritual guides; cause not them to complain to God of you, nor to groan to God against you, for your factious preferring one minister before another: one crying, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos. Thus doing, the God of peace and love shall be with you: that is, he who is the author and enjoiner of love and peace will be with you, and dwell among you with his gracious and favorable presence.

12 Greet one another with an holy kiss.

13 All the saints salute you,

He exhorts them, according to the custom of those eastern countries, to salute one another with a kiss, as a token of mutual and sincere love: and since it was become a practice in sacred meetings and church assemblies, particularly before their receiving the holy communion, to kiss each other, he advises them to use it innocently, chastely; let it not be a wanton, but an holy kiss. However, afterwards, the piety and purity of the church degenerating and declining, it was laid aside. That which is innocent in itself, and pious in its first intendment, may in time, fall under such abuse, as to cause it wholly to be laid aside.

14 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

Here are the highest blessings and benefits wished to, and prayed for, in behalf of the Corinthians, which they could possibly be made partakers of; namely, all that love which doth or can flow from the Father: all that grace which was purchased by the Son, and all that fellowship and communion with, and communication from the holy Spirit, which might render them meet for the service of Christ on earth, and for the full fruition and final enjoyment of him in heaven. Observe here, A full text for the holy Trinity: the names of the three persons, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, are here distinctly mentioned, as in the commission for, and in the form of baptism. Matt. xxviii. 19. Here the apostle calls the Father God, the Son Lord, and the Spirit the Holy Ghost; and as he attributes love to the Father, grace to the Son, so fellowship to the Holy Ghost; so that we have no reason to doubt of the personality of either, or any of them. But when we consider how many at this day, with imprudence and impunity, deny the divinity of the second, and the personality of the third person in the blessed Trinity, we have reason to pray, as our church has taught us for our own establishment, in the collect for Trinity-sunday;

Almighty and everlasting God, who hast given unto us thy servants grace, by the confession of a true faith, to acknowledge the glory of the eternal Trinity, and in the power of the divine Majesty, to worship the Unity; we beseech thee, that thou wouldst keep us steadfast in this faith, and evermore defend us from all adversities, who livest and reignest one God, world without end.

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL
TO THE GALATIANS.

That this Epistle was written by St. Paul, whose name it bears, I think was never questioned; though it be not writ, as most of his other epistles are, to the Christians of one particular city, but of the whole country, to wit, Galatia.

The Galatians very readily embraced the gospel, upon the preaching of St. Paul, and were at first exceedingly affectionate to his person, and zealous in the profession of what he taught. But, alas! soon after St. Paul had left them, some false apostles from Judea crept in amongst them, perverting some, and staggering others; teaching the necessity, for such as had embraced the Christian religion, to submit to circumcision, and the observation of the Mosaical institution.

To countenance this insinuation of theirs, they alledged, that St. Peter, James, and John, had sent them thither, and that they were of their minds in this matter; and particularly that St. Peter was against the rejecting of circumcision, and did himself practise the ceremonial law, and observe the rites of it in common conversation, separating himself from the Gentiles. Thus these Judaizers opposed the doctrine and practice of St. Peter to that of St. Paul; and to carry on their design with greater success, they magnified the other apostles, and vilified St. Paul, not allowing him the name or right of an apostle, having not seen Christ in the flesh, as the rest had done, affirming, that he never was called by Christ, nor ever owned for an apostle by the other apostles.

Hereupon St. Paul, in his absence from the Galatians, writes this epistle to them; in which 1. He vindicates himself and his doctrine, proving, that he was called to be an apostle by Christ himself, and that he had received his doctrine by immediate revelation from him; and that it was conformable to, and the very same with, what was preached by the other apostles. Next he strenuously proves, that circumcision, and all the ceremonial rites, were certainly abolished by the death of Christ. And lastly, He draws practical inferences from this doctrine, and instructs them in the duties of an holy life, exhorting them to live religiously in every relation; and so concludes his epistle with a solemn protestation of his sincere affection to them; assuring them, that as an evidence thereof, he had written the whole epistle with his own hand, wishing them abundant consolation from Christ, both in life and death.

CHAPTER 1.

PAUL, an apostle (not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead.)

The penman of this epistle is here described by his name, Paul: by his office, an apostle; and by his commission to that office, which was not human, but altogether divine, even from God the Father by Jesus Christ. Observe here, 1. The great modesty of this great apostle, in setting forth his authority as an apostle; you will find, in the front of his epistles, when he names any others in the salutation with himself (as Silvanus and Timotheus) he mentions not himself as an apostle, when named with them, lest he should be thought to magnify himself above them. But here, because his apostolical office was called in question, he is necessitated to vindicate his authority, and accordingly declares himself an apostle, not of men, nor by man; that is, men were neither the authors nor choosers of him to his office: he was not called, as Matthias was, Acts i. by the suffrage of the rest of the apostles: he was not an apostle of men's election, nor by men's instruction; but appointed by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead. Learn hence, That no sins before, nor yet after, conversion, can hinder the rich mercy and free grace of God, from using men in the highest employments in the church, if he pleases to make use of them. Paul, after he had been a blasphemer, was made an apostle; and Peter after his conversion, denied Christ with oaths and curses; yet is a chief apostle and an inspired penman of holy scripture. Observe, 2. The high dignity conferred upon St. Paul with reference to his apostolical office, he did not take it upon himself, but was chosen to it; he was not chosen to it for any merit in himself, but it was a grace freely bestowed upon him: and this not by the ministry and mediation of man, but by the immediate resignation and election of Jesus Christ. Thus far he stands upon equal terms with the rest of the apostles; they did not call themselves, nor were they called by Christ for any worthiness in themselves, above others: but behold the peculiar prerogative of St. Paul above the rest of the apostles, in this particular; they were called by Christ, in the day of his humiliation, when he was here upon earth in the flesh; but he was called by Christ after his resurrection, yea, in his highest state of exaltation, when sitting at his Father's right hand in heaven. And as his call was thus very extraordinary, so his gifts were answerable to his call: the gospel which he preached he received by inward and immediate revelation, which made him so much excel all the other apostles; inasmuch, that although, in his own opinion, he was the least of saints when here upon earth: yet in the opinion of others, he was the holiest man when upon earth, and the highest now in heaven, next the man Jesus Christ.

2 And all the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia:

That is, "All the brethren which are here with me, and own the doctrine which I preach, send greeting unto the churches of Galatia." Here note, 1. How St. Paul's doctrine is justified from the charge of singularity; which the Judaizing false teachers objected against it. What he wrote and taught, he tells the Galatians, was owned by all the brethren. This shows the consent he had of the church with him, in that holy doctrine which was delivered by him. Note, 2. The generality of the persons to whom this epistle is directed; not to a single person; nor to a particular church, but unto all the churches in the province of Galatia. There were several christian congregations, called churches, in that country, and all of them being leavened, or in danger of being soured with Judaism, that is, of superadding the ceremonial law of Moses to the gospel of Christ: the apostle and the brethren with him, direct this epistle, not to any single church in that province, but to them all in general being equally concerned: all the brethren with me, unto the churches of Galatia. Note, 3. How the apostle doth not say here, as elsewhere, To the saints of God which are in Galatia; or, To them that are sanctified by God the Father; but barely says, To the churches of Galatia; thereby declaring his holy indignation against the Galatians, as unworthy of those gracious appellations, because they had sadly corrupted the doctrine of the gospel, begun in the Spirit and ended in the flesh: first owning Christ and the liberty of the gospel, and afterwards pleading for the bondage of the ceremonial law. Yet, note, lastly, As corrupt as these churches of Galatia were, our apostle owns, and acknowledges them to be true churches; they retained the essentials of christianity, and were not guilty either of idolatry, or a total apostacy; therefore though stained with divine corruptions both in doctrine and manners, which he sharply rebukes and reproves them for, yet he doth not deny them the name of churches: All the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia.

3 Grace be to you, and peace, from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

These words are both a christian salutation, and apostolical benediction. As they are a salutation, they express a wish and desire of the best blessings towards and on the behalf of them they saluted. From whence we may learn, That religion doth not abolish and destroy, but spiritualize and improve civility, humanity, and common courtesy. The Heathens wished health to their saluted friends; the Jews, peace; but the christians grace and peace. Again, the words may be understood as an apostolical and ministerial blessing: the apostles were the patriarchs of the church of the New Testament: and as a spiritual father, St. Paul here blesses his children, wishing them first grace, then peace: peace must be sought after grace; and not expected before it. Peace without grace is no peace. There can be no peace with the Creator, no sanctified peace with the creatures, except through Jesus Christ we are first made partakers of the gracious love and favor of Almighty God. Accordingly, says the apostle here, Grace be to you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. Where note, That grace and peace may be said to be from the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, these two ways: 1. Efficiently, as the authors and causes of both: God the Father is the author of all grace, as he did decree it; and Christ, as he did purchase it. 2. Objectively; that is, this grace and love in God the Father, and this peace and satisfaction that is in Jesus Christ, the more they are by faith apprehended by us, the more are they increased in us, and upon us. Learn from the whole, That the holiest and best of christians here on earth, stand in manifest need of fuller supplies and farther additions both of grace and peace to be daily communicated to them, and enjoyed by them: Grace be to you, and peace.

4 Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father:

That is, "Our Lord Jesus Christ gave himself unto death, for the remission of our sins, that he might deliver us from this evil world; namely, to separate or bring us off from the evil customs and practices of the wicked men in the world, and engage us to live a life of strict holiness according to the will and command of God our Father." Here note, 1. The priestly office of Christ declared and asserted; He gave himself for our sins: that is, an expiatory sacrifice for our sins. So deadly was the guilt of sin, so exact the justice of God, and so unalterable his faithfulness, in executing the judgment which was denounced against sinners, that there was no hope for guilty sinners' pardon, without satisfaction given to the injured justice of God, for sin; and nothing less would satisfy than the blood of God; that is, the blood of Jesus Christ, who is essentially, truly, and really God. Note, 2. A farther end and design which Christ had in giving himself for us, namely, to deliver us from the rage of our lusts, as well as from the wrath of God, to sanctify our natures for us, and to mortify our corruptions in us, to redeem us from our vain conversation, and deliver us from this present evil world; not totally to remove us out of the world, but morally to oblige us to abandon the wicked courses, the sinful practices of the evil men of the world. Blessed be God, that Jesus Christ did not only purchase pardon and remission, but holiness and sanctification also for his ransomed and redeemed ones, and is as willing to free us from the dominion, as from the danger of our sins: He gave himself for us, that he might deliver us from this present evil world. Note, 3. As the final cause of Christ's death, deliverance from God's wrath and sin's rage, so the efficient cause of his death, the will of his Father, He gave himself for us according to the will of God; that is, according to the purpose and appointment of God. Christ as Mediator, was the Father's servant; and whatever he did in the work of mediation for us, was by the appointment and with the special approbation of God the Father. Eternal thanks be given, that the Son's purchase was the Father's pleasure: Note, 4. The comfortable relation in which God now stands unto us, since Christ gave himself for us, namely, that of a Father; according to the will of God and our Father; that is, who is now our Father. Learn hence, That satisfaction being given by Christ to provoked justice for our sins, God, who was before a consuming fire, and a sin punishing judge, is become our gracious and reconciled Father; our Father by adoption, who before was our Father only by creation; according to the will of God and our Father.

5 To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

That is, "To God the Father, and Christ Jesus our Redeemer, be given the highest degrees of honor and glory, throughout the present and eternal ages." Note here, 1. The work and duty incumbent upon Christ's redeemed ones, and that is, to ascribe all honor and homage, all glory and praise to God the Father, as the contriver, and to Christ the Son, as the accomplisher of the work of redemption; To whom; both whom, be glory. Note, 2. The duration and continuance of this duty; not for a day, or year, but for eternal ages. This duty of ascribing honor and homage, glory and praise to the Father and Mediator, for the glorious work of man's redemption, is such, that it can never be sufficiently discharged, but requires a succession of ages to perform it in: yea, eternity itself is too short for the performance of it: to whom be glory for ever and ever. The glory of the Redeemer, and of him that sent him to redeem, will be the long-lasting, and never-ending song of redeemed ones, through millions of ages, yea, to all eternity; a work begun on earth, never finished in heaven.

6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel:

7 Which is not another: but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ.

Observe here, 1. The heavy charge which St. Paul brings in against the false apostles or Judaizing teachers, they perverted the gospel which St. Paul preached, and taught a new gospel of their own; yet not absolutely so, but by compounding and mingling the gospel with the ceremonial law, and by making circumcision and other things, necessary to salvation, which our Saviour never made so, this the apostle calls another gospel. Whence learn, 1. That it is no new or strange thing to hear of new gospels, or true gospel perverters, and of false gospel teachers. We find such in the primitive and purest churches, planted even by the apostles themselves; no wonder they are found in our days who are fallen into the very dregs of time and error together. Learn, 2. That the addition of any thing to the christian religion, as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, is a perverting the gospel of Christ, and preaching another gospel. These Galatians did not renounce christianity, and go over to another religion, but they received circumcision, and the observation of the law of Moses; as an essential part of the christian religion, and as a condition of eternal salvation: whereas the death of Christ having put an end to the Jewish dispensation, there was neither then, nor now, any obligation upon christians to observe the law of Moses; and consequently, the addition of any thing to the christian doctrine, as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, is preaching another gospel, and a manifest perverting of the gospel of Christ. Learn, 3. That there is no authority in the christian church, in any, or in all the guides of it, to impose upon christians any thing, as of necessity to salvation, which the gospel has not made necessary. The apostles themselves had no authority to add any thing to the gospel, much less can any that come after them pretend to it: Christ commanded them, Matt. xxviii. to teach all nations to observe all things whatsoever he commanded them.

and had the apostles themselves added any point of faith and practice, not given them in charge by Christ himself, they had fallen under that curse themselves, which here they denounced against false teachers. Observe, 2. The artifice which these false teachers used to draw the Galatians into these new errors, and that was hastily and suddenly to avow and own them both before the world; I marvel that ye are so soon removed. Seducers are for clapping up an hasty match between the mind and error, and press the seduced to quick resolutions; an hasty dispatch being their great advantage, before they consult their spiritual guides, or weigh matters in the balance of impartial judgments. What, says the apostle, are ye so soon removed? Yes, might the false teachers have said, if not so soon, it might never; if not so soon removed they might never be at all: for errors are like fish, they must be eaten fresh and new, or they will quickly sink, and be thrown away. Observe, 3. The true cause from which the Galatians fall into error did proceed: they trusted themselves with themselves; they trusted to the clearness of their own unassisted eyes, and to the strength of their own reason and judgment, without consulting their spiritual guide. Had not these Galatians a Paul to consult with, before they gave their consent to false teachers? Or if he was at a distance from them, about the work of the Lord in remote places, could not they have written to him, or advised with others besides him? Woe to him that is alone, when assaulted by seducers!

8 But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.

9 As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other gospel unto you, than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

Observe here, 1. How our apostle supposes an impossibility, only for the confirmation of what he had before affirmed. He doth not suppose it possible for any angel in heaven, or apostle upon earth, to contradict the doctrine of the gospel which he had delivered, to preach any thing contrary to it, or besides it, or different from it; making that necessary to be believed and practised, which Christ and his apostles never made necessary. Learn hence, That the written word of God, without unwritten traditions, contains in it all things necessary to salvation; and whatever doctrines are propounded to the church, not only contrary to, but differing from it, or besides the written word, are cursed doctrines. Observe 2. The terrible Anathema which the apostle denounces against those, whoever they should be, be it an apostle upon earth, or an angel from heaven, that should thus pervert the gospel of Christ by making any thing necessary to be believed or practised in order to salvation, which Christ has not made necessary. Let him be accursed. Let the church of Rome in general, and the council of Trent in particular, dread the efficacy of this curse, who have added so many new articles to the christian faith, and enforced them as necessary to be believed by all christians; inasmuch that they pronounced, "that no salvation can be obtained without the belief of them," and denounced their anathemas against us who cannot believe them: but as their curse, causeless, shall not come, so we believe that they, propounding terms of salvation, nowhere delivered by Christ and his apostles, do bring themselves under the apostle's anathema here in this text: for if the new articles of the church at Rome be necessary to salvation, then what Christ and his apostles delivered was not sufficient to salvation before; and thus the pride of man exalts itself above the wisdom of God. Observe, 3. How the apostle expresses his assurance in this matter; and to show that he did not speak rashly, and in a heat, but upon due consideration, he repeats again, ver. 9. "As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach otherwise, let him be accursed." Note here, How positive and peremptory the apostle is in this matter: and doubtless this one Anathema of his, is more dreadful than all the bruta fulmina, the freakish Anathemas of an enthusiastic church, who, in a manifest affront to the authority of St. Paul, has presumed to add so many new articles to the christian religion, for which there is not the least ground or warrant, either from the holy scriptures, or any of the ancient creeds.—Observe lastly, How the apostle puts himself in the number, if I, or any man, or any angel preach otherwise, let him be accursed. As if the apostle had said, "Not only the false apostles are to be rejected, but I myself deserve to be anathematized, and accounted an execrable person, should I preach any other doctrine to you, than what you have received from Christ by me; nay, should any angel from heaven attempt it, he ought to be detested for it."—Learn, That no angel in heaven, no person or church upon earth, have power to make new articles of faith, or to impose any thing upon our belief or practice, that is either against or besides the written word, or any ways inconsistent with it, or contrary unto it.

10 For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ.

Our apostle in these words discovers the great sincerity used in preaching the pure and unmixed doctrine of the gospel to the Galatians; for he did not persuade that men, but God should be heard and obeyed, that so their faith might be founded upon divine, and not human authority; nor did he in his ministry aim at pleasing men, but Christ. For should he now please men, being an apostle, as he did in times past, being a pharisee, he should not be the servant of Christ. The ministers of Christ must not be men-pleasers; they must not please men either by flattery or falsehood, nor accommodate their doctrines to the humor and dispositions of men; pleasing of God is our great work and business, let us mind that: man-pleasing is endless, and needless, any farther than for their good, and the gospel's gain. Accordingly, the apostle tells us elsewhere, that he was made "all things to all men, that he might gain some;" not to make a present gain of them, but that they might be eternal gainers by him; it was not to exalt himself, but that Christ might be exalted in the hearts and lives of his hearers, that he sought in and by his ministry to please all men; and thus in imitation of him, let us seek to please all men for their good to edification.

11 ¶ But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man.

14 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

The apostle here, as he did before, ver. 1. 2. asserts the divinity of the doctrine of the gospel which he had preached to them; and assures them likewise of his own lawful call to be an apostle, which was questioned by his adversaries, who affirmed, that he had received his doctrine only from others at the second hand. To satisfy them in the divinity of his doctrine, he tells them, it was not after man; that is, it was not human, but divine; nothing belonging to man, but all from God in it: and as for his authority to preach it, he assures them, he had a revelation and commission from Jesus Christ so to do; he learned not his doctrine from any human teacher, nor undertook to preach it by any human authority, but from Christ's immediate revelation. Learn hence, It is a singular satisfaction to ministers of Christ, and that which gives them boldness before their false accusers, when they cannot give good proof of their regular call to the work of the ministry, and of the divinity of the doctrine dispensed by them. Thus did St. Paul here: The gospel, says he, which I preach to you, and the mission I had so to preach it, was not after man, nor from man, nor by man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. Where note, From Christ's being so often opposed to man in these verses, and in the first verse, that he is not mere man, but God as well as man: why else doth the apostle oppose Christ to man so often as he doth here? Not of man, neither by man, nor after man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ, who is God.

13 For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it;

14 And profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers.

Here the apostle offers several arguments to satisfy the Galatians, that both his commission to preach the gospel, and also the gospel which he preached to them, were not from man, but our Lord Jesus Christ. And the first argument to prove it, as a convictive evidence of it, was his bitter enmity against the christian religion, and his mighty zeal for the Jewish religion, in which he was educated and brought up: all which he mentions as a thing publicly known, leaving them to infer from thence, that so great and sudden a change could not be the effect of human persuasion, but divine revelation; "In time past I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it." Where note, That although our apostle did not shun to make an open confession of his wicked life, before his conversion, that he might thereby make evident, that his conversion was immediately from God, yet he makes an open confession only of his open sins, such as they had heard of in time past, without discovering his secret sins, which had been kept from the knowledge of the world, the divulging whereof would but have multiplied scandals and stumbling-blocks unto others. To confess our secret sins to God, is safe; to confess our open sins to the world, is sufficient. Observe farther, The commendable proficiency which St. Paul made in the Jewish religion, wherein he was educated, "I profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals." He was also a zealous maintainer of the Jewish customs, and unwritten traditions, "being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers."—From St. Paul's example we may infer, That it is a special duty incumbent upon all persons to make religion the matter of their choice; and having espoused it, to be the more serious and zealous in it; to labor to advance and grow both in the knowledge and in the practice of it; and that to a degree of eminency, excelling and outstripping others: "I profited in the Jewish religion above many my equals, or contemporaries."

15 But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace.

16 To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood;

17 Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me: but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus.

Here we have a second evidence which St. Paul brings to prove himself an apostle extraordinary, called by God himself unto the ministerial service; and that the doctrine he delivered was not immediately from the mouths of the apostles, but by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ. Thus he speaks: "When, says he, it pleased God, who decreed and determined to separate and set me apart for the work of an apostle, even from my very infancy, and afterwards of his mere grace and good will called me to preach the gospel to the Gentile world, having first revealed his Son in me, and to me, and then by me, immediately I set about the work, and complied with my duty, not consulting any person living, neither my own carnal reason, nor any man's advice; neither went I up presently to Jerusalem to confer with, to receive authority or instruction from them, which were apostles before me; but I went immediately from Damascus, the place of my conversion into Arabia, and preached the gospel three years among those wild and barbarous heathens, and then returned again unto Damascus: from whence it evidently appears, that I neither had instruction nor commission from any of the apostles that were before me, having never seen any of them as yet, but both my mission and my message were immediately received from Jesus Christ." Here observe, 1. The qualification necessary in a minister that reveals Jesus Christ unto his people; namely, that Christ must be revealed to him, and in him. We must learn Christ ourselves, before we pretend to preach him to others: "When it pleased God to reveal his Son in me, I preached him among the heathen." As there is no knowledge like the knowledge of experience: so there is no preaching like experimental preaching. Happy those that can say, not only that which we have heard and read, but that which we have tasted, and felt, and experienced from the Holy Spirit's operation in and upon our own hearts, that declare we unto you. Observe, 2. What haste the apostle made to obey the call and command of God, after he had received it; Immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood. He consulted neither himself nor others, neither his own heart nor the wisest heads, he consulted not his own safety nor carnal interest, but instantly did what he was commanded to do. The great commendation of duties, is the ready discharge of duties. When once the mind of God is declared, and conscience thoroughly satisfied, we cannot be too quick, and expeditious in the execution of divine commands. Lord! how readily should all men, but especially thy ministers, answer and obey thy call, and execute thy will and pleasure! Immediately I conferred not, says St. Paul, I made haste and delayed not, says holy David. In a good work it is good to make haste: in God's work we cannot readily make more haste than good speed.

18 Then, after three years, I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days.

19 But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother.

Here is a third evidence to prove, that St. Paul received his ministry and message by divine revelation from Jesus Christ, and not from man, or by man. He acknowledges that not till three years after his conversion, when he had preached the gospel in the deserts of Arabia, had he ever seen Peter, or any other of the apostles, and consequently could not receive the knowledge of the gospel from him or them, as his adversaries, the false apostles, would insinuate and suggest. True, after his three years preaching in, and his return from Arabia, he went up to Jerusalem, and saw Peter and James, and conversed with them for fifteen days: but the shortness of his stay with them is an evidence that he went not up to Jerusalem to learn the gospel from them, much less to pay homage to St. Peter as the prince of the apostles; for St. Paul often affirms, in his epistles, That he was not inferior to St. Peter, nor came behind the chiefest of the apostles; but it was only a familiar and friendly visit, given by one minister of Christ to another, in token of mutual consent and agreement, in the same truth preached by both; and by no means to receive ordination from Peter, or divine instructions (for he had a higher teacher than him, even Christ himself) or to acknowledge any subjection to him, by owning his supremacy, over all the apostles; as the church of Rome would bear us in hand he did, in defiance of what St. Paul himself declares to the contrary. But we cannot help it, if men who have their credulity at their own disposal, and can believe what they list, will yield their assent to what is contrary to divine revelation, and the reason of things. Very evident it is to any impartial observer, that St. Paul's visit at Jerusalem was a visit of civil courtesy, yet for the spiritual consolation and mutual edification both of himself and the apostles, whom he thus visited. From hence learn, 1. That the ministers of Christ should be so far from living at variance with, or at any distance in affection from each other, that they ought to maintain correspondence and familiarity with one another, and to give friendly visits to each other, in token of their harmony and mutual agreement in the same divine truths delivered by them. Thus did our apostle here; he took a journey to Jerusalem, to see Peter, and James, our Lord's kinsman. Learn, 2. From the shortness of his visit and stay at Jerusalem, though it was in the most delightful and desirable, yea, most profitable company, yet it was but for fifteen days; he hastens away to his charge again. Thence note, That though the ministers of Christ may and ought to visit each other, as an evidence of reciprocal affection, and in order to mutual direction, edification and consolation; yet ought their meetings to be neither so frequent, nor of so long continuance, that thereby their several flocks should suffer prejudice: after a short time spent in visiting, we must return to our business, and mind, above all things, our ministerial charge: "I went to see Peter, but abode with him only fifteen days.

20 Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not.

Observe here, That St. Paul, having to do with the false apostles and the seduced Galatians, who, he had just cause to suspect, would not (as they ought) give much credit to his word; he asserts the truth of what he affirmed, upon oath, appealing to the all-knowing and heart-searching God, as witness and judge of the truth of what he said, Behold, before God, I lie not. Where note, 1. That it is no new thing for the faithfulest and ablest ministers and servants of Christ to be looked upon as liars, unworthy to be trusted, and to have the truth of what they deliver, though in God's name, questioned and suspected. Our apostle's purging of himself here from lying, doth import, that some did suspect him for a liar. And if an inspired apostle be, what private ministry may not be suspected! Note, 2. The mean which St. Paul makes use of, for purging himself from the imputation of falsehood; it was, by taking an oath in a solemn manner. Learn hence, That though rash swearing, false swearing, and upon every light occasion to take or multiply oaths, be a very great sin; yet to swear, and bear witness to the truth, and to take an oath upon due consideration, and for weighty reasons, and to swear by the name of God, is certainly a lawful, and sometimes a very necessary and important duty.

21 Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia;

22 And was unknown by face unto the churches of Judea which were in Christ:

23 But they had heard only, that he which persecuted us in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed.

24 And they glorified God in me.

The fourth evidence is here produced by St. Paul, to prove that both his ministry and his message, his office and his doctrine, were divine; and that he was so far from learning the christian religion from the christian churches in Judea, that he was not by face so much as known to them, or they to him: they had heard indeed, that one Paul, a persecutor, was become a preacher, but they had never seen him; and accordingly they magnified the grace of God in his conversion, admiring the wonderful change wrought in him. Observe here, 1. The laborious diligence and indefatigable industry of St. Paul, in planting and propagating the christian faith throughout the world: he travels, as soon as converted, into Arabia, then into the regions of Syria and Cilicia, thinking he could never do service enough for Christ, who had suffered and done so much for him. Oh, how full of life and zeal are young converts! What activity and industry for Christ and souls is found with them! They despise all dangers, they surmount all difficulties, are above all discouragements, in expressing their love to Christ, and venturing their lives for him: but, alas! as they grow older, their affections are cooler; so that they have many times just cause to say, "Oh, that it were with me, as in the months of old, in the day when God converted me, when the secret of God was with me, and when by his light I walked through all difficulties" to subserve his interest, and to promote his glory. Observe, The great and mighty power of the heart-changing grace of God, which turns the haters and professed enemies of religion into friends, and bitter and bloody persecutors into bold and painful preachers of the gospel: "He who persecuted in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed." He that "leads captivity captive," can soon make the stoutest enemies of religion to become its strongest friends. Observe, 3. Paul, before his conversion, is said to "destroy the faith," because he intended it, and endeavoured it, though he could not actually effect it, and accomplish it. Sin, and evil, intended by a determinate resolution, are as good as acted in God's account. Bloody persecutors design no less than a total extirpation of the truth, "to destroy the faith;" which though it be out of their reach to effect, yet having deliberately resolved it, it is as actually accomplished in the account of God; "He now preacheth the faith that once he destroyed." Observe, lastly, To whom the glory and praise of converting grace is due, namely, to God, and to God alone; "They glorified God in me;" that is, they owned and admired the grace of God bestowed upon me, which wrought such a glorious and blessed change in me. The converting grace of God, wrought either in ourselves, or others, is matter of admiration, and calls for thanksgivings and acknowledgments unto God; "They glorified God in me."

CHAPTER II.

Our apostle prosecutes in this, the argument which he had begun in the former chapter, namely, to evidence and prove, that both his ministry and his message, his office and his doctrine, were divine, neither of them received from man, but immediately from Jesus Christ. And because the false apostles had suggested, that St. Paul taught divers doctrines which were contrary to the judgment and practice of St. Peter and the other apostles, he declares in this chapter, how he went to Jerusalem, and communicated this doctrine, which he had preached among the Gentiles, to the most eminent of the apostles, who unanimously subscribed to it, and in a full synod declared their approbation of it: for they perceiving that St. Paul was in an extraordinary manner called of God, to be an apostle, both from that divine assistance wherewith he was accompanied, and from those apostolical gifts with which he was endowed, they acknowledged him for an apostle; yea, that he was inferior to none of themselves: to the great shame of the false apostles, who had misrepresented him, as delivering doctrines which were opposite and contrary to what was taught and practised by the other apostles.

THEN, fourteen years after, I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also.

2 And I went up by-revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation, lest by any means I should run, or had run in vain.

Observe here, 1. How the gracious care and good providence of God did watch over St. Paul from place to place, and from time to time, when and wheresoever he went forth to preach, to plant, and propagate the gospel. After fourteen years he went up to Jerusalem, that is, fourteen years after his conversion; soon after which he went about preaching the gospel to the Gentile world. Blessed be God, who is oftentimes pleased, in mercy to his church, to preserve the lives of his laborious ministers, and their liberties also, for the free exercise of their ministry, notwithstanding the joint endeavours of men and devils to the contrary. This good man, this great apostle, whose blood was thirsted after, having obtained help of God, continued fourteen years together, preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ. Observe, 2. The end, design, and intent of St. Paul, in this present going up to Jerusalem, and appearing before St. Peter there: it was not to acknowledge St. Peter's supremacy over him, or to appeal to him as the infallible judge in matters of religion: but it was, in friendly and brotherly manner, to acquaint St. Peter and the rest of the apostles, with the doctrine preached by him; that their concurring approbation being given to it, the mouth of his adversaries, the false apostles, might be stopped, who accused him for preaching contrary to what the rest of the apostles both believed and practised. Observe, 3. The ground upon which St. Paul undertook his journey to Jerusalem at this time; "He went up by revelation; he advised with God about the matter, and received direction from God to undertake the journey. Blessed be God, that although we cannot expect immediate direction and information from God now, as the saints of old had before the canon of the scripture was completed, yet we have the written word of God "to be a light to our feet, and a lamp unto our paths," to direct and guide us in all our enterprizes: and we ought to regulate all our actions according to it, and to judge of the lawfulness and expediency of our undertakings by it. Observe, 4. With what prudence and holy caution the blessed apostle proceeded in this matter; he imparted his sentiments, and communicated his doctrine to the rest of the apostles privately, for fear of exasperating the zealous Judaizing christians: and to the most eminent of the apostles, "such as were of greatest reputation;" lest if there should be any opposition made to his doctrine, he should hereafter run, or had run in vain. Nothing more obstructs the success and efficacy of the gospel, than differences of judgment, and strife and debate about those differences, amongst the most eminent preachers of it. Hence it was, that St. Paul endeavoured so much to get the joint consent of the most eminent apostles to the doctrine delivered by him, lest by the calumnies of his adversaries, his preaching should have been rendered unsuccessful, "and he should hereafter run and labor in vain."

3 But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised:

4 And that because of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage:

5 To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour, that the truth of the gospel might continue with you.

Observe here, 1. The instance and evidence which St. Paul brings of the apostles at Jerusalem, agreeing with him, both in their doctrine and in their practice; and that was Titus, who being a Gentile, born a Greek, and now a preacher of the gospel, and never circumcised, the apostles at Jerusalem would no more compel him to be circumcised than St. Paul had done, but received him into fellowship with them, though he was an uncircumcised Greek. This was a plain evidence, that they did not judge circumcision, at that time to be a part of God's commanded worship; for then they would have compelled Titus to it; that is, constrained him, by the force of ecclesiastical censures, to become circumcised, had they thought circumcision necessary to the Gentiles. Observe, 2. The reason assigned, why the apostle would not circumcise Titus, though he had before circumcised Timothy, namely, because some false brethren crept in, would have taken advantage from it, to bring persons into bondage to the law of ceremonies, and plead conformity to circumcision as an obliged duty. Learn hence, That although the ceremonial law was certainly abolished by the death of Christ, yet, Almighty God, partly with respect to it as his own ordinance, and partly in condescension to the weakness of the Jews, was pleased to tolerate the observation of some part of it, and particularly circumcision, as an indifferent action, though not as a part of religion, for some time; the ceremonial rites being dead, they were to be decently, not over hastily buried. Observe, 3.

(No. 53.)

The apostle's undaunted courage, and heroic resolution in this matter; he would, notwithstanding the false apostles' importunity, never yield subjection, or submission to, or compliance with, their commands, in the least measure, by consenting to circumcise Titus; that so the truth and liberty of the gospel might continue sincere and unshaken. Learn hence, That an outward act of compliance must not be consented to, which, in some cases might be complied with, when by making it necessary, we turn christian liberty into servitude and bondage, when things in their own nature indifferent, are urged and enforced as necessary; in that case, the practice of a thing indifferent, is to be abstained from. Thus here, when false brethren urged the circumcision of Titus, as an evidence of St. Paul's receding from the doctrine of Christian liberty, he would not obey them, nor consent unto them: "To whom we gave place, no not for an hour;" that is, we refused to use circumcision, though but once, because we would not give the adversaries the least advantage against us, or against the truth delivered and defended by us.

6 But of those who seemed to be somewhat, whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me; God accepteth no man's person: for they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me.

As if the apostle had said, "When I came up to Jerusalem, thus I behaved myself towards the false brethren, as I have here declared; but now, "for those who seemed to be somewhat," that is, Peter, James, and John, who were of chief reputation among the apostles, and more than ordinary ministers of Jesus Christ, being the foundations of the christian church, laid by Christ himself, although they had some external advantages above me, as being apostles before me, and having conversed with Christ, and seen him here on earth, which I never did; "yet this maketh no matter to me:" for God values no man for these outward favors and benefits: neither in that conference about circumcision, did they add any thing to me, either by their authority or instruction; they added nothing, they corrected nothing, but approved all things, both what I did and said: from whence it evidently appears, that my authority was equal with theirs, and my doctrine the same with theirs also.

7 But contrariwise, when they saw, that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter:

8 (For he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me towards the Gentiles;

9 And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision.

10 Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do.

Note here, 1. That the ordinance both of Peter and Paul for the office and work of apostles, was alike divine. The former, St. Peter, was to be the minister of the circumcision: that is, to exercise his ministry among the Jews, and St. Paul, by virtue of the same divine ordinance, was to exercise his office among the Gentiles, called the uncircumcision; yet this must not be so understood, as if Paul might not preach to the Jews, nor St. Peter to the Gentiles, which they both did upon occasion, but because their more special and particular province was thus, St. Peter to preach to the Jews, and St. Paul to the Gentiles. Learn hence, That the office of preaching the gospel is a special trust, committed by God himself to such as he qualifies for it; and as none must enterprize it, but such as he calls unto it, so must all that undertake, be accountable to him for it; "The gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, and the gospel of the circumcision was committed unto Peter."

Note, 2. How this great apostle ascribes the success and efficacy of his own ministry among the Gentiles, and of St. Peter's amongst the Jews, alike to God; "He that wrought effectually in Peter, was also mighty in me." It is neither the person nor pains of the minister, nor any natural energy or efficacy in the word preached, upon which the success of the gospel depends, but upon the effectual working of the Holy Spirit; "He that wrought effectually in Peter, was also mighty in me." The word of God works not as a natural agent, but as a moral instrument in the hand of the Spirit. The weapons of our ministerial warfare are then mighty, when made mighty through God, for the pulling down the strong holds of sin and satan. Note, 3. The duty of the ministers of Christ implicitly declared, namely, to be pillars; not seeming to be so, but really so: as pillars, they are to uphold the truth, by their doctrine and diligence; as pillars, to be constant in defending the truth against all the blasts and storms of error and false doctrine; as pillars, to adorn the truth by an innocent life, and instructive example, whereby they ought not only to shine before others, but also to outshine others. "When James, Cephas, and John seemed to be pillars." These three apostles under Christ, were the great supporters of the church of Christ, by their diligence and faithfulness: yet observe, James is here named before St. Peter: which shows the weakness of the Papists' arguments for Peter's primacy, because sometimes first named: but it is evident he is not always so; St. James is here mentioned before him, because, say some, bishop of Jerusalem, and the Lord's brother, or near kinsman: but certain it is, that St. Paul paid not here any deference to Peter, upon the account of his primacy or supremacy, which is now so much contended for, but was not then thought of, because it is the apostle's great drift and design to show that he was in every respect equal with Peter and the rest of the apostles, and in no respect inferior to any of them; and consequently, that neither in his mission nor his message, neither in his office nor doctrine, neither in his external authority, nor his internal gifts and graces, did he come behind the chiefest apostles, as the false apostles had misrepresented him. Note farther, St. Peter's integrity with James and John, in this matter, they being all very well satisfied, by convincing evidence, that Almighty God had certainly called Paul to be an apostle no less than themselves; they own and acknowledge him for such no doubt, to the grief, as well as to the shame of the false apostles, who had vilified his person, lessened his authority, and disparaged his doctrine: "When James, Cephas, and John, perceived the grace that was given unto me; that is, the grace of apostleship, they, in the name of all the apostles, and the whole church, gave unto me, and Barnabas my fellow laborer, the right hand of fellowship: that is, they owned us to be pillars as much as themselves, and acknowledged us to be apostles no less than themselves; and it was agreed and concluded upon, that we should continue to preach chiefly to the Gentiles, and they to the Jews: so far were the apostles of Jerusalem from condemning St. Paul's doctrine, or undervaluing his calling, which was the thing that the false apostles were so desirous of, and hoped for. Note, lastly, That as an evidence of the happy agreement of Peter, James, and John, with Paul and Barnabas, and of their owning them as apostles and ministers of Jesus Christ, they recommended to St. Paul's charitable consideration, the poverty of the Jewish converts to christianity, desiring him to make collections in the Gentiles' churches for the christian Jews. Here observe, 1. That the Jews were generally poorer than the Gentiles; it is frequently the lot of those who are rich in grace, to be poor in goods, and to be reduced to such straits, as to be forced to live upon some charitable supplies from others. Observe, 2. That although those who are our own poor, and live within our bounds, near us, and about us, are chiefly to be relieved by us; yet in cases of extreme necessity, such poor as live remote from us, whose faces were never seen by us, ought to be sharers in our charity. Observe, 3. That the care of God's poor, and the supplying of the outward necessities of his saints is an employment not unworthy the highest apostle, much less unbecoming the ordinary ministers of Christ; "They would that we should remember the poor." Observe, 4. That the faithful ministers of Christ ought upon just and fit occasions, to excite and stir up their people to duties of charity, as well as piety; to costly and expensive duties, as well as those that are easy and less burdensome; these being no less profitable to the church, and much more evidential of a real work of grace upon the heart. Thus did St. Paul here, the apostles desired me to "remember the poor: the same which I was forward to do."

11 But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.

Observe here, St. Peter's offence, and St. Paul's rebuke. St. Peter's offence, 1. was this, he declined from the doctrine taught by himself, concerning the abrogation of circumcision and the ceremonial law; he had formerly conversed freely with the christian Gentiles, without scruple, making no objection against them, because they were not circumcised: but at Antioch he withdrew himself from the christian Gentiles, refusing to eat with them, because they were not circumcised; as if, for want of circumcision they had been unclean, and altogether unfit to be conversed with. This was his fault; whereby it appears, that St. Peter himself was not infallible, whatever his pretended successors, the bishops of Rome, are supposed to be. Learn hence, How certainly and suddenly the holiest and best of men will run into sin and error, if a special assistance from the Holy Spirit doth not uphold them, and preserve them. Observe, 2. As St. Peter's offence, so St. Paul's rebuke; he withstood him to the face; that is, rebuked him publicly, because he was blameworthy, and not secretly behind his back; such as sin openly, must be rebuked and reproved openly. Here note, How little St. Paul dreamed of St. Peter's supremacy; if so, he had been more modest than thus to reprove him to his face. Learn hence, That as no bands of friendship must keep the ministers of God from reproofing sin and vice; so when they find the fault to be notorious, they must reprove it wherever they find it, with much boldness and resolution. St. Paul here, in reproofing St. Peter withstood him: it is in the original a military word, signifying to stand against, either by force of arms, as among soldiers; or by dint of argument, as among disputants: 'it is a word of defiance, and signifies an opposition hand to hand, face to face, foot to foot, not yielding an hair's breadth to the adversary. Yet withal, as St. Paul's courage, so his candor appeared, in reproofing St. Peter to his face, and not reproaching him, as some, behind his back. And behold this great and chief apostle St. Peter, submits to his reprover, neither justifying his action, nor reflecting upon St. Paul; he replieth not again.

12 For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come he withdrew, and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision.

13 And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation.

14 ¶ But when I saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

A farther account is given us in these verses, of St. Peter's offence at Antioch, in giving occasion of scandal to the Gentiles, by refusing to converse and eat with them, although he had before in a vision, received a divine command so to do. St. Paul calls it fear, ver. 12, dissimulation, ver. 13, and not walking uprightly, ver. 14. He refused to converse with the believing Gentiles, being uncircumcised, for fear of offending the believing Jews, who were so tenacious of circumcision, and the ceremonial law. Learn hence, What weakness and inconstancy is found with the best of men, especially when fear gets a prevailing power over them. St. Peter was the minister of the circumcision in great honor and esteem with the believing Jews, but fearing the loss of his reputation among them, he falls into a sin against God. Observe, 2. The fatal influence of that sin; it drew others into a partnership with him therein; Barnabas himself was led away with the dissimulation, and the other Jews dissembled with him. Learn hence, That such as are eminent in the church, had need be exactly careful how they walk; for if they fall they fall not alone, many do fall with them. Observe, 3. With what openness and freedom, with what courage and resolution, St. Paul checks and reproofs Peter for his cowardice and timorousness, in refusing to converse with the believing Gentiles, for fear of gaining the displeasure of the circumcised Jews; I said unto Peter before them all, If thou being a Jew livest, in thy ordinary conversation, after the manner of the Gentiles, why compellest thou the Gentiles, by thy example to live, as do the Jews? Where note, What a constraining power there is in the example of eminent persons. He is said to compel in scripture, not only who doth violently force, but who, being of authority, doth provoke by his example. The errors of those that do rule, become rules of error. Men sin through a kind of authority, through the sins of those who are in authority.

15 We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles.

16 Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ; even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law; for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

St. Paul having fully vindicated his own authority as an apostle, from the imputations of the false apostles, he comes next to vindicate his doctrine, namely, the evangelical doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, which he had formerly preached to the Galatians, and which, in his absence, false apostles had endeavoured to subvert and overthrow, urging the strict observation of the ceremonial law, as necessary to justification and salvation. Our apostle, therefore, to strike at the root of this dangerous error, excludes all works of our own from having any influence upon our justification. Now, this he proveth, 1. Because they that were Jews by birth, and so federally the holy people of God, found it necessary to renounce the works of the law in point of justification, and to seek righteousness only through faith in Christ, as well as the profane idolatrous sinners of the Gentiles, who were strangers to the covenant of God; "For by the works of the law shall no flesh," neither Jew nor Gentile, be justified; that is, acquitted from the guilt of sin, and discharged from obnoxiousness to the wrath of God. Now, no obedience of ours can obtain this, because of the great imperfection which cleaves to it, and because God will have all boasting excluded, Eph. ii. 8. "By grace ye are saved, through faith: not of works, lest any man should boast;" but that he that glorieth, should glory in the Lord. Observe here, That the doctrine of justification by faith, and not by works, was early, very early opposed by satan and false teachers. It being articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesie, a fundamental article of our christian faith, our comfort stands or falls with it; no wonder then it is strenuously opposed.

17 But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is, therefore, Christ the minister of sin? God forbid.

18 For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor.

These words are generally looked upon as an objection, which the adversaries of the doctrine of justification by faith, have been always ready to make against it, namely, "That if persons be not justified by their obedience to the law, then they may live as they list in the breach and violation of the law, and freely indulge themselves in sin, and consequently make Christ, the minister of sin, as if he had relaxed the duty." The apostle rejects this inference and deduction with the greatest abhorrence and detestation, saying, God forbid. Hence note, That it is no new prejudice, though a very unjust one, against the doctrine of justification by faith alone, and not by works, that it opens a door to licentiousness, and makes Christ the minister of sin. Observe farther, A second objection here suggested. Some might pretend that he built up by his practice, what he had destroyed: No, says the apostle, I have together with the doctrine of free justification, preached to you, pressed upon you, the duty of mortification, as of indispensable necessity to be practised by you; should therefore my preaching or my practice be otherwise than it has been, I should build again what I have destroyed, and destroy what I have already builded; and thus by encouraging sin, and discouraging holiness and obedience, I should be a transgressor against the law of righteousness. Learn hence, That the doctrine of justification by faith alone, cannot be rightly preached, except the duty of mortification and sin be urged and enforced with it: for the same faith that depends upon Christ for pardon of sin, doth look up unto him for power and strength to vanquish and subdue sin; if we do not the latter, Christ will never do the former.

19 For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God.

Here the apostle shows, that believers are so far from being justified by the law; that they are dead to the law, so as to put no confidence in their obedience to it for justification; particularly, 1. They are dead to the law; that is, they are delivered from the rigorous exactions of the law. Perfect, personal and perpetual obedience, is the duty which the law exacts at the believer's hand, and he has performed it, though not in himself, yet in the person of Christ his surety, who yielded as absolute and complete obedience to the law, as it could require or demand. 2. The law is dead to believers, and they to that, in regard to the condemnatory curse and sentence of the law: Christ hath redeemed them from the curse of the law: being made a curse for them, Gal. iii. 13. True, the believer's violation of the royal and righteous law of God, in the smallest measure and degree, doth in its own nature, deserve the curse and condemnatory sentence; but Christ has discharged him from obnoxiousness to the curse, by being made a curse. 3. The law is dead to believers, as to its authority, to justify and save them. This is that the law cannot do, being made weak through the flesh; though properly speaking, the law is not weak to us, but we are weak to that: the law has not lost its authority to command, but we our ability to obey; it is as impossible for a fallen sinner to keep the law of God perfectly, as it is for a lame cripple to run a race swiftly. Yet, 4. Believers are not dead, but alive to the law, as a rule of life and holy living; the law binds the believer (in Christ's hand) as strictly to endeavour obedience to it, as it did Adam in innocency: but here is the believer's privilege, that God the Father, upon the score of the covenant of grace, which the blood of Christ has ratified and confirmed, doth graciously accept the faithful endeavours of his children, instead of perfect performances; which obedience the law-covenant did rigorously exact and require. Thus may every believer say with the apostle, "I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God," namely, a life of righteousness and true holiness.

20 ¶ I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

Several things are here observable, viz. St. Paul's spiritual death declared, and his spiritual life described, together with the author and instrument of it. Observe, 1. St. Paul's spiritual death, I am crucified with Christ; that is, with Christ I am dead to the law (in the manner mentioned in the foregoing verse, dead to sin, and dead to the world. Learn hence, That all true believers are crucified with Christ Jesus; or that all justified persons have fellowship with Christ in his death: they have fellowship with him, 1. In the merit and value of his death; they are ransomed by it, as a price paid down to the justice of God for them. 2. In the virtue and efficacy of his death; which doth not only merit pardon for us, but mortifies sin in us: Our old man is crucified; that is, the power of sin is subdued in us. 3. A justified person hath fellowship with Christ, in the likeness and similitude of his death, and that is a crucifixion: as Christ died a painful, shameful, lingering, and accursed death for him, so doth sin die painfully, shamefully, and gradually in him: "They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts." Gal. v. 24. Observe, 2. St. Paul's spiritual life described, I live, yet not I, but Christ in me. Learn hence, That a crucified christian is a living christian: I am crucified, nevertheless I live: a life of justification and sanctification at present, in hope of, and as an earnest for, a life of glorification to come. Yet observe, 3. How the apostle corrects, or rather explains himself, after what mind, and in what manner he lives: he denies himself to be the author and root of his own life; and declares Christ to be both, I live, yet not I, but Christ in me. Christ is both the author and efficient cause, the exemplary cause, the end or final cause of the christian's life; a living christian, lives not himself, but Christ lives in him. Observe, 4. As the author of the christian's spiritual life, Christ; so the instrument of it, and that is faith: "The life which I live in the flesh," that is, the spiritual life which I live as a christian here in the world, "I live by faith in the Son of God;" my life of justification, is by faith in his blood; my life of sanctification, and consolation, is through faith, in and by influences derived from his holy Spirit. Observe, 5. How the apostle appropriates to himself in particular, what Christ had done for all believers in general; "He loved me, and gave himself for me." Where note, Though a firm persuasion, and a full assurance of Christ's special love to ourselves, and his dying for us in particular, is not of the essence and being of justifying and saving faith, yet it is attainable without an extraordinary revelation; and, as such, every sincere christian ought to aim at it, to labor and endeavour after it.

21 I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.

The apostle concludes the chapter with a double argument, to prove the christian's justification by faith, without the works of the law. 1. Were it otherwise, we should frustrate and make void the grace of God: for if justification be by works, it can no more be by grace; according to the apostle, Rom. xi. 6. 2. Christ's death had been in vain, without any necessary cause or reason at all, if the justification of a sinner could have been obtained by his own works. Where note, That as well works done after faith and conversion, as those done before it, are excluded from being the meritorious cause of our justification, either in whole or in part; because the joining of works with faith, in the matter of our justification, is a total exclusion of God's free grace, and a loud proclaiming, that Christ died in vain: "If righteousness come by the law, I frustrate the grace of God, and, Christ is dead in vain."

CHAPTER III.

In this and the following chapters of this epistle, our apostle expostulates the case with the Galatians, who were seduced by the false apostles to relinquish the liberty they were called to by the gospel, and to put their necks under the Judaical yoke again, so far as to observe circumcision; nay, their days, months, times, and years of the ceremonial law. And thus they turned again to the weak and beggarly elements of the law, from which they had a manumission by the gospel

This seduction of theirs, our apostle looks upon as a piece of fascination, accounting them like persons that had been in ill hands, and practised upon by witchcraft: he begins accordingly his holy charm against it in the first verse of this chapter, in which he thus bespeaks them

O FOOLISH Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that you should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?

Observe here, 1. The object of the apostle's sharp reprehension, the churches of Galatia. Observe, 2. The ground of their reprehension, their defection from the truth into a very great error, namely, their holding of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law, as necessary to salvation; which was a making of the cross of Christ of no effect, and a virtual denial of his being come in the flesh. From hence we learn, That the best and purest of particular churches may err, and have erred fundamentally and dangerously: for what consists such a church of, but persons all fallible? Head, and members, being all sinful, are as unable to secure themselves from error, as from vice. Indeed the church of Rome talks big, and boasts of a false gift, that of infallibility; but could never yet agree where it is lodged, whether in the Pope, or in a general council; however, they are sure they have it. Well, if so, the more wicked and wretchedly inexcusable are they, in not improving their talent of infallibility for the best service of the christian church, namely, by writing one infallible comment upon the whole Bible. What a serviceable performance would it have been in them, to pin the Pope in his chair, and hold down his hands to write, as Aaron and Hur held up Moses' hands to pray, till all the Amalekite errors and heresies, so much complained of, were routed and ruined! Woe unto them that let such an excellent gift lie idle amongst them, and unemployed by them. Observe, 3. The high and heinous aggravation of this fault in the Galatians, "before whose eyes Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth, crucified among them;" that is, Christ, and their freedom by him from the bondage of the ceremonial law, had been preached to them: and his death and sufferings, with the great end and design of them, as plainly laid before them, as if Christ himself had been crucified in the midst of them. Observe, lastly, The brand of infamy which our apostle sets upon the Judaizing doctors, heretical and false teachers; he calls them spiritual sorcerers, and their doctrines spiritual witchcraft: "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you?" Because, 1. As sorcerers, by deluding the senses, make persons apprehend they see what they see not; so heretics, by casting a mist of seeing reason before the understanding, do delude it, and make the deluded person believe that to be truth, which indeed is not. 2. As sorcerers, in what they do, are assisted beyond the reach of their own ability and skill, by the help of satan; so heretical spirits are often by satan's concurrence with them, more than ordinarily assisted by him, in drawing multitudes after them; "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you?" The original word seems borrowed from the practice of witches and sorcerers, who being assisted by the devil, used to cast mists before the eyes of the people, to dazzle and delude them.

(No. 53.)

2 This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

Our apostle having prepared the Galatians' attention, by a very smart and sharp reprehension in the foregoing verse, returns to the object of justification by faith without the works of the law, which he had entered upon in the former chapter, and prosecutes at large in this; and he uses five arguments to prove that we are justified by faith, and not by works; the first is contained in the verse before us, "Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" As if the apostle had said, "I appeal to your own experience; you have received the Spirit yourselves, some of you for sanctification, others for miraculous operations; now

I would know by what means you received it? Was it by hearing the law of Moses preached? You cannot say it: for you were heathens, and without the written law; it must then be by hearing of the gospel, the doctrine of faith, which I preached to you." Here we have a truth expressed, and a truth implied. The truth expressed is this, That the hearing of the gospel faithfully preached is the instrumental mean by which persons receive the Holy Spirit in the sanctifying gifts and graces of it, to enable them to live an holy and spiritual life: "Received ye not the Spirit by the hearing of faith? Yes, ye did. The truth implied is this, that a people should take great heed, that they never undervalue, much less despise and vilify that ministry, or that doctrine, which God at first blessed for their conversion. How many are there in England at this day, who disown that church, despise that ministry which God blessed to their conversion, if ever they were converted? Sad it is, yet very certain, that like vipers they gnaw out the bowels of her who suckled them at her breast.

3 Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?

Observe here, The apostle calls the doctrine of the gospel, Spirit; because by hearing the gospel preached, they had received both the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit. The law, with all its rites and ceremonies, he calls flesh; because they were now weak, and being but temporary institutions, were abolished by the coming of Christ and the gospel. Observe next, How the apostle endeavours to convince the Galatians of the folly and absurdity of hoping to perfect that in the flesh, which they had begun in the Spirit: "Are ye so foolish?" As if he had said, "That having at your entrance into christianity begun an holy life, by and according to the Holy Spirit conferred upon you, that now you should think to be made more perfect by the flesh, by the external commandments and observances of the law; how unreasonable is it to suppose that your justification should be begun by a more noble, and perfected by a less noble cause?"

4 Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain.

As if the apostle had said, "To what purpose have you suffered so many persecutions from the Jews, for the cause of christianity? All which sufferings will be in vain, if, after all, you bring yourselves under the bondage of the Jewish yoke; for these might have been escaped, had you owned the necessity of circumcision, and other legal observances: but I hope you will recollect yourselves, and persevere in your first profession, without which all your former labors, your past and present sufferings, will avail you nothing." Intimating, that all the good actions we have done, and the hard things which we have suffered, will be altogether in vain to us, if we do not persevere in well doing, and patient suffering unto the end: "Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain." Note here, 1. That it has been from the beginning the lot and portion of such as profess christianity, to suffer many things in the defence of it. Note, 2. That it is very possible for some of those who have made an early and long profession of christianity, yea, and suffered hard things for it, after all, to make a foul defection and apostasy from it. Note, 3. That all such sufferings have been, are, and will be in vain, and return to no joyful account, if the persons suffering do afterward apostatize from, and turn their backs upon the truths of God, formerly embraced and maintained by them: "Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain."

5 He, therefore, that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

Observe here, 1. That God did accompany the first preaching and planting of the gospel with the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, with a power to work miracles, to heal diseases, and to speak with tongues which were so many attestations and confirmations that the doctrine of the gospel was from God; for here St. Paul appeals to the Galatians, as men that had the Spirit and miracles amongst them. "He that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles;" implying, that Almighty God had given to them his holy Spirit, both in the sanctifying graces, and miraculous gifts of it. Observe, 2. That the Spirit thus communicated in the first and early days of christianity, was not given to the Galatians, or any other Gentiles, by the preaching of the law, but by the ministry and dispensation of the gospel, which is here called "the hearing of faith: he that ministereth to you the Spirit, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?" Learn hence, That although the gifts and graces of God's holy Spirit are conveyed to the hearers of the gospel by the ministry of the word, yet God is the author, the minister, and dispenser of them, and the gospel only the instrument and mean of their conveyance: "He ministereth to you the Spirit."

6 ¶ Even as Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness.

7 Know ye, therefore, that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham.

Here our apostle proceeds to a second argument to prove that persons are justified by faith, and not by works; and that is drawn from the example of Abraham: and the argument lies thus: "As Abraham, the father of the faithful was justified; so must all believers, the children of faithful Abraham, be justified also. But though Abraham did abound in many virtues and good works, yet he was not justified by these, but by faith only; therefore by faith must all his children be justified also. "Abraham believed God;" that is, assented to, and relied upon the promise of God made unto him, that in him, that is, in the Messiah, who was to descend from him, "should all the nations of the earth be blessed;" and this faith of his was accounted, imputed, reckoned to him for righteousness; that is, was accepted of God for his justification." From whence the apostle doth infer, or draw this conclusion, that such as seek justification by faith, as Abraham did, "are the children of Abraham," as the Gentiles were: that is, the children of his faith; a far greater privilege than what the Jews gloried in, namely, that they were the children of his flesh. Learn hence, That as the pious Jews under the Old Testament, so are christians now under the New Testament, justified alike. Were they justified freely? So are we. Are we justified fully? So are they. Was a righteousness necessary for them to be clothed with, in order to their acceptance with God? The same is necessary for us also. Was faith imputed by God to them for righteousness? So shall it be to us also.

8 And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed.

9 ¶ So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.

Observe here, That because the former consequence from Abraham's justification to ours, might be questioned whether it holds in the Gentiles, who were not of Abraham's posterity; therefore the apostle declares, that the greatest promise made to him, was, That in him, that is, in the Messiah, Christ Jesus, who was to come of him, all nations, Gentiles as well as Jews, should be blessed, God having determined, that all believers indefinitely, of what nation or kindred soever, should be all justified one and the same way, namely, by faith in Christ, without the works of the law. So that all that are of faith, or true believers, whether Gentiles or Jews, do partake of all those benefits and blessings which believing Abraham did partake of, amongst which justification by faith is the chief. Learn hence, 1. That the gospel is no new doctrine, but the same for substance, though not for clearness, with that which was preached to Abraham, and to the church under the Old Testament; "The scripture preached before the gospel unto Abraham." Learn, 2. That the blessing of justification by faith, and of other spiritual favors, promised to the nations in Abraham, was such as Abraham himself was a sharer in, and partaker of; they were blessed with faithful Abraham.

10 For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse: For it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

Here is a third argument produced in this chapter, to prove that we are justified by faith, and not by works; because they who seek to be justified by the works of the law, are under the curse: and if so, cannot be justified. The argument runs thus, "Our observance of the law, when at the best, is but imperfect: now every imperfect performance lays us under the curse, therefore no performance of ours can justify us. They that cannot fulfil the law, can never be justified by the law: but no fallen man can perfectly fulfil the law, therefore none can be justified by the law." This is the force of the argument, which the apostle proves by a quotation out of Deut. xxvii. 26 "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them." Where note, 1. The duty which the law enacts, namely, perfect, personal, and perpetual obedience. 2. The penalty which the law inflicts, and that is, the curse; Cursed is every one, &c. Learn hence: That sin and the curse are inseparable; wherever the sin is, the curse will be, be it upon a person by imputation, or by actual commission: wherever sin lies, it lays us under the curse; for sin is an infinite evil, objectively considered; it is a contempt of infinite authority, a contrariety to infinite holiness, a provocation of infinite justice, and abuse of infinite mercy; and consequently the desert of sin is death and the curse.

11 But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident; for, The just shall live by faith.

12 And the law is not of faith; but, The man that doeth them shall live in them.

A fourth argument is here produced to prove that no sinner can be justified before God by the works of the law, although before men he may. The argument is this, taken from Hab. ii. 4. The just shall live by faith: that is, live his spiritual life by faith, his life of justification and sanctification also: the life of his righteousness before God, or his holiness before men, and his life of glory with God in heaven, are all by faith. He adds, ver. 12. The law is not of faith; that is, the law says nothing of faith in a Mediator, or promises life to any person, save only to him who by a sinless obedience performs exactly what it prescribes; but the voice of the law is, Do, or die. Learn hence, That the law and faith, that is, the law and the gospel, are not contrary to each other, but are mutually subservient one to another in many things; as thus, when the law makes known sin, the gospel holds forth the remedy for sin; the law discovers our need of Christ, the gospel makes an offer and gracious tender of Jesus Christ; the law makes known to us our entire duty, the gospel furnishes us with strength and ability to perform that duty. Learn, 2. That though the law and faith, that is, the gospel, which is the doctrine of faith, be not contrary to each other, yet in point of justification they are mutually inconsistent one with another: so that if justification be by the works of the law, it cannot be had by faith; if it be had by faith, it cannot be attained by the works of the law. There can be no mixture of law and gospel, of faith and works, in this matter.

13 Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree.

This is the apostle's fifth and last argument, to prove that we are justified by faith; and that notwithstanding the threats of the law, a believer is freed from the curse and malediction of the law by Christ's bearing the curse for him. Christ hath redeemed us. Where note, 1. The believer's happy discharge from the most dismal and dreadful thing imaginable; namely, that condemnatory sentence and curse of the law, whereby a sinner is bound over to death, even to death of soul and body. Note, 2. The person that doth and only can deliver the sinner from this condemnatory curse and sentence, and that is Jesus Christ. He discharges the believer from his obnoxiousness to wrath, dissolves his obligation to punishment, looses all bands and chains of guilt: so that the curse of the law has nothing, and shall have nothing to do with him for ever. Note, 3. The way and manner in and by which Jesus Christ effecteth all this for us; namely, "by his being made a curse for us;" not that Christ was made the very curse itself, or changed into a curse, but he took the curse upon himself, our sin became his by voluntary susception of the punishment; and Christ underwent that death, the death of the cross, which by the law was accursed, to free us from the curse of the law; as Christ was made sin for us, so was he made a curse for us. Now as he was made sin, not by contracting the guilt of sin, but by suffering the punishment of sin; so he was made a curse, by undergoing that death which the law styles accursed.

14 That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ: that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.

Observe here, One special fruit of Christ's sufferings, and being made a curse for us: namely, that the curse being abolished, the blessing of Abraham, that is, the blessing of justification, reconciliation and adoption, promised to Abraham upon his believing, might come upon all the believing Gentiles, through Christ the promised seed: and that the Gentiles might receive the promises made by Christ, of the Holy Spirit, both in his miraculous gifts and sanctifying graces, through their submission to the faith of Christ, or the doctrine of the gospel. Learn hence, 1. That Christ, by submitting to the curse of the law did not only appease the wrath of God towards us, and deliver us from the curse of the law deserved by us, but purchased all spiritual blessings for us, such as grace here, and glory hereafter.—"Christ was made a curse, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles." Oh wonderful grace, infinite love and astonishing goodness of God, in that great work of our redemption, in bringing about one contrary by another! He giveth life by death, and the blessing by the curse: "Christ was made a curse, that the blessing might come upon the Gentiles." Learn, 2. That there was a promise of divers blessings made to Abraham: namely, that God would give him a son by Sarah, a son in his old age, and by that son, a numerous issue; that that issue should become a mighty nation, and possess all the land of Canaan, wherein he then journeyed: and that he would settle his covenant, that is his church in that family and nation; and that in one person descending from his posterity, all nations should be blessed: and that this blessing, introduced by that one person should abolish the curse brought upon all nations by the first person's sin: "That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ."

15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto.

16 Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one; And to thy seed, which is Christ.

17 And this I say, that the covenant which was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect.

18 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

Observe here, 1. An argument drawn from contracts among men, to prove the fixedness and stability of the covenant made by God: if one man makes a covenant with another, signs it, seals it, and delivers it before witnesses, it becomes irrevocable and irreversible; much more then must the covenant of grace and mercy made with us by God, be perpetual and immutable, since it is a covenant established by oath; and when God swears, he cannot repent. Observe, 2. The apostle proves, that the covenant of God can never fail, in regard of the wisdom and invariableness of him that made it: so it can never expire for want of parties that have interest in it, and advantage by it, for want of a seed to whom it is made: for as long as Christ hath a church and members upon earth, so long shall the promise be of force: not only "to Abraham, but to his seed, were the promises made, not to seeds, as of many: but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ;" where, by one, we understand one mystically, and in the aggregate; not only personally and individually: and by Christ, the whole church, consisting of head members, believing Gentiles, as well as Jews. Observe, 3. That the apostle having confirmed the truth of his doctrine by arguments in the foregoing part of the chapter, comes now, in the latter part of it, to answer objections, which some might be ready to make against his doctrine, the first we have ver. 17. "This I say, that the covenant which was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul." The objection lies thus: some might say, "When two laws are made, whereof the one was expressly contradictory to the other, the latter doth, in common presumption, abrogate and disannul the former: but here we find, that four hundred and thirty years after the promise made to Abraham, there was a law published extremely contrary to that promise, a law without mercy or compassion, a law both impossible and inexorable, a law which can neither be obeyed nor endured, a law which denounces a terrible and severe curse to the transgressors and breakers of it: therefore it should seem as if some cause had happened, to make God repent and revoke his former covenant promise made to Abraham." To obviate this objection, our apostle shows, first, what the purpose of the covenant promise to Abraham was; namely, to give life and salvation by grace and promise. Secondly, What the purpose of the latter covenant by Moses was not; namely, to give the same life by working, since, in those respects, there would be a contradiction and inconsistency in the covenants, and so by consequence, instability and unfaithfulness in him that made them. That, therefore, which the apostle here drives at, is this, that the coming of the law hath not voided the promise, and that the law is not of force towards the seed to whom the promise is made, in any such sense as carries contradiction to, or implies abrogation of, the promise before made: from whence it follows, if it be not to stand in contradiction to, it must stand in subordination to the gospel, and so tend to evangelical purposes. Learn hence, 1. That although God might have dealt with mankind as an absolute Lord and Sovereign, yet he doth not govern them barely by a law, but by a covenant, which has promises and threatenings annexed. Learn, 2. That after the covenant of works, made with man, before the fall, was broken by Adam, God was pleased to enter into a covenant of grace with fallen man, to deliver him out of an estate of sin and misery, and to bring him into a state of salvation by a Redeemer. Learn, 3. That though the former and latter covenant did differ in some considerable circumstances, yet they are one and the same in substance, and do fully agree in all the essential parts of both. Learn, 4. That God's intent in giving the law, and urging exact obedience to it, under the penalty of the curse, was not to take us off from seeking righteousness and life only by the promise, but to encourage us to seek it; for, says the apostle here, "The law could not disannul the covenant made with Abraham, nor make the promise of no effect."

19 Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator.

20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one: but God is one.

Here an objection is moved: some might be ready to say, "If the law, that is, works done in obedience to the law, do not justify, then the law given by Moses upon mount Sinai, is in vain, and to no purpose; for why was the law given, enjoining so many duties, promising life to the obedient, and threatening wrath and a curse to the disobedient, if the inheritance come not by the law?" The apostle answers, that one great end for which the law was given, was to discover sin, and a sinner's undone condition by reason of sin, and to lead him to seek out for a remedy. The law was added because of transgressions: that is, to make transgression appear, to discover the pollutions of men's hearts and natures, and make them sensible of the condemnation they are under. "The law was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come:" that is Christ and his church. Where note, that the legal dispensations were not to continue always in the church; but only till the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ: at whose death the partition wall was broken down, and the Gentiles called into the fellowship of the church, as well as the Jews. Observe, farther, the glorious and amazing manner, in which the law was given upon mount Sinai, in thunder and lightning, by the ministry of angels, in such a terrible manner, that there was no access for sinful man to God, and by Moses, a mediator, standing betwixt God and them: who in that action was a type of our Lord Jesus Christ, the only Mediator between God and

No. 33.

us. As Moses was a typical, national, and representative mediator, standing between the Lord and that people of the Jews, so Christ was a substantial and universal Mediator between God and mankind. Where note, That the law was published in mercy and pacification, not in fury and revenge; for had the Lord intended death in the publishing of the law, he would not have proclaimed it in the hand of a mediator, but of an executioner. He adds, That a mediator is not a mediator of one, that is, of one party, but of disagreeing parties. God and man were once friends: they were one, and needed no mediator: but God and man by sin, fell at variance, and now need a mediator.—The very notion of a mediator doth suppose, that men by sin, are at odds with God, and that God, by grace, is willing to be one with man. However, though a mediator is not a mediator of one, yet God is one: that is, though there be two covenants, and two mediators, yet God is one and the same in both covenants: he carries on one and the same purpose and intention, both in the law, and the gospel; namely a benevolence and good-will towards, and an hearty desire and reconciliation with mankind.

21 Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: For if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law.

22 But the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe.

Another objection is here made by the apostle: the Jews might possibly say, "That the law given by Moses was against the promise of God made to Abraham." The apostle answers, no; that the law is not contrary, but subservient to the promise: for the law was not given on mount Sinai, to afford life and justification by obedience to it (seeing it could not by a fallen creature be ever perfectly kept) but to convince of sin, and to condemn for sin; and that men despairing of salvation in and of themselves, might speedily betake themselves to Christ for it: for God in the scripture hath concluded, that is, declared all men to be under sin, and under the curse due to sin; that renouncing all confidence in themselves, they should, by faith, have recourse to the only Mediator for righteousness and life, for justification and salvation. Learn hence, That God in the publication of the law by Moses, on mount Sinai, had none but merciful and evangelical intentions. 2. That the publication of the law by Moses, was not against the promise of God made to Abraham, but they had both the same merciful design and gracious intention. To explain the matter by a similitude or illustration, thus: "Suppose a prince should proclaim a pardon to all traitors, if they would come in and plead it, and after this should send forth an officer to attack and arraign them, to threaten and condemn them: Is the prince contrary to himself? Hath he repented of his mercy? No, sure! but he is unwilling to lose the glory of his mercy, and most desirous to have the honor of it acknowledged; and therefore he bringeth these criminals into extremities, that when their guilt is made evident, they may acknowledge the justice of the law that would condemn them, and the great mercy of the prince in offering a pardon to them." The case is alike between God and us; first to Abraham, and in him to us: God made a promise of mercy and blessedness, even to all that would plead an interest in it, for remission of sins, and acceptance with God: but the world grew secure; and though sin was in them, and death reigned over them, they regarded not their miserable condition; being without a law to evidence sin and death unto their consciences, they saw no necessity of pleading the promise of pardon. Hereupon God publishes by Moses, a severe and terrible law, a law, which filled the air with thunder, and the mount with fire, inasmuch, that Moses the mediator, did exceedingly fear and quake; yet in all this, God did but pursue his first purpose of mercy, and take a course to make his gospel accounted worthy of all acceptation, that men being by this law roused from their security, and made sensible of the curse and malediction they lie under, might run from Sinai unto Sion, from Moses to Christ, and by faith plead that pardon and remission which in Christ was promised, when God told Abraham, that in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed.

23 But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed.

24 Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith.

25 But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster.

Before faith came, that is, before Christ came, and the doctrine of faith was preached, we were in bondage under the law; the ceremonial law was a very great bondage; their frequent going up to Jerusalem at their festivals, was burdensome; their ceremonies were many, inconvenient and chargeable; their laws for uncleanness and purifications, rendered them unconvertible, at all times, with other people, and sometimes unconvertible, one with another: yet was the law very useful to the Jews, that so they might be prepared by it to receive the doctrine of Christ, and salvation by faith in him. Hence it is that he called the law their schoolmaster to bring them unto Christ: the schoolmaster exercises authority over minors only, not overgrown persons; he teaches only rudiments and first principles for beginners, not such things as require mature judgment and perfect age. Such was the law in comparison of the gospel, and Moses with respect to Christ. Moses and the law is a rigid and severe schoolmaster, who, with whips and threats, require an hard lesson of their scholars, whether able to learn it or not: but Christ and the gospel is a mild and gentle teacher, who, by sweet promises and good rewards, invite their scholars to their duty, and guide and help them to do what of themselves they cannot do; by which means, they love both their master and their lesson, and rejoice when he is nearest to them, to direct them in their studies. As the law is our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, so Christ is our great prophet that leads us to God. Note, farther, That though the law was a good schoolmaster to the Jews in their infancy and minority; yet it has no authority over christians now grown up to maturity. The gospel-church, that is, both believing Jews and Gentiles, being like a son come to age, believing in Christ already come, are no longer, to be treated as children under the discipline of the law as a schoolmaster, for they are now under the evangelical, not Mosaic dispensation of the covenant of grace, After that faith is come: that is, Christ the object of faith manifested, and the gospel, the doctrine of faith revealed, we are no longer under a schoolmaster.

26 For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus.

Observe here, 1. A glorious gospel privilege discovered, namely, adoption; Ye are the children of God. The church of God under the New Testament, is in a special state of sonship and adoption, to whom the privileges and immunities of sons and heirs grown up to maturity do belong. Observe, 2. The universality of this privilege, Ye are all the children of God; that is, all, both Jews and Gentiles, all, both weak and strong, believers; substantial relations do not recipere magis et minus; he that is a father in reality, cannot be more a father to one child than to another; the young one in the cradle may call the parent father, as well as he that is grown to man's estate; Ye are all the children of God. Observe, 3. The instrumental cause of this blessed privilege, Faith in Christ Jesus; Christ invests every believer, weak as well as strong, in this glorious privilege of adoption; faith in Christ to come, did intitle believers under the Old Testament to the dignity of sons and daughters; and faith in Christ now already come, doth add some peculiar dignity of sonship to believers under the New Testament: they with us, and we with them, are all the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus; Christ of a Son became a servant, that we of slaves might become sons.

27 For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ.

What the apostle had asserted in the foregoing verse, he proves in this; namely, that all believers are the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus, because they are baptized into Christ and have put on Christ; that is, they are admitted into the christian church by baptism, they profess Christ's holy religion; and if they live as they profess, they put on Christ: that is, they are made partakers of his Spirit, and do copy forth the excellencies of his life. To put on Christ, is not as to put on a suit of clothes fitted to the body, but as metal cast into a mould, receiving the figure from it. Happy they who are not only sacramentally, but really and spiritually baptized into Christ: incorporated into him, and made one body with him by faith; who do not only bear his name, but wear his image.

28 There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.

As if the apostle had said, "Now since the coming of Christ, there is no difference of discrimination between one nation and another, no regard to any national privilege, either of Jew or Gentile, no distinction of conditions, either bond or free; or of sexes, either male or female; but circumcised or uncircumcised, we are all one as good as another, in respect of outward privileges, or external advantages; but being sincere believers, we are all equally accepted of God in Christ." Learn hence, That no external privilege or prerogative whatsoever without faith in Christ, is any whit available in salvation; none are debarred from Christ, nor more nor better accepted with him for any of these things: both the circumcised and uncircumcised are his, if believing in Christ.

29 And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

That is, "If ye be Christ's servants and subjects, then are ye the true seed of faithful Abraham, and heirs of the blessing, according to the promise made to him and to his seed." This our apostle asserts, in opposition to the false apostles, who maintained, that there could be none truly reputed Abraham's seed, except they were circumcised, and subjected themselves to the law of Moses; "Yes, says the apostle, if ye be Christ's, and by baptism ingrafted into him, you are the true children of Abraham, though ye be not circumcised: yea, you are heirs apparent of the heavenly inheritance given unto Abraham by promise." Learn hence, That all sincere and serious christians are Abraham's spiritual seed, children of his faith, are heirs together with him of the same promises. If ye be Christ's, that is, sincere, and serious christians, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

CHAPTER IV.

Our apostle farther proceeds, in this chapter, to clear the freedom of christians, under the gospel, from the servitude and bondage of the Mosaic law. He shows, that the abolished ceremonies of the legal dispensation were properly suited to the minority and infant state of the Jewish church, which required instruction in spiritual mysteries, by carnal resemblances: but that now, Christ, by his actual appearance in human flesh, had obtained our freedom from all those yokes, and put us into a fuller possession of the rights of children, even such as are come to age, and are grown up to riper years. The Jewish church before Christ, our apostle compares to an infant, in respect of age; they were babes and children; to a servant in respect of fear and subjection; to a pupil under tutors and governors, under the institution of a cursed school-master, the law acquainted only with the first rudiments of religion; the high mysteries of faith, being not so clearly manifested, nor made known unto them; and accordingly the apostle thus bespeaks them.

NOW I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all;

2 But is under tutors and governors, until the time appointed of the father.

3 Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world.

The apostle, in these words, compares the church of God, under the old Testament, to an infant or child in its minority and nonage: partly with respect to their weakness in understanding, and want of the means of knowledge, comparatively to what we enjoy; and partly, with respect to the discipline they were under from their rigid school-master, the ceremonial law. "Now, says the apostle, as a child, though he be heir to, and owner of all his father's inheritance in hope, yet so long as he is a minor, and under age, he differeth nothing from a servant in point of subjection, but is under the management of tutors and directors: in like manner the church, when in its infant state under the Old Testament, was kept in bondage and subjection under the rigid administration, and rigorous exaction of the law, and tied to almost a numberless number of ceremonial observances, by which it pleased Almighty God to instruct the former ages of his church." Learn hence, That the Jewish church in its infant state, was obliged to learn and practise the elements of a religion, chiefly consisting in visible and bodily performances of the ceremonial law, which were but rudiments, in respect of that heavenly doctrine concerning spiritual life which the gospel now reveals, and clearly makes known unto us: When we were children, we were in bondage under the elements of the world.

4 But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law.

5 ¶ To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.

That is, "When the fulness of time was come, which God the Father hath appointed for the finishing of the legal dispensation, and for the abolishing the ceremonial rites, God sent forth from himself the Son of himself, his only begotten Son, made, that is, born of a woman, made under and obedient to the law, subjecting himself both to its precepts and its curse, to redeem them who were under the law, and discharge them from the curse and malediction of it; that we believers, we the members of the christian church, might receive the adoption of sons, without any observance of circumcision, or other ceremonial rites." Observe here, 1. That Christ was God's Son, his own Son, the Son of himself, as the original calls him, Rom. viii. 3. his Son, not barely in regard of his miraculous conception, or in regard of his sanctification and mission, or in regard of his resurrection and exaltation, or in regard of that endeared affection which the Father bare unto him, but in regard of his essence and nature, as begotten by him: his Son, by eternal and ineffable generation; being for nature co-essential, for dignity co-equal, and for duration co-eternal with the Father. Observe, 2. That Christ, God's own Son, was sent forth by God the Father: God sent forth his Son. This sending of the Son doth, 1. Pre-suppose his pre-existence before his incarnation; for if he had not had a being, he could not have been sent: it supposes also his personality, and that he was a person; not an operation or manifestation only, for that could not be sent; and that he was a person really distinct from the Father; for how else could one send the other? 2. God's sending of Christ doth imply his ordaining, constituting, and appointing Christ from all eternity to come into the world; also his fitting and qualifying of him from his incarnation, and his authorizing and commissioning of Christ to take our nature upon him, and in that nature to do and suffer for us, as our pattern, and as our surety. Observe, 3. That Christ, God's own son, sent forth by God the Father was made of a woman, did really assume and take upon him our flesh, and was made manifest in our nature: it was not an undigested unshapen mass, or lump of flesh, that Christ assumed, but that flesh was organized and formed into a perfect body, having the same parts, members, lineaments and proportions which ours have; St. Paul calls it, Colos. 1. 22. the body of his flesh; a body, to show the organization of it; and a body of flesh, to show the reality of it. Observe, 4. That the season in which Christ was sent forth, was not in the beginning of time, nor at the end of time, but in the fulness of time. He came not in the beginning of time, to excite his people's affections and longing desires for his coming, and to teach them to prize him the more when come. He stayed not till the end of time, lest the faith of his church and people should have failed; the patriarchs believed in Christ to come, the apostles believed in Christ then present among them, and we believe in Christ as come, and gone again to heaven. Thus, in all differences of time's past, present and to come, faith had, has, and will have its suitable work, and proper employment. Observe, 5. That the great end of God in sending Christ unto us, and the gracious design of Christ in his undertaking for us, was our redemption from the bondage and curse of the law, and our adoption into the number of God's children: To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.

6 And, because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.

As if the apostle had said, "That you are now under the gospel, become and made the sons of God, appeareth by this, that God hath sent the Spirit of his natural Son into your hearts, to authorize and enable you to call upon him, not only as your God, but as your Father: the gospel assuring you, that you are no longer in that servile condition you were in whilst under the law; but God will deal with you now upon gospel terms, and justify you by faith, without the deeds of the law: now God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts." Observe here, 1. The title given to the Holy Spirit; it is called the Spirit of God's Son; that is, the Spirit of Christ, because it is the same Spirit which abode upon him that resteth upon us, and because the Spirit is purchased and procured for us by the blood of the Son. Those rivers of living water, by which the effusion of the Spirit is expressed, do flow out of Christ's pierced side; Christ purchased the Spirit for us, before he sent him from heaven to us. Observe, 2. The act respecting his person, God hath sent forth. This imports not any change of place, as if he were more distant from the Father when he was thus sent, than he was before; but it notes his commission for some special work in and upon the creature. Observe, 3. The objects which have the benefits of this act; God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts; that is, into the hearts of believers; signifying that the work here intended is an inward work, and a saving work, Ezek. xxxvi. 27. I will put my Spirit in them; not into the brain, to dwell there by common unsanctified gifts, but into the heart, where all the habits of grace are planted, and from whence all the issues of life proceed. Observe, 4. The office which the Holy Spirit performs in the believer's heart: First, it cries; secondly, it cries, Abba, Father: The Spirit cries, by enabling us through his gracious influences and assistances to cry or pray unto God; and it cries, Father, Father: the repetition made, and the word redoubled, denotes the strength and vehemency of the desire, and speaks a passionate and extraordinary concernment of soul, for obtaining the mercy desired, and the blessings prayed for. Learn hence, 1. That there are three sacred persons in the blessed Godhead, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; all are held forth to us in this single verse, yea, in this single clause of the verse, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son. Learn, 2. That the Spirit is not a quality or operation, but a person that has a real being and subsistence; else the phrase of being sent could not be properly applied to him. Learn, 3. That the Holy Spirit proceeds both from the Father and Son; for he is the Spirit of the Son, and is sent by the Father: there is an order among the divine persons, though no priority of being. Learn, 4. That the spirit of adoption is a spirit of supplication; and this spirit of supplication is the great privilege and advantage of believers under the gospel; for it teaches us what to pray for, and the manner how we are to pray; it joineth with our prayers his own effectual intercessions; it gives us a right and privilege to come unto God as unto a Father, and gives us also confidence and assurance, as sons, to be accepted with him. Learn, 5. That the great privilege of adoption is both discovered and improved by the help of the Spirit of Christ: our privilege of sonship under the gospel excels by far theirs under the law: 1. In point of manifestation and clearness. 2. As to fulness and amplitude of enjoyment.

7 Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

Note here, 1. That the spirit of the first covenant was a servile spirit, a spirit of fear and bondage, and they that were under that covenant, were rather servants than sons; not but that true believers, in and under the Old Testament, were the sons and daughters of the Most High God, and we find them challenging their privilege, Isa. lxiii. 16. Doubtless thou art our Father: but yet it was in so defective a degree, that they seemed more like to servants than to sons, and were trained up under suitable discipline: hence, says the apostle here, thou art now no more a servant; implying, they were once so. Note, 2. That the spirit of the new covenant is a free and ingenuous spirit, and the gospel state a more filial state than the legal state was: Thou art now no more a servant, but a son; and if sons, then are you heirs of God, and have a right to the inheritance of heaven when you die, and to the blessed privileges, and royal immunities contained in that great charter, the covenant of grace, whilst you live: If a son, then an heir of God, through Christ.

8 Howbeit, then when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods, 9 But now after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage ?

Our apostle having proved sufficiently the believing Christians freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law : next endeavours to convince the Galatians how absurd and unreasonable it was for them voluntarily to put themselves under the obligation and obedience of it, and to look upon it as necessary to their justification and salvation : Now in the verses before us he tells them, that when they were Gentiles they were the worst of slaves, serving them that were no gods at all ; whereas the Jews served the true God, though in a servile manner : These Galatians, being Heathens before conversion, served false gods, and so were in a bondage much worse than that of the Jews. The apostle therefore justly blames them, that they being naturally Gentiles, and never under the ceremonial law, should now desire and choose to enter into that bondage : which was apparently to go backward in religion, or to return to those principles which they had already over-past. Thence learn, That it is possible for a professing people to advance very far in the way of Christianity, and yet make a foul retreat afterwards in a course of defection and apostacy : After we have known God, that is, acknowledged the living and true God, and been acknowledged by him, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements ? Here note, How contemptuously, or at least disesteemingly, our apostle speaks of the legal rites of the ceremonial law : He calls them elements or rudiments, because they were God's first instruments given to his church for his worship, to which he intended afterwards a more perfect way of worship : Next he calls them weak elements, because the law made nothing perfect, and the observance of it was impotent and unavailable to a sinner's justification before God : And lastly, he calls them beggarly elements, in comparison with that more rational and spiritual way of worship under the gospel. Whence we may learn, That holy zeal will teach a saint to speak with a sort of contempt of any thing that encroaches upon the honour due to Christ, or any of his offices. True, the Levitical ceremonies were appointed by God himself as a part of divine worship leading to Christ, and as such to be religiously observed ; but when the false apostles did urge the observance of them under the gospel, as a part of necessary commanded worship, and as part of the Galatians' righteousness before God, St. Paul is bold then to give them the name of weak and beggarly elements.

10 Ye observe days and months, and times, and years.

11 I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.

St. Paul here gives instances to the Galatians, wherein it did appear, that they brought themselves under an unnecessary bondage to the rites of the ceremonial law ; he tells them plainly, that they kept the ceremonial sabbaths, feast and fasts, as if that law was obligatory, and still binding : "Ye observe days, that is, the Jewish sabbath days, and new moons ; and months, as the feast of the first month, and of the seventh month ; and times, that is, the times of their solemn festivals for going up to Jerusalem, as the Passover, Pentecost, and feast of tabernacles ; and years, as the sabbatical years, and years of Jubilee. This, says the apostle, makes me afraid of you, that I have preached the gospel, and the doctrine of free justification by faith, in vain to you ; because you leave the doctrine I taught you, and put your confidence in observing those legal ceremonial rites." Learn hence, 1. That the works of the ministry is a laborious work ; I have bestowed upon you labour, says St. Paul. A minister's life is not a life of ease, but of much toil and pains, a labouring unto faintness and weariness, as the word here used doth import and signify : Learn, 2. That the most laborious ministers and lively preachers may sometimes see so little fruit of their labours and endeavours, that they may have just cause to fear that few are savingly converted by their ministry : St. Paul here was afraid lest he had laboured in vain among the Galatians. Learn, 3. That in order to the success of our ministry, we must not content ourselves with a reproof of sin in general, but must descend to particulars, and give instances of those several and distinct sins which our people are guilty of, and ought to fall under our reproof for. Thus the apostle here gives particular instances of the sins formerly reproved, in their observing days, and months, and times, and years. Generals, we say, do not affect ; but particular reproofs are more piercing, and more convincing : When we say to the sinner, as Nathan to David, Thou art the man ; this, if any thing, will stick close to the conscience.

12 Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am ; for I am as ye are : ye have not injured me at all.

Observe here, The holy wisdom of our apostle, in tempering his former reproofs with great mildness and gentleness ; I beseech you brethren. He well knew that these Galatians were alienated in their affections from him ; and fearing lest from his present severity and sharpness towards them, they should apprehend that he was alienated from them also, he thus lovingly bespeaks them, "I pray you be affected towards me as I stand affected towards you : Count me not your enemy, because I tell you the truth ; for I am the same to you that ever I was : my love is not alienated from you, for any wrong or injury done to me by you : For, alas ! it is yourselves, and not me, that you injure, by bringing yourselves into this bondage to the ceremonial law, to the loss of your Christian liberty : Be as I am ; for I am as ye are ; ye have not injured me at all." Learn from St. Paul's example, That though the ministers of Christ may, and sometimes must, use severity and sharpness in the rebukes and reproofs which they give for sin, yet must they temper severity with gentleness ; and insinuations of kindness and affection must be mingled with rebukes ; as looking not so much at what their sin deserveth, as what is most convenient for bringing them to repentance : Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am. Learn, 2. That when the ministers of God, from a true zeal for the glory of God, do rebuke sin, and reprove sinners, the people are too apt to apprehend that our zeal flows from a private spirit of revenge, as if we had some particular displeasure against these persons for some personal injury done unto ourselves: all which groundless suspicions it is our duty to labour to wipe off: so did our apostle here; I have not injured me at all, says he.

13 Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the first.

14 And my temptation which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected; but received me as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus.

15 Where is then the blessedness ye spake of? for I bear you record, that if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me.

Observe here, 1. A singular instance which St. Paul gives of his sincere affection towards these Galatians, he preached the gospel to them at first, and this both with difficulty and danger, through the infirmity of the flesh; that is, through much bodily weakness and imperfections. The ancients say St. Paul was a little man, and had some deformity or crookedness of body, and imperfection in his utterance, which rendered both his person and his speech contemptible. These bodily infirmities he calls a temptation; intimating, that the afflictions of the body are great temptations to the soul. And besides these bodily infirmities, he encountered also with persecutions in preaching the gospel to them; which were evidences and convincing demonstrations of his fervent love and affectionate regard toward them: Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel to you at the first. Observe, 2. The reciprocal returns of love and affection which the Galatians made to St. Paul, at his first coming among them to preach the gospel; they received him as an angel of God, or as a messenger from God sent unto them, yea, as Jesus Christ, as if Christ himself had been there in person, and preached to them: Nay, so warm were their affections then to St. Paul at his first coming amongst them, that they did not only pull open their purses, but had it been possible for them, or profitable to him, they could even have plucked out their very eyes for him. But note, it was at his first coming amongst them, and preaching to them. Whence we may observe, That the first year of a minister's preaching to, and amongst a people, are usually most successful: Then our people's affections are warmest, and perhaps our own too: Our people then hear us without any kind of prejudice against us, with great desire and delight; afterwards their affections cool, either through their own inconstancy, or our inadvertency, or by the malice of Satan, or by the mischievous designs and misrepresentations of some of his instruments. Observe farther, That the love and reverence which the people owe to their ministers, should not be verbal and in profession only, but real and in sincerity; they ought to part with what is dear to them, to promote the work of God in their houses. There was a time when these Galatians would have given all they had to the apostle, money out of their purse, bread from their table, yea, blood out of their veins, and the very eyes out of their head: "I bear you record, that you would even have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me." Learn lastly, That it is an high commendation to a people, when neither poverty nor deformity, nor any deficiency, which may render a minister of the gospel base and contemptible in the estimation of the world, can possibly diminish any thing of that respect which they know to be due and payable unto him. Notwithstanding the Galatians knew the infirmity and temptation of the apostle, yet they received him (at first) as an angel of God.

16 I am therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth.

As if the apostle had said, "How comes your affections, which were so warm at first, to be so cold now? Whence is it that I, who was formerly so precious in your esteem, am now looked upon as an enemy, and only because I declare the truth of God unto you? Can any reason be given on my part, for the sudden change of affection on your part? I trow, not unless you count my candour and ingenuity in telling the truth, a crime: Am I become your enemy, because I tell you the truth?" Learn hence, That notwithstanding the faithful ministers of Christ, in reproving sin, and vindicating the truths of God, are sometimes counted and treated as enemies, yet will they persist, and finally persevere in their duty, whatever the event may be; though the world account them their enemy, yet they will tell them the truth.

17 They zealously affect you, but not well: yea, they would exclude you, that ye might affect them.

They, that is, the false apostles, pretend great love to you, and a zealous affection for you; but not well, not upon honest and just grounds. There is often in an ill cause, which is to be condemned and avoided; zeal is a mixed affection of love and anger working into a servency of mind, in defending what we believe to be true and good, and in opposing what we judge to be false and bad; they zealously affect you, but not well. Nothing is more common, and consequently more dangerous, than for heretical teachers to pretend great zeal for the glory of God, and great love and affection to the people of God, whilst they are about to persuade them to embrace their pernicious errors and damnable heresies. He adds, Yea, they would exclude you, that you might affect them: Exclude you, that is, from the liberties and privileges of the gospel, say some; from depending upon me, or any faithful pastor, say others; they would ingratiate themselves, that they may engross you, and you, may affect them only. The old practice has ever been amongst seducers, first to alienate the people's minds from their own teachers, and next get themselves looked upon as alone, and only worthy to have room in the people's hearts and affections; They would exclude you from us, and us from you, only that you might affect them.

18 But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you.

Note here, That although there is a zeal, in a bad cause, which is to be condemned and avoided, yet there is a zeal in a just and righteous cause, which is laudable and worthy to be practised; when it is a zeal guided by religion, governed by prudence, attended with perseverance; when in a good thing we are affected, zealously affected, and zealously affected always. This the apostle desires that the Galatians should be, and that as well when he was absent from them, as when he was present with them.

19 My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you.

Observe here, 1. The endearing title which the apostle gives to the apostatizing Galatians: he calls them children, little children, his little children, my little children. Note, He calls them children, because converted to christianity by the preaching of the gospel; and being thus regenerated and born again, they were to be as children, innocent and inoffensive. He calls them little children, to denote the tenderness of their growth in Christianity, the smallness of their proficiency in religion; they were not come to that consistency in grace, to that maturity in goodness, to that perfection in knowledge, which he did desire. Farther, he calls them his little children, to denote that spiritual relation which was between them, he having been the undoubted instrument of their conversion, and so was their spiritual Father; and also to denote that endearment of affection which he bore unto them, and that tender care and concern which he had for them. Observe, 2. The holy vehemency of the apostle's desire, how earnestly he longed after them in the bowels of Jesus Christ. He compares himself to a mother in travail, until he saw Christ formed in their hearts and lives. I travail in birth till Christ be formed in you. Learn hence, 1. That there is no stronger love, nor more endeared affection between any relations upon earth, than between such ministers of Christ and their beloved people, as they have been happily instrumental to convert and bring home to Christ. Learn, 2. That there is nothing in this world which the faithful ministers of Christ do so passionately desire and affectionately long after, as to see Jesus Christ formed and fashioned in the hearts and lives of their beloved people; My little children, of whom I travail in birth, &c.

20 I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice: for I stand in doubt of you.

Our apostle, as a farther testimony of his endeared affection towards the Galatians, declares here his earnest desire to have been with them, and see them face to face, that so being more fully acquainted with their case, he might know how to suit his discourses to them, and might have more cause of rejoicing with, than complaining of, them. — Learn hence, 1. That though a minister may sometimes necessarily withdraw himself from his flock, yet he ought always to have a fervent desire to be present with them, without neglecting any opportunity when occasion offereth, of returning to them: I desire to be present with you. Learn, 2. That it is a minister's duty to get, as much as may be, the exact knowledge of his people's inclinations and dispositions, of their state and condition, that he may know how to make a fit application to all of them, admonishing and reproofing some, threatening and correcting others. Thus the apostle here wished to be present with them, that he might change his voice; that is, know the better how to speak most suitably and seasonably to their condition; I desire to be present with you now, and to change my voice.

21 Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?

22 ¶ For it is written, that Abraham had two sons: the one by a bond-maid, the other by a free woman.

23 But he who was of the bond-woman, was born after the flesh; but he of the free-woman was by promise.

Our apostle here proceeds to the end of this chapter, in shewing the Galatians that it was the design of God, at the coming of Christ, to abolish the legal dispensation, and free men from the servitude and bondage of that law. And first, he argues with them from the nature of the law they were so willing, yea, so desirous to be under, ver. 21, Ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? That is, "Ye that desire to be justified by your legal performances, by observing circumcision, &c. do you not hear and take notice how the very law itself doth sentence, curse, and condemn you? And do you not find in the Old Testament, the story of Sarah and Hagar, of Ishmael and Isaac? Are you ignorant that Abraham had two sons, Ishmael by Hagar the bond-woman, and Isaac by Sarah the free-woman? Ishmael the bond-woman's son was born after the flesh; that is, by the ordinary strength of nature in the generation; Hagar being young, and Abraham being strong. But Isaac was the son of the promise; God gave him, by virtue of his promise made to Abraham when his body was dead, unfit for generation, and Sarah past conception also." Now from this history of Abraham's family, considered in itself (without the mystery prefigured by it) we learn, 1. That the best of men are imperfect men; the holy patriarchs lived in the sin of polygamy, or taking more wives than one, contrary to the first institution of marriage, either not knowing or not considering it was a sin. Abraham had two wives. Learn, 2. That the truth and veracity of God, engages him to fulfil and make good all his promises, though all ordinary means and secondary causes fail, and become impotent and unable to bring about the thing promised. Thus here, a promise being made to Abraham, that Sarah should have a child, she conceiveth and beareth Isaac; not according to the course of nature, but through virtue of the promise; he of the free-woman was by promise.

24 Which things are an allegory. For these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Hagar.

25 For this Hagar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children.

26 But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all.

Here the apostle makes an allegorical and spiritual application of the foregoing history of Sarah and Hagar, of Isaac and Ishmael; and the mystery he tells us is this, "The two mothers, Sarah and Hagar, are types of the two covenants, the one of works, the other of grace; the two sons, Isaac and Ishmael, are a type of two sorts of men living in the church, the one proceeding from the first, the other from the second covenant; the one regenerate, the other unregenerate men. All regenerate men are under the covenant of grace, and the free men; for every man's freedom depends upon the covenant under which he stands. Ishmael is the son of the bond-woman, and points at the Jerusalem which then was, and the people of the Jews, as they then stood attached, seeking justification, and expecting eternal salvation by the works of the law; but now behold in Isaac, a son of the free-woman, an emblem of the gospel church, which dares not depend upon the righteousness of the law, for justification, but relies upon the meritorious righteousness of the Mediator; and this points out Jerusalem above, which is free, and the mother of us all. Learn hence, That all unregenerate men, who continue in a state of nature, are under the first covenant or covenant of works. Ishmael is a type of all unregenerate men. Mankind is bound to God by a double bond: First, by a bond of creation; Secondly, by a bond of stipulation; The one is a natural, and the other is a voluntary obligation: by the former we are bound to God, by the latter he is bound to us. The covenant made with man in his state of innocence, was fœdus amicitiae, a covenant of friendship; the covenant made with us since the fall, is fœdus misericordiae, a covenant of reconciliation; the former made with the first Adam, the latter with Christ the second Adam. The first covenant was made not barely with the person, but with the nature of Adam, with the whole race of mankind: for God dealt with Adam, not as a single person, but as caput gentis, as the root and representative of mankind; and consequently, this covenant was not abolished by the fall, but stands still in force; not to give life, because it is become weak through our flesh; we are become weak to that, not that weak to us; but it commands duty as it did before, namely, perfect, personal, and perpetual obedience; and in case of failure, denounces the curse. Lord! awaken every natural and unregenerate man, who bearing only Adam's image, is also under Adam's covenant; he is a bond man now as well as Ishmael of old, in bondage to sin, in bondage to Satan, in bondage to the law, in bondage to his own fears, in bondage to the world. Oh, rest not, till by grace you are delivered from this bondage, by being translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son, and heartily submitted to the terms and conditions of the second covenant, which propoundeth repentance, and promiseth pardon and acceptance upon repentance!

27 For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry: thou that travailest not, for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband.

Our apostle here proceeds, and still goes on in his former allegory; the church of the Gentiles he compares to Sarah, who was a long time barren, but at last brought forth a child of the promise, a seed to which all the families of the earth were blessed. The church of the Jews is represented under the notion of a woman that had an husband and many children; but the barren Gentiles are by a spirit of prophecy, called upon to rejoice, and shout for joy, because there should be more children brought forth to God amongst them, than were amongst the Jews. Here, and hence observe, That it is not the church's lot to be always alike fruitful in bringing forth children unto God; she hath her barren times, in which the labours of her ministers are attended with little success, and few are converted and brought home to God: In the first beginning of the Christian church, though Christ himself was the preacher, she was one that beareth not, and travaileth not. Learn, 2. That upon the enlargement of Christ's kingdom, and the weakening of Satan's interest in the world, when souls are gathered in, and brought home to Christ, by the power of converting grace, all the churches of Christ ought to rejoice, and break forth into singing, as being matter of exceeding joy and great exultation; Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not, break forth into singing, &c.

28 Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise.

29 But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now.

In the former of these two verses, the apostle applies the foregoing allegory, or typical history of Sarah and Hagar, thus: "As, says he, Isaac by virtue of the promise, being born of the free-woman, was heir to all his father's estate; in like manner, they who seek salvation not by the law, but by faith in Christ, are the free children of God, and heirs of the promise of life eternal? We brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise." In the latter of these two verses, which gives us an account of the persecuting enmity that was in the heart and tongue of Ishmael against Isaac, we have several things observable: As, 1. The root and rise of Ishmael's persecuting malice discovered, and from whence it proceeded, and that was an inward antipathy to the work of grace in Isaac. Those great differences in divine heraldry, of being born after the flesh, and after the Spirit, evidently discover where the quarrel lay, and whence it arose; it was the spiritualness of Isaac that exasperated Ishmael's rage; Isaac was born after the spirit, and doubtless he shewed some fruits of the spirit, which Ishmael could not relish, and therefore did deride and mock him. Observe, 2. What was the kind of persecution which Isaac underwent. It was the persecution of the tongue, in derisions, and cruel mockings; Moses tells us, in the book of Genesis, the manner how, and the weapon with which: Ishmael did not lift up his hand against Isaac, as Cain did Abel, but his tongue only: yet St. Paul calls it here a persecution. Mocking and scoffing either at the word, ways, or people of God, is a sin of unspeakable profaneness, a blaspheming of Christ, and a persecution of his members. . . . He that was born after the flesh, persecuted him that was born after the Spirit. Observe, 3. That the persecution of the tongue, at least, is that which the children and church of God have met with in all former, and must expect to meet with in future ages: as it was then, says the apostle, even so it is now; afflictions are the donatives of the gospel, and persecution is the church's patrimony; "To us it is given on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but to suffer," Phil. i. 29. Observe lastly, from Ishmael's being brother to Isaac, and yet his bitter persecutor, that the sorest trials and sharpest persecutions, which the saints endure, are very often from their nearest relations, who are tied to them by the strongest obligations, either of kindred or acquaintance. Bitterest things are sometimes endured from the hands of those from whom better things might justly have been expected; Christ foretold all this, "The brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son." Cain is dead, but the Spirit of Cain yet lives; they that scoff, would bite, and make their teeth meet, had they power to use their cheek bone: He that is born after the flesh, will persecute those of his own flesh and family that are born after the Spirit; as it was then, we may go on to say, even so it is now.

30 Nevertheless, what saith the scripture? Cast out the bond-woman and her son: for the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman.

The apostle goes on in explaining and applying this typical history of Ishmael and Isaac, and tells us, that the casting out of Ishmael, the son of Hagar, the bond-woman, did typify the exclusion of the law from a partnership with the gospel in the justification of a sinner before God: As Ishmael was cast out of Abraham's family, and none but Isaac must inherit; so they that depend upon the law for justification, shall be cast out of the church of God, and never attain the heavenly inheritance: But they who depend upon the promise of God, and expect to be justified by faith, without legal performances, they only shall be heirs of grace and mercy. The doctrine of justification by the works of the law, when it is not only doctrinally maintained, but practically pursued and walked in, doth exclude persons from having any part or share in the kingdom of heaven. So much was typified and prefigured by the son of the bond-woman's being cast out, and not allowed to be heir with the son of the free-woman.

31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free.

Here the apostle draws a conclusion from the foregoing discourse, thus, "As Sarah cast out Hagar and Ishmael, so must the children of the New Jerusalem cast out the law, and all the legal rites, henceforth to be observed no more, either alone without Christ, or in conjunction with Christ. And as the church of the Gentiles was not typified in Hagar, but in Sarah, so we Christian Gentiles are not obliged to judaical observations, but freed entirely by Christ from them, and justified by gospel grace without them." The conclusion and sum of all is this, to bring off the Galatians from seeking justification by the works of the law, and to apprehend themselves no longer in bondage to circumcision and the Mosaic rites, but to stand fast in the liberty where-with Christ had made them free, which introduces that excellent discourse to this purpose, which we find contained in the next chapter.

CHAP. V.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, clearly asserted, and strenuously proved, the doctrine of free justification by faith without the works of the law, and that circumcision, and the ceremonial rites, were all certainly abolished by the death of Christ; he comes now (as his manner was) to improve his discourse by way of application to them; and this he doth, both for the informing of their judgments, and directing of their practice. And the first duty he exhorts the Galatians to, is to persist and stand fast in their Christian liberty, which Christ, by his death, had purchased for them, and to be no longer in bondage to circumcision, and the ceremonial law. Accordingly, he thus bespeaks them, ver. 1:

STAND fast, therefore, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

As if he had said, "Since Christ, by his death, has purchased our freedom from the yoke and bondage of the ceremonial law, let us resolutely stand fast in this our Christian liberty, without subjecting ourselves again to circumcision, and the observance of the Mosaic rites." Here note, 1. The servile condition of the Jewish church, they were under bondage, under a yoke of bondage. This servitude of theirs consisted in the vast number of their religious rites and observances, as to days and weeks, months and years; in the multitude of their sacrifices of all sorts, which they were obliged every day to offer; in their frequent purifications and washings; in the strict distinction they were obliged to make betwixt clean and unclean meats: in the numerous rites and ceremonies they were required to observe at their marriages and burials, at bed and board, at home and abroad, nay, even in ploughing, sowing, and reaping; so numerous were these observances, that they took up half their time, and as burdensome as they were numerous. Well might the apostle here call it a yoke of bondage, and elsewhere, viz. Acts xv. 10. "A yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear." Note, 2. The happy liberty and freedom from this intolerable yoke, purchased by Christ, for the Christian church, Christ has made us free; He, by his obedience and death, has purchased this happy freedom for us, a freedom from ceremonial bondage, from sinful servitude and slavery: not from civil subjection, not from the yoke of new obedience, but from the obliging force of the ceremonial law, and the curse and irritating power of the moral law. Note, 3. The Christians' duty, with reference to this privilege, namely, to stand fast in the liberty which Christ has purchased for them, without obliging themselves to observe any part of the ceremonial law, which was now a servility perfectly unprofitable, and nothing else; stand fast in it; that is, maintain and defend it both in judgment and practice.

2 Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.

That is, "Behold I Paul, your apostle, do positively declare, and expressly tell you the Galatians, and all other Christians converted by me to Christianity, that if ye be circumcised, that is, join circumcision with the gospel as a thing necessary to justification and salvation, Christ's undertaking will profit you nothing, for, embracing circumcision after Christ's coming, is virtually to deny and disown that he is come, and in effect to denounce and disclaim him; because at his coming the promise was fulfilled, and circumcision of its own nature ceased." Learn hence, That for persons religiously to observe any of the rites of the ceremonial law, in obedience to any divine precept, or to join any thing with Christ, and faith in him, for the justification of a sinner before God, is a plain denial of Christ, and a disdaining of his ability and sufficiency to justify and save us: "If ye be circumcised, verily Christ shall profit you nothing."

3 ¶ For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.

He that urges the necessity of circumcision, is a debtor to the law in a double respect, namely, in regard of duty, and in regard of penalty: First, He is a debtor in regard of duty; because he that thinks himself bound to keep one part of the ceremonial law, doth hereby oblige himself to keep the whole ceremonial law, yea, and the whole moral law too, without deficiency, and that under the penalty of condemnation. Again, Secondly, As he is a debtor in point of duty, so he must needs be a debtor in regard of penalty, because he is not able to keep any part of it perfectly. Hence we may infer, 1. How endearing our obligations are to Christ, who as our Surety paid both these debts for us, namely, our debt of duty, and our debt of penalty to the law of God; by fulfilling all righteousness, he paid our debt of duty, and by suffering the punishment due to transgressors, he paid our debt of penalty.—We may also, 2. infer, That as he that is circumcised, is bound to keep the whole law; so he that is baptized, is obliged to obey all the commands of the gospel, to make conscience of the duties of both tables, as an argument of his sincerity, and as an ornament to his profession.

4 Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace.

Here another argument is used, to shew that believers are dead to the ceremonial law, and are by no means to expect justification by it: Whosoever of you, says the apostle, is justified by the law, that is, whoever seeks and endeavours to be so justified, (for in reality none can in that manner be justified,) Christ is become of no effect, unto such persons; that is, they renounce Christ, and disclaim benefit by his death: And they are fallen from grace; that is, fallen from Christianity, and the covenant of grace; they have forfeited the grace of the gospel, by cleaving to the ceremonial law; they are fallen from the doctrine of grace delivered in the gospel, and Christ is become of no effect unto them. Learn from hence, That such persons as do believe that faith in Christ alone is not sufficient to justification and acceptance with God, without the observation of the abrogated law, do in effect disown their relation to Christ, and disclaim all benefit by his death; Christ is become of none effect, &c.

5 For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith.

That is, "We Christians, we believers, through the Spirit which we have received, and not by legal observances, do hope both for such a righteousness as will denominate and constitute us righteous in the sight of God, and also for the crown of righteousness in heaven, which now we wait and hope for here on earth." Note, 1. That a believer does not value himself by what he has in hand, but by what he has in hope; his riches are not so much in present possession, as in future expectation: We wait for the hope; that is, for heaven, the good hoped for. Note, 2. That none have either a right to heaven, or can warrantably expect the enjoyments of heaven, who are destitute of righteousness; heaven is here called the hope of righteousness, that is, the rational hope and expectation of righteous persons only. Note, 3. That it is a righteousness made ours by faith, even the righteousness of the Mediator, which gives us the best title to, and the firmest ground to hope and wait for, the kingdom of heaven and eternal life. Note, 4. That it is the special work of the holy Spirit, to produce in us the graces of the Spirit, both faith and hope; faith to enable us to apprehend, and hope to enable us to wait for the crown of righteousness, even eternal glory: "We through the Spirit do wait for the hope of righteousness by faith."

6 For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love.

In Christ Jesus, that is, in the economy of Christ Jesus, under the gospel dispensation, in our state of Christianity, since Christ's manifestation in the flesh, "neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth any thing" with God, as to our acceptance with him, or reward from him: But the qualification now necessary to salvation under the gospel, is faith working by love; that is, such an effectual belief of future happiness purchased for us, and promised to us by Christ, as causes us to love and serve him, to trust in, and depend upon him for the same. Learn, 1. That although circumcision, and the rest of the Levitical ceremonies were once enjoined by God, and practised by the Jews as an acceptable service, and the neglect or contempt of them was a moral sin; yet since Christ's coming in the flesh, who was the substance of all those shadows, the command whereby they were enjoined did cease, and "neither circumcision, nor uncircumcision avail any thing" to salvation. Learn, 2. That though the ceremonial law be abolished, yet a believer under the gospel has work to do, a work of faith, and labour of love; for though faith alone justifieth us before God, yet it is not alone in the heart when it doth justify, but is always accompanied with the grace of love to God and our neighbour: For in Christ Jesus, no faith availeth any thing, but that which worketh by love.

7 Ye did run well: who did hinder you, that ye should not obey the truth?

Ye did run well: that is, in the race of Christianity; you set out well at first, and received the gospel in the plainness and simplicity of it, without any mixture of Jewish ceremonies: What hindered you? Who stopt you? Who drove you back from your belief of, and obedience to, the truth of the gospel, which you then received from me? Here note, 1. With what holy wisdom our apostle mixes commendations with his reproofs: At the same time that he reproves them for their present backsliding, he commends them for their former forwardness: Ye did run well. Note, 2. That ordinarily a Christian's first ways are his best ways, his first fruits his fairest fruits: "Jeoshaphat walked in the first ways of David his father," 2. Chron. xvii. 3. Commonly young converts are carried out with a greater measure of affection and zeal, and make a swifter progress in religion, than others do, at first, or they themselves do afterwards, when they are of older standing. These Galatians did run, yea, did run very well, at first, in the race of Christianity: Note, 3. That when a person's or a people's progress in Christianity is not answerable to their hopeful beginnings, it is matter of regret and grief to all beholders, as well as matter of reproach and shame to the persons themselves; Ye did run well, who did hinder you? Intimating, that this their defection and apostacy was no less matter of astonishment to St. Paul, than it was of rebuke and reproach to them.

8 This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you.

9 A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.

As if the apostle had said, "This Judaizing opinion and practice of yours, this persuasion of the necessity of your being circumcised, and obeying the law of Moses, this new doctrine, so contrary to the spirit of the gospel, and the design of Christianity was never taught you either by God or myself, or any other faithful minister of Jesus Christ, who first converted you to the faith; but it is a mere delusion of Satan, and his emissaries the false apostles: And do not think this a small matter; let not circumcision seem a little thing to you; and let not these judaizing teachers be disregarded by you as inconsiderable, because they are few in number, for they are like to leaven; and ye know very well that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump; intimating, that a few false teachers, and a little of error and false doctrine, crept into the congregation and church of Christ, may do unspeakable mischief, by speedily infecting the whole church, as a little leaven (to which error is compared) leaveneth the whole lump."

10 I have confidence in you through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwise minded: but he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be.

Observe here, 1. The apostle's holy confidence, grounded upon charity, that through the Lord, that is, through the Lord's assisting his endeavours, and through the Lord's blessing upon their serious consideration of what he had written to them, they would be reclaimed from their errors, and brought to be of the same mind with himself. Where note, How the holy and zealous apostle was divided betwixt hope and fear concerning these men; he feared the worst of these Galatians, and yet hoped the best; "I have confidence in you through the Lord." It is a fault in the ministers of the gospel, when they despair of men too soon, when they cease or slacken their endeavours for their people's good, looking upon them as resolutely bent upon, and judiciously given up unto all evil. Though our apostle here had not a confidence of faith, or full persuasion, yet he had a confidence of charity, which caused him to hope that they would be like-minded with himself: "I have confidence in you through the Lord, that you will be no otherwise minded." Observe, 2. With what a holy caution, as well as Christian prudence and charity, our apostle applies himself unto them; declaring that though he hoped they might be reclaimed from their error, yet lest they should conclude their error not to be very dangerous, he shews them his just indignation against it, by denouncing deserved punishments against those that seduced them into it: "He that troubleth you, shall bear his own judgment," his condemnation due to him in hell without repentance, which is supposed in all threatenings. For the condition of conditional threatenings, though it is not always expressed, yet it is to be understood. Observe, 3. The universality of the threatening; "He shall bear his own judgment whosoever he be; let him be who he will or what he will; who he will for abilities and parts, what he will for power or reputation; whoever he is, or whatsoever he be, he shall bear his judgment. Such is the exact justice of God, and such his impartiality in the exercise of it, that he will suffer no impatient transgressor to escape his indignation, whoever he is, without respect of persons; "He that troubleth you, shall bear his own judgment, whosoever he be."

11 And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased.

Our apostle, in these words, signifies to us, that some of the Judaizing teachers had suggested to the Galatians, as if he himself had preached elsewhere the doctrine of circumcision, and also practised the duty of circumcision (by circumcising Timothy) which here he opposes; "True, he did circumcise Timothy, but it was only to avoid offending the weak Jews, not out of any opinion which he had touching the necessity of circumcision: Therefore, to discover to them the falsehood of that suggestion, he declares, that if he would have preached circumcision, he might have escaped persecution; the Jews were his persecutors, looking upon him as an apostate from their holy religion, for preaching up the abolishment of the Mosaic law. Where observe, That the Jews, who looked upon themselves to be the people, yea, the peculiar and only people of God, and accounted all others contemptible and profane, were yet far greater persecutors of Christ and his apostles, than the blind and barbarous heathen; and all this out of zeal for God and his law: "Why do I yet suffer persecution?" implying, that the Jews did persecute him, and that his not preaching circumcision, was the cause why they did so. He adds, "Then is the offence of the cross ceased." By the cross, may be understood, either, 1. The doctrine of the cross; the doctrine of the gospel; and then the sense is, the Jews would not have taken such offence at my preaching the gospel, as they do, were it not because by it, circumcision and the whole frame of the old legal administration are laid aside: Or else, 2. By the cross, may be understood the afflictions and sufferings which he underwent for the sake of Christ and his holy religion; and the sense then is this: Verily, all my sufferings had long since been at an end, would I but have yielded the Jews this point, that "Christians are obliged to circumcision, and to yield obedience to the law of Moses:" would I grant them this, my sufferings would soon be at an end: but my daily persecutions are evident demonstrations that I do not preach up circumcision; for had I so done, the offence of the cross had long since ceased. Learn hence, That the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ will not, dare not, conceal any part of the necessary truth, when the imminent hazard of people's salvation calls for the preaching of it, though the embittered enemies of religion should raise against them the fiercest persecutions for the same: "If I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution?"

12 I would they were even cut off which trouble you.

The apostle's meaning is, "That it were very fit, were it seasonable; that those which had thus seduced them, should be excommunicated and cut off from the church's communion." Where note, 1. How implicitly and interpretatively St. Paul compares these seducers to rotten members, which are and ought to be cut off, lest the gangrene overspread the whole body; I would they were cut off; implying, that like rotten members they deserved it, and the church's safety called for it, would her then circumstances admit of it. Note, 2. That in the very expression here used by St. Paul, of cutting off, there seems to be an allusion to the practice of circumcision, which is a cutting off the fore-skin of the flesh, and throwing it away. Now, says the apostle, I wish that these Judaizing teachers, that urge you to be circumcised; that is, to cut off and cast away the fore-skin of your flesh, I wish that they might be cut off as superfluous flesh, and cast out of the fellowship and communion of the church. Yet note, 3. The apostle doth rather declare what such seducers deserve, than actually inflict the censure itself; he satisfieth himself, with an affectionate wish, lest the number of the seduced being great, and perhaps the seducers not a few, they should be hardened rather than reformed, and the ordinance itself exposed; "I would they were even cut off, &c."

13 ¶ For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another.

Our apostle having finished the former part of the chapter, which contains an exhortation "to stand fast in that liberty which Christ had purchased for them;" he now enters upon the second part of it, namely, to caution them against abusing of their Christian liberty, and by no means to apprehend or suppose as if they were thereby freed from all obligation to serve God or man, in the duties particularly required of them. Brethren, says he, ye are called unto liberty; that is, to the enjoyment of evangelical liberty, which consists in a freedom from the obligation of the ceremonial law, and the curse of the moral law: Use it then so as not to abuse it; use it neither to sin nor scandal; not to sin, to allow yourselves the least liberty in indulging any carnal lust, or sinful affection, nor yet to scandalize the weak, who at present scruple the forsaking of circumcision, and the rest of the ceremonial rites; "Use not your liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but in love to serve one another." Learn hence, 1. That our liberty and freedom, purchased for us by Christ, doth not dissolve any tie or obligation which we lie under, either to God or man; the yoke of duty is very consistent with our Christian liberty. Learn, 2. That one of the great occasions of the sins we commit in the course of our lives, is the too free use of our Christian liberty. The using our liberty to the utmost pitch and extent of that which we call lawful, is the occasion of our running into that which is certainly sinful. Religion certainly allows us all reasonable liberty in the gratification of our natural appetites and passions; but all excesses and immoderate liberties are forbidden by religion. And accordingly, one good rule for securing ourselves from falling into sin, in the using our Christian liberty, is this, namely, That in matters of duty, we should rather do too much, than too little: But in matters of indifferency, we should rather take too little of our liberty than too much. For instance, prayer and almsgiving are indispensable duties; but how oft we should pray, and how much we should give, is not positively declared; in this case, to pray very frequently, and to give alms very liberally and largely, is our wisdom and duty; no damage will come by doing too much, but both damage and danger will accrue by doing too little. Learn, 3. That it is not sufficient, in order to the right use of our christian liberty, that we do not from thence take occasion to sin ourselves; but we ought to take care, lest by any indiscreet use of our own liberty, we give offence, and minister occasion of sin and stumbling unto others. This truth is implied in the second injunction, By love serve one another.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

Here our apostle enforces the foregoing exhortation to love and serve one another, with a forcible argument or motive, namely, because love is the fulfilling of the law; that is, 1. It is the fulfilling of that part of the law which relates to our neighbour; all the moral law respecting our neighbour is fulfilled in that one word, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Or, 2. Love may be said to be the fulfilling of the law in general; for true and regular love to our neighbour supposes our love to God, springeth from it, and is an evidence of it; yea, the love of our neighbour is the perfecting and completing of our love to God, 1 John iv. 12. "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfect in us." Learn, That as love is a very comprehensive duty, comprising the inward affection as well as the outward action, so the word neighbour is of a very extensive consideration, and includes all persons, friend and foe, rich and poor, near and afar off; all that partake of humanity must be sharers in our charity: Our inward affection and goodwill must extend to all, though the outward expressions of it can reach but a very few. Thus the law is fulfilled in one word, when we love our neighbour as ourselves; not as we do (often) love ourselves, but as we should love ourselves, namely, with a wise and well-guided love.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another.

The apostle, to enforce the foregoing exhortation to mutual love, urges here the dangerous effects which their animosities and strifes, with their controversies and contentions, would most certainly produce: By biting one another, says he, ye will destroy and consume one another; where it deserves a serious remark, that St. Paul compares the enmities and animosities which were amongst them, upon the score of their differences in religion, to the bitings, rendings, and devourings, of wild beasts. If ye bite and devour one another; and give them timely notice of the fatal mischiefs and consequences that will follow thereupon, namely, a total devastation and inevitable consumption of the whole church, Take heed that ye be not consumed one of another. It is a true saying, Odia religionum sunt acerbissima; there is no such bitter hatred amongst men as upon the score of religion: as the zeal of the Jews would not suffer an uncircumcised person to live amongst them, so probably the zealous Judaizers in Galatia, would not suffer those who had cast off legal observances, to live quietly and peaceably by them; which might give occasion to these words of the apostle. If ye bite and devour one another, take heed ye be not consumed one of another. Learn hence, 1. That there have been, are, and will be differences about matters of religion, in the best and purest churches here on earth. Learn, 2. That these differences may and ought to be managed with great temper and charity. Learn, 3. That then contentions are highly uncharitable, and very sinful, when men bite and devour one another. Learn, 4. That such uncharitable contentions do prepare and make ready a people for utter destruction, If ye bite, &c.

16 This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

“To prevent the forementioned evils, as if the apostle had said, I advise and exhort you to walk in the spirit, that is according to the guidance and direction, according to the influence and motion, of the Holy Spirit speaking to you, in his word, and then you never will fulfil the lusts of the flesh; that is, you will never accomplish and bring into complete act (especially with deliberation and consent (the inordinate motions of corrupt nature.” Learn hence, That the more Christians set themselves to obey the new nature, and follow the motions of the Spirit of grace, the more will the power of indwelling sin and inbred corruption be mortified and kept under. This expression, Ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh, may be thought to import and imply these two things: 1. That an inward principle of grace in the heart, will give a check to sin in its first motions, and cause it oft times to miscarry in the womb, like an untimely birth, before it comes to its full maturity: It shall never gain the full consent of a gracious person's will, as it doth of an unregenerate person. 2. But if, notwithstanding all the opposition grace makes to hinder the production of sin, if it doth break forth into act, such acts of sin are not committed without reluctance and regret, and are followed with shame and sorrow; yea those very surprisals and captivities of sin at one time, are made cautions and warning to prevent it at another time: And thus they that walk in the Spirit, do not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

17 For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other: so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

These words are brought in as a special reason, why Christians should walk in the Spirit, that is, after the motions and guidances of God's Holy Spirit; because otherwise, the flesh will quickly prevail over them; for the flesh is continually lust-ing against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; that is, the evil inclinations of corrupt nature are continually struggling with, and striving against the good motions which the Holy Spirit of God stirreth up in us: And in like manner, the Spirit, or renewed nature, opposeth the motions of corrupt nature. For these two principles are contrary the one to the other; so that ye who are led by the Spirit, cannot act (with deliberation and consent) according to the flesh, nor can they that are led by the flesh, do the things which delight the Spirit. Learn hence, 1. That there is a diversity of principles in a Christian, flesh, and Spirit, there is a good principle, called Spirit, because the Spirit of God is the author of it; and a bad principle in us, which is called flesh, by which we are inclined to that which is evil. This is called flesh, to denote its intimacy with us; it is as dear to us as our flesh, to denote its dearthness to us; it is as dear to us as our own flesh, as dear as a right-hand or right-eye; and, to denote its continuance with us, as long as we carry flesh about us, so long will this principle of corrupt nature remain in us, and continue with us. Learn, 2. That the motions and inclinations in our nature to sin, do ever conflict and combat with, oppose and war against, the motions of God's Holy Spirit, exciting and inclining us to good: Though contraries cannot be together in the same subject in an intense, yet they may be together in a remiss degree. Learn, 3. The consequence and issue of this combat, we cannot do the things that we would, nor any thing as we would; we cannot perform any holy duty perfectly in this life. As soon may an imperfect father beget a perfect child, as we in our state of imperfection perform any duty free from sin. O what need, what great need then, have the best of saints, of the mediation and intercession of our Lord Jesus Christ, when they present any performed duty unto God! And what need also to watch our own hearts, when we are upon our knees, to fortify them against the incursions and disturbances of the flesh; seeing after all our care and vigilance in duty, we can none of us do the things that we would, nor any thing as we would!

18 But if ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law.

That is, if ye be under the guidance and government of the Holy Spirit of God, and that renewing principle of grace which he has produced in you, you are no longer under the law; that is, not under the moral law as a covenant of life for our justification, though under it as an eternal rule of living; not under the vindictive, though under the directive power of the law. So that the force of the apostle's argument seems to lie thus: "You are by the Spirit, by the spiritual dispensation of the gospel, free from the curse and terror of the moral law; how unreasonable then is it to suppose that you should be still subject to the ceremonial law? No; if you be led by the Spirit, neither the moral law shall condemn you, nor the ceremonial law oblige and bind you."

19 ¶ Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness.

20 Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, 21 Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things, shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

Our apostle having in the foregoing verses, exhorted the Galatians to walk in the Spirit, to be led and guided by the Spirit, and by no means to obey or fulfil the lusts of the flesh; he comes in these and the following verses, to discover how they might with certainty and assurance, know whether they were spiritual or carnal, whether the Spirit or the flesh had a prevalency in them, or dominion over them: Accordingly, he describes particularly the flesh and the Spirit, by their various and different effects, and gives us a catalogue of the one and the other; he reckons up no fewer than seventeen works of the flesh, all which, yea, any of which, continued in, and unrepented of, are damnable; after this, he enumerates nine special and gracious fruits of the Spirit, which qualify us for, and entitle us to the kingdom of heaven; The works of the flesh are manifest, &c. Here observe, 1. That sin is called a work, thereby intimating to us the labour and toil, the drudgery and pains, which sinners meet with in a sinful course: The ways of sin are very toilsome, although in their issue very unfruitful; sin is no pleasurable service, but a laborious servitude. Observe, 2. The apostle calls sin by the name of works, in the plural number, the works of the flesh; intimating, that sin never goes single, but has a dangerous train and retinue: He that yields himself a servant to one sin, shall soon find himself a slave to many. Observe, 3. That sin is called a work of the flesh, because most sins are committed by the flesh; the body is the soul's instrument, as well in the work of sin, as in the service of Christ: and the flesh is the object, about which these works are conversant, as well as the organ and instrument by which they are committed. Observe, 4. These works of the flesh are here said to be manifest: But how so? First, They are most of them manifestly condemned by the light of nature; a natural conscience in men startles at them at first, till by custom and frequent practice they become habitual and natural to them. Secondly, they are all of them manifest by the light of scripture; the word of God, which is in all our hands, condemns all these works of the flesh to the pit of hell. Observe, 5. The particular enumeration of the works of the flesh, here made by the apostle; adultery, or the defiling our neighbour's bed; fornication, or the unlawful mixture of single persons one with another; uncleanness, under which is comprehended all sorts of filthiness, and filthy lusts, whether natural or unnatural; lasciviousness, by which is meant all wanton behaviour, either in speech or action, tending to excite filthy desires, either in themselves or others; idolatry, whereby God is represented to corporeal eyes by pictures and images, and so brought down to human senses; properly, therefore, is idolatry, as such, called here a work of the flesh: Again, witchcraft, a devilish art, whereby some men and women, having made a compact with the devil, either expressly or implicitly, are enabled, with God's permission, and by the assistance of Satan, to produce effects beyond the ordinary course and order of nature, and these for the most part rather mischievous to others than beneficial to themselves; hatred, or a secret enmity in our hearts against our neighbour, either for real or apprehended injuries; variance, or outward contention by words or actions, arising from the forementioned enmity in the heart; emulations, or an inward grief or displeasure at some good in others, or done by others, which eclipses and overshadow us; wrath, or violent anger, and immoderate passion, depriving a man for the time of his reason, and transforming him into a beast; strife, or a litigious spirit, a continual proneness to quarrelling and contending; seditions; or rending of societies into factions, and dividing communities into parties; which dividing work, when it falls out in the state, is called sedition; when in the church, by the name of schism; heresies, or dangerous errors in the fundamental points of religion; not arising purely from mistakes of judgment, but from the espousing of false doctrines out of disgust or pride, or from worldly principles, to avoid persecution or trouble in the flesh; these may well be accounted carnal lusts, and called works of the flesh, although they be mental errors, and their first seat is in the understanding and judgment: envyings, a pestilent lust, which makes another's good our grief; our eyes smart at the sight of what another enjoys, though we have never the less, because another has more murders, that is, the executing of private revenge, by shedding of blood, and taking away our neighbour's life unjustly; drunkenness, revellings, the one is intemperance in drinking, the other an excess in eating; all sinful abuse of the creatures of God, which he has given, not barely for necessity, but delight, is censured here as a work of the flesh. Observe, 6. The solemn warning which the apostle gives the Galatians to watch against all these sins, and not indulge or allow themselves in the wilful commission of any one of them: I tell you, says he, that such shall not inherit the kingdom of God, but be eternally banished from him. Now from the whole, learn, 1. That the ministers of the gospel must not satisfy themselves barely to reprove and condemn sin in general, but must descend to particulars; though invectives against sin, at large, are of good use to expose the deformity of sin, yet, in order to the awakening of particular sinners, we must take into our consideration their particular sins, and endeavour to convince them of them, and turn them from them; so doth our apostle here, in the foregoing catalogue of vices. Learn, 2. That the members of Christ must acquaint their people, not only with the danger of allowing themselves in the grosser acts of sin, as adultery, fornication, drunkenness, and revellings, and such like, but also with the danger of indulging themselves in secret sins, heart sins, sins which the eye of the world can never accuse them of, but God will condemn them for; such are hatred, emulation, envy, &c. not only the outward act of sin, but the inward desire, is dangerous and damning. It is easy for a man to murder his neighbour, in the account of God, by a secret wish, and a passionate desire; he that hateth his brother is a murderer, and he that looks upon a woman unduly, is an adulterer in the sight of God. Learn, 3. That the ministers of Christ can never often enough warn sinners of the danger of sin, and continuance in it; we must do it over and over again; every sabbath, and every sermon, must ring a peal in the sinner's ears, of the fatal danger of a resolute impiety: Thus here, I tell you now, as I told you in time past, that they which do such things, shall not inherit, &c.

22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, faith, 23 Meekness, temperance: against such there is no law.

Observe here, 1. That the apostle, who called sin the work of the flesh, doth here call grace the fruit of the Spirit. Sin is a work of our own; it proceeds wholly from ourselves, our own depraved minds and wills, without the least co-operation of the Holy Spirit; he can neither be the author nor abettor of any thing that is evil. All sinful works are works of the flesh, and therefore our own works: but all graces accompanying salvation, are the fruit of God's Spirit: both because he is the author of them, and also, because they are so acceptable and pleasing unto him, even as fruit is unto our taste, and likewise so profitable and advantageous to ourselves. Where the flesh ruleth, there the work exceeds the fruit; and accordingly, without any mentioning of the fruit, they are called works of the flesh; but where the Spirit of God ruleth, there the fruit exceeds the work; and therefore, without ever mentioning the work, it is called the fruit of the Spirit. Observe, 2. That the works of the flesh are spoken of as many; but the fruit of the Spirit is spoken of as one, many works, but one fruit. There is such a connection and concatenation of graces, that although they are distinct in their natures, yet are they inseparable in their subject, pull one link of a chain, and you pull all: so he that has any one spiritual grace in reality, or at least in eminency, cannot be utterly destitute of any other; for where the Holy Spirit is, there cannot be a total defect of any holy grace. Observe, 3. That the works of the flesh are said to be manifest, ver. 19; but no such thing is here affirmed of the fruit of the Spirit. Alas! God knows, the works of the flesh are but every where too manifest; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, drunkenness, do so abound in all places, that you can scarce look beside them: But the fruits of the Spirit are not so; love, peace, gentleness, meekness, these are very thin in the world; hips and haws grow in every hedge, when choicer fruits are but in some few gardens. Observe, 4. How St. Paul enumerates here nine special fruits of the Spirit; not as if there were more, but because these here mentioned stand in a direct opposition to the former vices recited in the foregoing verses. The first sweet fruit of the Spirit, taken notice of here by the apostle, is love; an holy affection in the soul, whereby a person is carried forth to love God, primarily and chiefly for himself, and his neighbour for God's sake: Joy, delight in doing our duty, and rejoicing in the expectation of the reward for well-doing: Peace, inward peace with God and conscience, and outward peace with one another: Long-suffering, an inclination of mind disposing us to bear injuries patiently, and to forgive them readily: Gentleness, or affability and courtesy in conversation, a sweetness of temper, which renders us greatly useful, as well as exceedingly delightful to mankind: Goodness, a disposition inclining us to communicate what we have and are to others, and to do all the possible good we can in our respective places and stations: Faith, or fidelity towards men, in our promises, and in all our actions, speaking exact truth: Meekness, this is threefold, a natural meekness, which is the product of the temperament of the humours in the body, a rare felicity; there is also a moral meekness, which is the product of education and counsel, this is an amiable virtue; and there is a spiritual meekness that orders the persons according to the divine rule, the holy law of God; this a noble and divine grace, which attracts the estimation of God, and the admiration of men: Temperance, a sober use of meat, drink, and every thing wherein our senses are gratified or delighted. Observe, 5. A special privilege belonging to all those who are possessed of the forementioned fruits of the Spirit, and that is, exemption from the law: Against such there is no law; that is, no law to compel, no law to accuse or condemn them; for the law enjoins them, and encourages the practise and performance of them. Learn hence, 1. That the best, yea, the only way to have the fruits of the Spirit thrive in our hearts, is first to mortify the works of the flesh; weeds and thistles must be rooted up before grain can grow or thrive. As the corruption of one form is the production of another, so the mortification of sin makes way for the plantation of the fruits of the Spirit. Learn, 2. That moral virtues are the fruits of the Spirit, and commence Christian graces when they are acted by faith in Christ, influenced by love unto him, and aiming at the highest of ends, the glory of God and our salvation. Learn, 3. That if we compare the fruits of the Spirit with the works of the flesh, there will appear so much beauty in the one; and such real deformity in the other, so much satisfaction in the one, and such disquiet and vexation in the other, that besides the difference between them in their original and event, the former considerations are abundantly sufficient to engage our love to the fruits of the Spirit, and to excite our hatred to the works of the flesh.

24 And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts.

They that are Christ's, that is, they that are truly his followers, and sincere disciples, they have crucified, that is, subdued, and in some degree mortified and put to death their fleshly corruptions, their carnal lusts and sinful affections and passions. They did, by baptism, engage themselves to die unto sin; and the regenerate have done it in some measure; they have crucified the flesh: Yet we must not understand this of a total, plenary, and final crucifixion, but incohabitive only; and they are said to have done it, because they are daily doing of it, in proposito, voto, et conatu, in resolution, in desire, and endeavour. And by affections, we are not to understand natural, but inordinate affections; and by crucifixion, is not to be understood a total extinction of sin, but a deposing of it from its regency and dominion in the soul of the sinner; yet as death surely, though slowly, follows crucifixion, so likewise doth sin live in the believer a dying life, and dies a lingering, but a certain death; They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts. Learn hence, 1. That there are a peculiar people which are Christ's, that have special interest in him, union and communion with him; they that are Christ's, not by an external profession only, but by an internal implantation into him by faith. Learn, 2. That all such as thus have an interest in Christ, are daily crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts. The death of sin, is here compared to our Saviour's crucifixion: 1. To shew the conformity there is betwixt the death of sin, and the death of Christ. Did Christ die a painful, shameful, lingering, and accursed death? So dies sin in the soul of a believer. There is a gradual weakening of the power of sin in him; sin is dying, as he, but it is a long time a dying. 2. To denote the principal mean and instrument of our mortification, namely, the death of Christ; by virtue whereof, believers do crucify their corrupt affections; the great arguments to mortification being drawn from the sufferings of Christ for sin. Learn, 3. That the work of mortification (called here, tropically, a crucifixion) strikes not only at all sin, but at the root of all sin; it spares none, neither the flesh nor any of its affections and lusts do escape: root and branches, head and members, the old man is crucified, and the body of sin destroyed, and the axe of mortification laid to the root of every sin and sinful affection. In this manner, do they that are Christ's crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts.

25 If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit.

If we live in the Spirit; that is, if the Spirit lives in us, if the Holy Spirit of grace be the principle of our life, let us walk in the Spirit; that is, let us live and act under the conduct and guidance, under the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit; let us do the works of the Spirit, let us bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, and let us live a spiritual life; let our dealings be about spiritual and heavenly things, and our chiefest delight be in such things; and by these spiritual delights and exercises we shall every day become more and more spiritual, and in the account of God be esteemed and reckoned amongst the number of those that walk in the Spirit. Let us then evidence the life of grace in ourselves, by exercising that grace in the life of communion with God: This seems to be the importance of this remarkable place, If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit. Here we may note, 1. That there must be a principle of spiritual life, before there can be any spiritual motion and exercise; we must first live in the Spirit, and the Spirit live in us, before we can possibly walk in the Spirit: the child must live before it can walk. Note, 2. That where there is a principle of grace and spiritual life in the heart, there will be the actings and exercise of grace in the life;

If we live in the Spirit, we shall walk in the Spirit. Ezek. xxxvi. 27. I will put my Spirit within them, and cause them to walk in my statutes. An holy heart will be attended with an holy life, and a good conscience accompanied with a good conversation; spiritual life will produce spiritual motion.

26 Let us not be desirous of vain-glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

Our apostle closes this excellent chapter with an exhortation to the Galatians to avoid all pride and ambition, all vain-glorious boastings and ostentation, not provoking one another by their contentions, not envying either the gifts or graces of God bestowed on others. Learn hence, 1. That there is and may be in all men, a desire of applause and just commendation: All men pretend to a share in reputation, and not love to see it monopolized and ingrossed by any person. Learn, 2. That a vain-glorious desire of applause and reputation is sinful, when we seek what we do not deserve, or for more than we deserve, or seek more to be applauded by men, than to be approved by God. Learn, 3. That ambition is usually attended with envy and contention; no sin goes single, but has a train of followers; Let us not be desirous of vain-glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

CHAP. VI.

Our apostle being now come to the concluding chapter of this excellent epistle to the Galatians, exhorts them to the practise of several important duties, in order to an holy life, which was so necessary to evidence the truth of their conversion to Christianity; and so concludes his epistle with a solemn protestation of his sincere affection towards them.

BRETHREN, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye, which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness: considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted.

The first exhortation here given, is, how they should carry themselves one towards another, upon supposition of their scandalous falling either into error, or into sin, namely, not with rigour and severity, but with mildness and lenity: If any be overtaken in a fault, &c. Here note, 1. An evil supposed, namely, that the wisest, the holiest, and the best of men may be overtaken in a fault, and surprised by a temptation: If any man be overtaken; implying that any be so: that sin, or that misery, which befalls some men, may befall others, any others, yea, all others: for all are partakers of the same frail nature, subject to the working of the same corruption, and liable to the danger of the same temptation. Note, 2. The duty directed to, with relation to these persons, who trip and fall either into sin, or into error, restore him, set him right, put him in joint again; a metaphor taken from bone-setters, who place dislocated bones and set broken bones, with great tenderness; Those three things, which we may say are necessary in a bone-setter, are absolutely needful in a reprover; namely, an eagle's eye, to discern where the fault lies; a lion's heart, to deal faithfully and freely with the faults; and a lady's hand, to use them gently and tenderly. Note, 3. The persons particularly named, who are and ought to manage this duty of brotherly reproof, ye that are spiritual : you that are the governors of the church, say some ; you that are endowed with spiritual gifts, say others ; the prophets among you, who perform all spiritual offices for you, let them rebuke offenders. Others, by spiritual, understand such as had received larger measures of the gifts and graces of the Spirit than others : Let such as are strong bear with the infirmities of the weak. Note, 4. The manner how this duty of fraternal corruption, or brotherly reproof is, and ought to be managed, namely, with patience and meekness, not with severity and roughness ; Ye that are spiritual restore him in the spirit of meekness ; if the proofs you give others be imbittered with your own passions, they will spit them out of their mouths ; yea, spit them back upon your very faces. Note, 5. The argument to excite to all this ; namely, the consideration of your own personal frailty, and great liableness to fall into temptation ourselves, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted : Who knows what a feather the strongest saint and stoutest Christian may prove in the wind of temptation ? Therefore, let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall, and exercise great candour and Christian tenderness towards them that are fallen before him. Hodie, mihi, cras tibi. From the whole learn, 1. That fraternal corruption, or brotherly reproof, is a great duty which Christians mutually owe to one another, when they either run into error, or fall into sin : If any of you be overtaken, restore him. Learn, 2. That although it be the duty of private Christians, to admonish and reprove one another, as being members one of another, yet those that are spiritual, Christ's ministers, the guides of his church, the stewards of his household, ought in special to look upon it as their obliged duty to reprove and rebuke with a long-suffering and gentleness. Learn, 3. That rigour and severity, expressed towards the failings and escapes of others, will rather exasperate than reclaim them : we must deal as gently with a fallen brother, as with a broken bone ; if we do not temper our reproofs with meekness, they will certainly prove successful. Learn, 4. That the holiest saint and most spiritual man, here on earth, is within the reach of temptation, and may possibly fall himself ; therefore ought to treat a fallen brother with great tenderness and regard.

2 Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

This is a general precept, and requires us to sympathize with our brethren in all their sorrows and sufferings, and to bear a part with them under the load and burden of oppressive wants and necessities ; particularly, bearing with the weaknesses and infirmities of our brethren, seems here to be recommended to our care and practice in the apostolical injunction. Bear ye, one another's burdens. The encouragement to which duty follows, so shall we fill the law of Christ ; that is, the law of love, the moral law, which enjoins us to love our neighbour as ourselves. But why is this called the law of Christ, when it was long before Christ ; yea, before Moses, and as old as Adam himself, being part of the law of nature, which was written in Adam's heart before there was any written bible ? I answer, the law of love is very properly called the law of Christ ; because he revived it, rescued it, recommended and enforced it, frequently urged it upon his followers, and exemplified it in his own life and conversation, therefore called a new commandment, and his commandment ; This is my commandment, &c. A new commandment I give you, that ye love one another. St. John xiii. 34. (See the note there.) Learn hence, 1. That to have our ear, our heart, and our hand open to our brethren in distress, is a necessary Christian duty : 'Our ear open to their mournful complaints, our heart open to sympathize with their necessities and wants. This is a burden which the law of Christ has laid upon us. Bear ye one another's burdens. Learn, 2. To bear a part of our brethren's burdens with a compassionate heart, and helping hand, is a fulfilling of the law of Christ ; because much love, which is the fulfilling of the law, goes out, and is acted in the bearing of it ; so faithful the law of Christ.

3 For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself.

4 But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another.

5 For every man shall bear his own burden.

The apostle is still directing the Galatians, and enforcing them to express great lenity and tenderness towards such of their brethren as had fallen into sin and error, and particularly cautions them, 1. To beware of the sin of pride and self-conceit, and to abound in the grace of humility and modesty : intimating to us that pride, and an high opinion of ourselves, are the certain causes of censoriousness and rash judging of others, and the true reason why we despise and glory over an offending brother, instead of pitying of him, sympathizing with him, and endeavouring to restore him : He that thinks himself to be something here, is the man that hath proud thoughts of himself, who thinks himself more righteous and holy, more steady and steadfast, than his fallen brother ; and conceits he has more power to preserve himself than others ; such an one thinks himself to be some great thing ; when, alas ! every man is nothing ; and the best of men having nothing but what the grace of God confers upon them, 2. Cor. xii. 11. Observe, 2. How the apostle strikes at the root of the forementioned sin of pride and self-conceit ; namely, the comparing themselves with those who are worse than themselves, which is very apt to stir up pride and arrogance ; to cure which he directs them to compare themselves with those who are better than themselves, and to try and prove their own works by the rule of the word of God ; and not by the example and practice of others ; and so shall they find matter of rejoicing in themselves, in the testimony of God, and the silent applause of their own consciences, without borrowing matter of rejoicing from the failings and infirmities of other persons. Observe, 3. The argument or motive used by the apostle to enforce upon every man the duty of trying his own work, rather than to be prying into the infirmities of others ; because when he cometh to judgment, every man must bear his own burden, or give an account of himself and his own actions to God: who will then absolve or condemn men, not as they have done better or worse than others, but as they shall be then found in themselves, absolutely considered. It is a great error for any man to measure himself by the measures of other men, either by their perfections, or by their imperfections. To conclude our estate safe, because we are not so bad as others, or un-safe, because we have not attained to the perfections of others, is alike dangerous; God will not proceed by this rule, no more should we: every man that appears before him, shall bear his own burden, and answer for his own sins. Here note, 1. That how light soever men make of sin in the commission of it, it will be found heavy and burdensome when they come before God to account for it: He shall bear his own burden. Note, 2. That the righteous God, in the great judgment, will call no man to account for the sins of others, unless he has some ways been accessory to them; but every one shall bear his own burden, both of guilt and punishment.

6 ¶ Let him that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things.

In this and the following verses, our apostle enters upon a new exhortation, and that is, to stir up the Galatians to liberality and beneficence, upon every fitting occasion, to be ready to distribute, willing to communicate, and to do good unto all men. And because it is highly probable, that by reason of the prevalency of error amongst them, and the number of false teachers found with them, that the Galatians' love to the word, and to the ministers and dispensers of it, was grown cold; he first begins to stir up their liberality towards their teachers, saying, Let him that is taught in the word of the gospel, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all such good things as he stands in need of. Learn hence, 1. That the wisdom of God hath seen it fit to teach men by the ministry of man, not by his own immediate voice; this we cannot bear: nor by the glorious angels, these would terrify rather than teach us; but by men like ourselves doth the great God instruct us: He has appointed some to teach, and obliged others to be taught; but the pride of man is grown to that pitch in our days, that almost every one thinks himself sufficient to teach, and few have humility enough to be taught. Learn, 2. That it is the special duty of ministers, not only to teach, but to teach the word: Let him that is taught in the word, that is the written word, as dictated by the Holy Ghost, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things. Our business is not to go into the pulpit, and read a lecture to our people out of Aristotle's ethics, or Seneca's morals, much less to load them with the burden of unwritten traditions, but to make known a crucified Saviour to them, and the way to eternal salvation by him. Learn, 3. That seeing the ministers of Christ are to give themselves wholly to the work of teaching, &c. without being entangled with the affairs of this life; the people whom they teach, and amongst whom they spend their time and strength, are obliged, by common equity, as well as by the command of God, to allow them a comfortable subsistence; and, if able, an honourable maintenance. Let him that is taught, communicate to him that teacheth in all good things. Learn, 4. That the church maintenance, is only due to such ministers as are apt to teach, that labour in the word themselves: None have a right to the church's salary, which do not perform the church's service.

Let such laymen as by their impropriations take away the vicar's bread, and such clergymen as eat the sweat of their curate's brow, consider how they will answer it at the bar of God.

7 Be not deceived. God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.

8 For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption: but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

Here the apostle offers several arguments to consideration, for exciting them to the forementioned duty of liberality and Christian beneficence in general, and to the ministers of the word in particular: and the first of them is taken from God's omniscieny, who takes notice of all the petty and pitiful pretences, pleas, and excuses, which men make, why they cannot be so kind as they would be to the ministers and members of Jesus Christ. Alas! their own wants are many. (but it is their lusts that make them so;) their burdens are great upon them, and they must provide and take care for themselves: But, says the apostle, through you may, with these lying pretences, cheat yourselves, and mock your ministers and poor neighbours, yet God is not, will not, cannot be mocked. There is no juggling with God, no deceiving of his eye; man never deceives himself so much, as when he thinks to deceive God in the least: Man may be mocked and deceived by man, but God can never be mocked by man. Observe, 2. St. Paul compares charity and Christian bounty, to seed sown, and assures us, that the crop we reap shall be answerable, both in quality and kind, and also in measure and degree, to the seed we now sow; Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. Learn, That every man's harvest hereafter, shall be according to his seed-time here. The actions of this life, are as seed sown for the life to come; if the husbandman sow tares, he must not expect to reap wheat: For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. Observe, 3. How the apostle doth amplify in particular, what he had before asserted in general; namely, that such as the seed is, such will the harvest be: he that soweth to the flesh, that is, plainly, he that spends his substance upon his lusts, seeking no more than the gratification of his sensual desires, shall reap corruption; that is, a perishing satisfaction only at present, and eternal perdition afterwards: But he that sows to the Spirit, he that improves his estate for God, for the support of his gospel, for the sustenance of his members, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. The Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, will also raise us up at the great day, and reward our present parting with the things of this world, which we cannot keep, with eternal life, which we shall never lose.

9 ¶ And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.

10 As we have, therefore, opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

The holy apostle, in these words, exhorts the Galatians, and in them all Christians, to the practice of one of the most important parts and duties of the Christian religion, namely, that of doing good one to another: And he doth not barely excite us to the duty, but he exhorts us also to an unwearied diligence in the doing of it, according to our ability, and opportunity. In the exhortation before us, observe, 1. The grand comprehensive duty we are exhorted to, well-doing and an unwearied diligence therein. This comprehends all those ways and means whereby we may be beneficial and useful one to another, both to soul and body, in spiritual and temporal good things, and promote both the present comfort and future happiness of each other. Observe, 2. The extent and latitude of the duty, with respect to its objects, which is all mankind: Let us do good unto all. The Galatians were in danger of judaizing in their practice, as well as in their doctrines; that is, of loving none but themselves and their own countrymen: For the Jews were grown so sour and churlish in their temper, that they would not do the least office of kindness to any that was not of their own nation. Therefore, St. Paul here exhorts them to extend their charity universally to all and every one that is of the same nature with themselves. Observe, 3. The special and particular objects of our charity, the household of faith: Do good to all, but especially to them. By the household of faith, as appears by the context, ver. 6, are primarily meant the ministers of God, the teachers of his word; these are God's domestic servants. Wherever there has been a people, there has been a religion professed, such as it was; wherever there has been a religion professed, there have been persons consecrated and set apart to attend the service of that religion, and a maintenance provided for those attendants; It was so by God's appointment under the law, and by Christ's under the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 14. But farther, by the household of faith, we are to understand the whole collective body of believing Christians, all the members of Christ's mystical body; such are very dear to God, and ought to be so to us. Observe, 4. The subjects of this duty, or whom it doth eminently concern, all Christians; As we have opportunity let us do good; that is, every one of us; for verily there is no condition in the world so mean and despicable, but it yields persons an opportunity one way or other of doing good, if not by their purse, yet at least by their prayers, and by their example. Observe, 5. The frequency of the duty, As we have opportunity: that is, as often as the occasions of doing good are presented to us, and as long as ability for doing good is found with us. Some men defer doing good till they come to die, till they come to make their will, that unwilling will in which they give God a small pittance of his own, because they can keep it no longer: they will repent when they are dying, and be charitable after they are dead. Good God! how unwilling men are to part with either their money or their sins, as long as they can keep them! But verily a death-bed charity may be as unavailable as a death-bed repentance. The rule is, As we have opportunity; that is, as often as an opportunity is offered. Let us decline no opportunity by getting out of the way, with some, when a work of charity presents itself unto us. Observe, 6. The measure of this duty, as we have ability let us do good unto all; that is, proportionably to what God has given us, let us be willing to give to others: God could easily level the world, and give every man alike, but he is pleased to give some more than others, on purpose to try their graces; the charity and bounty of the rich, the faith and patience of the poor. And verily an estate above what sufficeth our occasions and necessities, is no further a blessing to us, than as it puts an opportunity into our hands of doing more good than others. Observe, 7. An unwearied perseverance of going good required at our hands, Let us not be weary in well-doing; though we have done much good, there is room for more; new objects will appear, new occasions will arise, new opportunities will present themselves unto us. Let us never think we can do enough, much less too much good; the best of beings are most unwearied in well-doing. God, Christ, the holy angels, are never weary of this blessed work: let us never be weary in imitating them in that which is their highest and their chiefest excellency and perfection. Observe, 8. The argument and encouragement to the cheerful discharge of this duty, in due season we shall reap, if we faint not; that is, sooner or later, either in this world, or in the next, or in both, we shall certainly receive the reward of well-doing. We shall reap, but what? Answer, We shall reap the blessing of God upon all we have, are, and do; we shall reap the benefit and blessing of their prayers, to whom we extend our charity: we shall reap the highest pleasure and satisfaction in our own minds of doing good, with which no sensual pleasure can be compared. The reflection upon any good we have done, is a perpetual spring of peace, and pleasure to us: the thoughts of it lie even and easy in our minds, and the remembrance of it refreshes the soul with a strange kind of delight and joy. But, Lord! what tongue can utter, or what heart conceive that vast and unspeakable reward, which an unwearied diligence in well-doing will meet with in the other world? It will plead for us at the day of judgment, and procure at the hands of a merciful God, for the rich merits of our Lord Jesus Christ, a glorious recompence at the resurrection of the just: And proportionable to the degrees of our charity, will be the dispensations of this reward. From the whole learn, 1. That great are the obligations which all Christians do lie under of doing good one to another, according to their abilities and opportunities.—Learn, 2. That great is the reward of well-doing, which Christians may eye as a motive to an unwearied diligence, and unfainting perseverance in well-doing.

11 Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand.

It is very probable, that St. Paul ordinarily did only dictate, and that some other person wrote his epistles, as that to the Romans, wrote by Tertius, Rom. xvi. 22. Sometimes he only wrote the salutation, and subscribed the epistle with his own hand, as 1 Cor. xvi. 22. but here he tells the Galatians, that he wrote this epistle to them all with his own hand, having never wrote so large an epistle wholly with his own hand to any church as he did to them. This he did for two reasons, 1. To testify the fervency of his affection towards them, and to insinuate how much he loved them. 2. To evidence the sincerity of his endeavours for their present and future happiness: To accomplish these ends, he adjudged no pains too great. From whence learn, 1. That the faithful ministers of Christ will stick at no pains, but encounter with all difficulties, to advance the good of souls in general, and to reduce an erroneous and wandering people in particular to the obedience of the gospel. Thus, this great apostle, though he had upon him the care of all the churches, and consequently a multiplicity of business, many avocations, and a multitude of distractions; yet, in order to the reclaiming of these Galatians, who were deeply tinctured with error, as well as dangerously tainted with sin, he redeems time for, and undergoes the fatigue and trouble of writing this whole epistle to them with his own hand: You see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand. Learn, 2. That it neither savours of pride nor vain-glory in the ministers of the gospel, if upon occasion, though sparingly, they make known to the world the great pains they have taken for promoting the good of their people, that so they may be excited the more to bring forth fruit answerable to the cost and culture which the ministers of Christ have expended upon them: St. Paul here sticks not to tell the Galatians, and the whole world, the pains he had been at in writing this large epistle with his own hand to them: yet it was not to commend himself but to excite and encourage them.

12 As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised: only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ.

13 For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh.

Here our apostle returns to the description which he had before given of the false apostles, who, though they urged the necessity of circumcision, yet it was not with any sincerity of intention: It was, first, to make a fair shew in the flesh; that is, to make a fair outward shew of religion, an high pretence to holiness, by observing circumcision, and the other abrogated rites of the ceremonial law: And, secondly, This pretended zeal of theirs proceeded from pusillanimity and fear, lest they should suffer persecution from the Jews, for preaching the doctrine of the gospel, called here the cross of Christ, because it treats of a crucified Christ. Now the fury of these persecutors was abated towards those that preached circumcision, but enraged abundantly against those who preached circumcision down. Observe farther, How well the apostle makes good his charge against these false apostles, the Judaizing doctors, that they urged the necessity of circumcision insincerely, and for base ends; namely, because they made no conscience to keep the law themselves, but could dispense with circumcision well enough, if they were amongst their friends, but pleaded for it when in fear of their persecuting enemies: Thus they became all things to all men, but it was to save themselves. And, lastly, He assures them, that they urged circumcision upon them, that they might glory in their flesh; that is, might pride themselves that you were become their converts, by being circumcised at their persuasion, and be able to boast of the multitudes of their proselytes, who received circumcision at their instigation, and carried it as a mark of their instruction.—Learn hence, 1. That designing hypocrites do constantly pretend high to religion, but they evermore seek themselves, under a pretence of acting for God and his glory: they that constrain you to be circumcised, make a fair shew in the flesh. Learn, 2. That though it is our duty to eschew persecution when we can fairly avoid it, yet we must not part with the least iota of truth, or espouse the smallest error, to avoid the sharpest persecution; they constrain you to be circumcised, lest they should suffer persecution. Learn, 3. That men who talk loud of religion, and pretend high to it, who preach it to, and press it upon others, but do not conscientiously practice it themselves, it is an evident demonstration, that they are men of corrupt minds, of profligate consciences, that do not believe themselves; for he only believes what he says, that lives as he doth believe: Neither they themselves who are circumcised, says the apostle, keep the law. Learn, 4. That there is nothing which false teachers and erroneous seducers do so much glory of, magnify themselves by, and pride themselves in, as in the number of their proselytes and converts, which they look upon as so many trophies of their victory, and speaking proofs of their unparalleled abilities: they constrain men to be circumcised, that they may glory in their flesh.

14 But God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world:

Having shewn what it was that the false apostles gloried in, he next shews what it was that he himself gloried in; namely, in the cross of Christ; that is, in his preaching Christ crucified, and the necessity of faith in him, who died as a sacrifice upon the cross. The cross of Christ is taken three ways in scripture, materially, metaphorically, and metonymically; the material cross of Christ, is that which he died upon at Jerusalem: This the church of Rome glories in greatly, but not the apostle.—The metaphorical cross of Christ, is afflictions, Luke ix. 28. Let him take up the cross, that is, submit to any afflictions: God oft-times sanctifies this cross, for the crucifying the hearts of his people to the world: But the cross of Christ is taken metonymically for the gospel, the doctrine of the gospel, or of him that died upon the cross. Now, Christianity, or the doctrine of the gospel, crucifies us to the world: First, By discovering to us the great vanity and emptiness of the world, and all the perishing satisfactions of it: Secondly, by propounding such arguments to crucify the world, as were never heard of from all the philosophers and wise men that ever lived in the world; namely, arguments taken from the glory of God, from the death of Christ, from the dignity of the soul, &c. Learn hence, That such a Christian as doth experimentally find his heart and affections daily more and more crucified to the world, by the cross of Christ, has unspeakable cause and reason sufficient for spiritual glorying and rejoicing. Quest. Wherein consists not our crucifixion to the world? Ans. It consists not in a vile esteem of the world, as useless or hurtful, or in casting off all care and concern for the things of the world, as sinful and unnecessary; nor is every degree of desire after, love unto, or delight in the things of the world, inconsistent with our being crucified to it: nor doth it consist in, or oblige us to the withdrawing ourselves from all society and conversation with the men of the world! But, positively, crucifixion to the world, consists in a crucified judgment and opinion of the world ; in crucifying our love and affection to the world ; in crucifying our hopes and expectations from the world ; in crucifying our care and concern for the world ; in crucifying our delight in, and our endeavours after the world. Quest. How doth a Christian's being crucified to the world, afford him cause for unspeakable rejoicings ? Answer. Thus : We may and ought to glory in the blessed effect and fruit of Christ's death, in re-enslamping the image of God upon the soul, in the certain tokens of the love of God. We may glory in the death of Christ's enemy, and our soul's enemy : We may glory in that wherein God is glorified, and in that which is the earnest of our own glorification. Now, crucifixion to the world, by the cross of Christ, is this, all this, and therefore warrantably to be boasted of, and gloried in.

15 For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature.

Here the apostle subjoins a reason why he gloried only in the cross of Christ, and not in those carnal ordinances and fleshly privileges of circumcision. &c. which the false apostles so much gloried in : namely, because circumcision nor uncircumcision, neither the presence of that ordinance, nor the want of it, availeth any thing, as to our acceptance with Christ, and interest in him ; but the new creature is all in all ; a circumcised heart, not a circumcised fore-skin, a renewed nature, a divine temper of mind, rendering us like to Christ. This will enable us to love him, and qualify us for living with him now in Christ Jesus : that is, now under the Christian dispensation, under the economy of the gospel, neither the presence nor absence of this outward badge of circumcision will avail any thing to our justification before God ; but that which was signified by circumcision, is the thing that pleaseth God : namely, the renovation of our nature, and becoming new creatures both in heart and life. Learn hence, That according to the terms of the gospel covenant, or Christian religion, nothing will avail to our acceptance with God, but the real renovation of our hearts, and lives : " Neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature."

16 And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.

Observe here, 1. The nature of Christianity described ; it is a walk : Now a walk is a motion, a free and voluntary motion, an uniform and even motion, it is a progressive motion, and a constant motion. Observe, 2. The condition of this walk, and that is regularity, it is a walk by rule : a Christian is not a lawless person, to range and ramble, and run up and down as fancy leads him, but he walks by rule, by the rule of scripture, by the rule of charity. Observe, 3. The determination of that rule which a Christian is to walk by, it must be according to this rule. What rule ? The foregoing verse declares it is regeneration, and the law of the new creature : as many as walk according to that rule, when the new creature, in the principles and workings of it, is made the ground, the pattern and direction of our obedience, and we frame and square all the actions of our lives according thereunto. Observe, 4. The blessed privileges belonging to them that thus walk : Peace be on them and mercy ; that is, there shall be peace and mercy to them ; these shall be their portion ; nay, they shall be upon them ; that is, in a large and plentiful manner vouchsafed to them. Observe, lastly, The honourable mention which the apostle makes of them that thus walk by scripture rule, according to the law of the new creature, written in their heart ; he calls them the true Israel of God, the spiritual seed of Abraham, the children of his faith, which was a thousand times greater privilege than to be the children of his flesh : These are the persons interested in his blessings. Learn hence, That true and inward peace, great and lasting peace, peace with God, and peace with conscience, is the assured portion, and shall be the possession of all and only those who walk according to the law of God, the rule of the creature ; as many as walk according to this rule.

17 From henceforth let no man trouble me ; for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

The apostle having thus fully declared the mind of God in the matter controverted betwixt himself and the false apostles, touching the necessity of circumcision ; he now makes use of his apostolic authority, and charges his adversaries to give him no farther trouble or disturbance, either by gainsaying his doctrine, or detracting from his authority ; because he bare in his body the marks of his sufferings for Christ Jesus, namely, the stripes and wounds which he patiently received for the name of Christ, and his holy religion, 2 Cor. xi. 23. Learn hence, That whatever hard measure we meet with for the sake of Christ, what wounds and marks we receive for professing faith in him, and persevering in obedience in him, he will own them for his own, and give us leave to look upon them as his own, yea, to call them his own, as our apostle did here ; I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

18 Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

Here our apostle closes his epistle with his accustomed valediction, most affectionately praying that the grace and favour of Christ, in the sweet effects of it, and in the sensible apprehension of it, might remain in their souls, to enlighten, sanctify, comfort, and quicken them more and more, that from thence they might derive and draw abiding consolation both in life and death. Amen.

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL
EPHESIANS.

St. Paul having planted a famous church at Ephesus, which was the metropolis or chief city in Asia, where he had preached the gospel for three years with eminent success, and being now a prisoner at Rome, he justly feared lest they should faint in their Christian course ; and accordingly, to prevent it, he writes this epistle to the churches of Christ in and about Ephesus, to establish them in the faith he had preached to them, which he was now a prisoner for, and stood ready to seal with his own blood. And here the good providence of God towards St. Paul and them is very remarkable, that though he was now a prisoner at Rome, yet not so close as to be denied pen and paper : God gave him favour in the sight of the keeper, and having work for him to do in prison, provides a keeper for his turn.

St. Paul is no sooner Nero's prisoner, but he falls a preaching and writing too. Happy was it for Onesimus, that St. Paul was sent to gaol, where he was begotten in his bonds by the preaching of the gospel ; and as happy was it for the Ephesians too, unto whom he wrote this excellent Epistle, that they might be the more comforted and confirmed. The devil had better have let St. Paul alone, than thus imprisoned him ; For no sooner was he committed, but he falls both a preaching and writing ; at which the gates of Satan's kingdom fly open, and sinners come forth to his sorrow and shame. There are no such ways to be even with the devil and his instruments, for all their spite and malice against us, as by doing all the good we possibly can wherever we come.

This excellent epistle divinely sets forth the great and astonishing mysteries of our redemption and reconciliation by Jesus Christ ; the freeness and richness of God's grace ; the admirable benefits and privileges of the gospel ; the marvellous dispensation of God to the Gentiles, in revealing Christ unto them.

The principal parts of this Epistle are two, doctrinal and practical. The former is contained in the three first chapters, in which he treats of the sublime privileges of our election, vocation, justification and adoption ; the latter in the three last chapters, in which he exhorts them to constancy in the faith, to preparation for, and patience under sufferings, and to live religiously in every relation, by making conscience of relative duties one towards another, as husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, in which the life and beauty of religion lies ; and so closes and shuts up the epistle, wishing them all peace and prosperity, and a mutual increase of love and charity, and advising them to manifest the sincerity of their love to Christ, by the purity and incorruptness of their lives and conversations.

CHAP. I.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, to the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus:

Observe here, 1. The penman of this epistle described by his name, Paul; by his office, an apostle; by his commission to that office, the will of God: that is, by the command and appointment of God. It is matter of great consolation to the ministers of Christ, as well as great satisfaction to their people, that their calling is from God, and not from themselves; that they speak not in their own names but by commission received from Christ, whose ambassadors they are. Observe, 2. The superscription of this epistle, the persons to whom it was directed and sent, To the saints at Ephesus: So they were all at Ephesus by visible profession, and many of them, no doubt, by real sanctification. All the members of the visible church are obliged to be saints, and the true and real Christian is a true and real saint: He adds, And to the faithful in Christ Jesus, throughout all Asia. This pointed out their duty to them, to be not only holy in profession, but faithful in conversation; these two words, saints and faithful, conjoined, denote both their dignity and their duty; their dignity, in standing near to God, as his children; their duty, in being faithful to him as his servants. Observe, lastly, He styles them saints and faithful in Christ Jesus; intimating, that all our grace and holiness must be holiness in Christ Jesus; that is, acted and exercised by strength fetched from Christ Jesus, and that all our holiness must be accepted in Christ Jesus.

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

These words may be considered two ways: 1. As a religious salutation, taken from the manner of the Jews, who expressed their desires for one another's well-doing, by wishing peace, that is, all kind of happiness and prosperity to each other: Christianity doth neither forbid or abolish, but doth spiritualize and improve civility, humanity, and common courtesy. 2. The words may be considered as an apostolical benediction, in imitation of the priest's blessing, Numb. vi. The apostles were the patriarchs or spiritual fathers of the Church of the New Testament, as the sons of Jacob were of the Old: accordingly they bless their children, wishing grace from God the Father, or grace from God as a Father; thereby denoting, that God bestows not his grace as a Creator, but as a Father in Christ, in a discriminating way and peculiar manner: And peace from our Lord Jesus Christ: he being the purchaser of our peace, he upon whom the chastisement of our peace was laid, and he that made peace for us by the blood of his cross; and thereupon God of his free grace accepts us, justifies us, and is at peace with us. Learn, That such as have received most grace from God, stand in further need of supplies of grace from him: they are thankful for peace, but they cannot content themselves with peace without grace; they desire both to have the heart and love of God set upon them, as well as pacified towards them; they desire to be pardoned, but above all, seek to be beloved of the Father.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ;

Observe here, 1. The work which the heart of the apostle was set upon, and that is, the work of blessing God; we bless God one way, he blesses us another; he blesses us imperatoriously, by commanding his blessing upon us; we bless him opotatively, when with thankful hearts, we praise him, when we wish well to him, and speak well of him. Lord, what an infinite favour and privilege is this vouchsafed to us, not only to pray to God and receive blessings from him, but to admit us to bless him, and to account himself honoured by us, when we acknowledge him the fountain of all blessings, and blessedness to us his creatures! Observe, 2. The title under which our apostle bleisseth him, namely, as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He doth not say now under the gospel, as of old under the law, Blessed be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; or, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; but, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Where note, 1. He is a God to Christ, in relation to his being man: Christ being fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, to the work and office of a Mediator, 1 Pet. i. 20, and the Father making a covenant or federal transaction with him from all eternity as Mediator. Note, 2. He is a Father to Christ, and that both as God and man: a Father to him as God, by eternal and ineffable generation, the one being Deus gignens, the other Deus genitus; thus he was the only begotten Son of the Father; and a Father to him as man, by virtue of the personal union of the two natures in Christ, Luke i. 32. Therefore, that holy thing shall be called the Son of God. Observe, 3. The reason why, under these relations, he so affectionately blessed God, namely, for bestowing blessings, spiritual blessings, all spiritual blessings; and this is in or concerning heavenly things, which intend to fit us for heaven and eternal glory: And, lastly, All these blessings are conferred upon us in Christ; he, by his merit, hath purchased them; he, as our Head and Advocate, in our name, has received them; by virtue of our union with whom we have a right unto them, and shall ere long in heaven be fully and finally possessed of them. Behold here the transcendent bounty and liberality of our heavenly Father: He has more than one blessing for his children, he has all spiritual and heavenly blessings for them, grace on earth, and glory in heaven; grace, to enable them to glorify him upon earth, and glory, as the reward of grace with himself in heaven. Rejoice, O Christian, in thy lot and portion; God himself hath but all things, and so hast thou. Has he all spiritual blessings in heaven in full possession? Thou hast them also in right and title at present, and ere long shall enjoy them in full fruition. Eternally blessed then be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places, or in heavenly things, in Christ.

4 ¶ According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love :

Our apostle having, in the former verse, offered up a very solemn thanksgiving to God, for blessing the Ephesians with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ, he comes in this verse to discover and declare the fountain from whence all these spiritual blessings did proceed and flow, namely, from God's gracious purpose in our election before all time; He hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, &c. Where note, The favour vouchsafed, election; and the fruit and product of that favour, holiness of conversation. Note, 1. The favour and privilege vouchsafed by God: He hath chosen : This denotes the freeness of the favour; he chose when he might have refused: His book of life is a book of love; the cause of our love is in the object; the reason of God's love is in himself. Note, 2. The subject of this favour; He hath chosen us, us Gentiles: The Jews much gloried in their being a chosen generation, a peculiar people; we Gentiles are a chosen generation also; they were beloved for their father's sake, Abraham: we for Christ's sake. Note, 3. The antiquity of this favour, before the foundation of the world, that is, from all eternity. The apostle, to take the Jews off from boasting, as they did, that the world was made for their sake, and that the Messiah from the beginning of the world did enter into a covenant with God to redeem them especially, declares, that the despised Gentiles were elected and chosen by God, to be an holy people to himself; and all this, in the purpose of God, before the foundations of the world were laid. Note, 4. God is said to have chosen us in Christ, as our head. Consider Christ as God, so we are chosen by him: I know whom I have chosen, says Christ: Consider him as Mediator, so we are chosen in him, not chosen for him: because, not Christ's undertaking for us, but the Father's good pleasure towards us, was the spring and fountal cause of our election. The truth is, God was so far from choosing the Gentiles out of faith foreseen, that he did not choose them for sake and obedience of Christ foreseen; God did not love us from eternity, because Christ was to die for us in time, but because he loved us with an everlasting love; therefore, in the fulness of time, Christ was sent to die for us: So that the death of Christ was the fruit and effect, but not the cause of our election: No other reason, says Bishop Fell upon the place, can be assigned of this privilege, but the good pleasure of God; and if Christ's sufferings were not the cause of our election, much less our own deservings, as he adds there; almighty God not choosing us because worthy, but to make us worthy by choosing us. Note, 5. The effect and fruit, the benefit and end of this free and ancient favour, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love. 1. Holiness is here declared not to be the cause, but the effect of our election; God chose the Gentiles from eternity to be his people, not because they were holy, they were far enough from that, being afar off from God, but designing that they thus graciously chosen should be holy; initially, progressively, and perseveringly holy in this life, and perfectly holy in the next: Yet arriving at such a perfection here in holiness, as to denominate us blameless in the account of God, by virtue of our faith in Christ, and love to one another. From the whole, learn, 1.

That God's bestowing all spiritual blessings upon us in time, is the effect and fruit of his electing love from all eternity; He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings, according as he hath chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world. Learn, 2. That God hath chosen none to happiness and glory hereafter, but only such as are holy in conversation here, holy in the habitual frame and disposition of their hearts, and in the general course and tenor of their lives and actions. Learn, 3. That such as are holy before God, will endeavour to walk unblameable in the sight of man, in the exercise of love, and in the practise of all the duties of the second table, which are at once evidences of our sincerity, and an ornament to our profession; that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love.

5 Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will,

6 To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved :

That is, Having predestinated us Gentiles, who in the esteem of the Jews were accounted dogs, to be his adopted sons and daughters, in and by Jesus Christ, in whom he hath made us accepted, to the abundant praise and glory of his free grace and mercy. Observe here, 1. That none are the children of God by nature; none are born sons, but made sons; not of their own, but God's making; and in order to this glorious privilege, we were predestinated unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ. Observe, 2. The attribute mentioned here by the apostle, which moved God to predestinate us to the adoption of children; it was the glory of his grace; he mentions not the glory of his holiness, the glory of his justice, or the glory of his power; because the glory of his power is manifested in making of the world, the glory of his holiness in making of his law, the glory of his justice in turning the transgressors of that law into hell; but his grace, he shews no where so much as in the predestination of his children, and in what he hath predestinated them unto; he sheweth indeed all his attributes herein, but grace over and above all the rest. Observe, 3. The effect and fruit of this privilege, namely, of our being predestinated to the adoption of children, and that is, our being made accepted in Christ the beloved; the word is properly rendered, he hath made us dear, precious and delightful to himself; or, in one word, he hath ingratiated us. Here note, That as Jesus Christ is in an eminent manner beloved of God and accepted with him, so, in like manner, all God's adopted children do, and shall find favour with God, and acceptance through Christ; he hath made us freely accepted in the beloved.

7 In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace ;

Our apostle having in the foregoing verses, enumerated the great and glorious privilege which the children of God were made partakers of before all time, comes next to discover what they are admitted to the participation of in time: and here in this verse he mentions two of them, namely, redemption, and remission of sin, in whom we have redemption through his blood, &c. Here note, The privilege itself, redemption; the Redeemer, Jesus Christ in whom, the price of this redemption paid down, his blood; one fruit of this redemption instanced in for all the rest, the forgiveness of sin; and lastly, the spring or source of all this, the riches of his grace. Learn, 1. The deplorable state into which the whole race of mankind was brought by sin, namely, an estate of slavery and bondage, and spiritual captivity unto sin; redemption supposes this: slaves and captives need a Redeemer, none else; we are all by nature under slavery to sin, to satan, and the curse of the law, and the wrath of God.—Learn, 2 That there was no delivery to be had from this slavery, but by a price paid down to the justice of God; redemption is a delivery by ransom and price. Learn, 3. That no other price did, or could redeem us from our miserable captivity, but the blood of Christ; we have redemption through his blood. Learn, 4. That all believers and only they have remission of their sins, through the redemption purchased for them by the blood of Christ. Learn, 5. That God's free grace, and Christ's full satisfaction, do stand well together in the work of redemption and remission of sin: true, God had a satisfaction from the hand of our surety Christ Jesus; but was it not free grace and rich mercy in God, to accept of a surety and a substitution, when the rigor of the law required none, and would admit of none, but demanded that the soul which sinned should die? Was it not free mercy, not only to accept a surety, but to provide a surety for us, as God did, and this surety his own Son? And to deliver up this Son to a painful, shameful, and accursed death, that we might have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sin, according to the riches of his grace?

8 Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence;

9 Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself;

That is, in which dispensation of his, namely, our redemption from sin and wrath by the blood of his Son, God the Father hath discovered abundant wisdom, wonderful wisdom, riches of divine wisdom, to the children of men. Taking the words in this sense, the observation is, That God's sending his Son into the world to suffer in our stead, and to satisfy for our sin, was not only an act of special grace and peculiar favor, but also an evidence and demonstration of wonderful wisdom in God; he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom; O what wonderful wisdom appeared in the contrivance of the work of redemption, and in the accomplishment of it! What wisdom, in appointing such a Mediator as was fit to reconcile God to man, and man to God! What wisdom, in laying the platform and design of the gospel in such a way and manner as at once to advance the honor and secure the glory of God, and to promote the holiness and comfort of man! Observe, next, the description which St. Paul gives us of the gospel, and (No. 55.)

the preaching of it, is the mystery of God's will revealed and made known to a lost world. Learn, that the gospel's method for recovering and saving lost sinners by a Redeemer, was a mystery, a hidden mystery; it was hid where all the world could never have found it, where angels and men could never discover it; it was hid in God, in his breast and bosom, in his heart and thoughts; it was hid from angels, nay, the churches knew it before the angels; yea, the angels learnt it from the churches, Eph. iii. 10. Unto principalities and powers is known by the church the manifold wisdom of God; and as it was hid from angels, so from the wise men of the world, 1. Cor. ii. 8. We preach the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which none of the princes of this world knew; nay, the gospel was hid from all the saints of the Old Testament, comparatively, not absolutely; with respect to that clear revelation which we have of the gospel now, it may be said to be hidden from them then. O, what obligations then do we, lie under, who live under the dispensation of the gospel, to acknowledge what an infinite favor it is from God, clearly to know the mystery of his will, concerning the redemption and salvation of poor lost sinners by a Mediator! God has now revealed it, and he desires all may know and receive the revelation of it, namely, the hidden mystery of his will. Observe, lastly, What was the impelling and moving cause of God's making known the mysteries of his will to a lost world; it was his own good pleasure, which he had purposed in himself; God's making known the mystery of his will by the gospel, and his enlightening the understandings of men savingly to apprehend it, proceeds entirely from the purpose and pleasure of his own good will; having made known unto us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure which he purposed in himself.

13 That, in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him:

These words discover to us the end and design of God, in making known the mystery of his will, that is, in revealing the gospel: it was to gather into one universal church both angels and men, Jews and gentiles, under Christ their Head, and by virtue of that union to become one with the Father, as he and Christ are one. Here note, 1. That Christ is the Head both of angels and men; an Head of confirmation to the angels, of redemption to fallen man; both angels and saints in heaven and on earth make up one family, of which Christ is the Head: the angels are a part of the worshippers of Christ as well as we, they are a part of his family and household; the heads fill our churches as we'll as men, and are present in our congregations and assemblies, 1 Cor. xi. 10. Note, 2. That all mankind by nature, and as considered in themselves, are under a fearful dissipation or scattering: sin hath rent and separated them from God, from man, and from the blessed angels: Gathering together pre-supposes a foregoing scattering. Note, 3. That the purpose and design of God, in discovering the truths of the gospel unto men, was this, that he might gather them together into union, with Jesus Christ; that by virtue of that union they might be one with the Father, as he and Christ are one; That in the fulness of time he might gather together in one body in Christ all things capable of eternal happiness, both in heaven and earth; even in him who is the Head of that body, whereof angels as well as men are members.

11 In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will:

12 That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ.

Our apostle having hitherto spoken of the glorious privileges of the gospel in general, he comes now to make application of this his doctrine, first to the Jews, and next to the Gentiles in particular. As to the Jews, who were first called by Christ and his apostles, and who were the first that trusted or hoped in Christ for salvation, before there was any considerable number of converts among the Gentiles, he declares, that these Jewish believers, whereof himself was one, had, in and through Christ, obtained a right to be God's portion and peculiar people; and that they should not by embracing the gospel, lose that ancient privilege which their forefathers so mightily boasted of, and gloried in; namely, to be a chosen generation, and a peculiar people; but together with their being God's portion, they should have right to an inheritance: In whom we have obtained an inheritance; namely, an inheritance in the heavenly Canaan, the inheritance of the saints in light; and to this inheritance, says he, you have been appointed, God having fore-ordained that this inheritance should be the portion of all believers, and the consequent of faith in Christ, by virtue of which we become the sons of God, and all this to the praise of his own glory: that is, to the intent that his glorious attributes of wisdom, goodness, and mercy, might be acknowledged, and highly praised. Learn hence, 1. That to be called to faith, and brought to believe in Christ, before others, is a favor and special prerogative, which some persons have above others: We who first believed in Christ. It is an high honor above all others, to be in Christ before others, Rom. xvi. 7. Who were in Christ before me. Learn, 2. That as all believers are God's portion and the lot of his inheritance, so they do obtain from him right and title to a lot and share in an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in the heavens for them; We have obtained an inheritance. Learn, 3. That Jesus Christ the Mediator, is that person, in, by, and through whom believers are instituted to this inheritance; In whom we have obtained an inheritance. Christ hath purchased this inheritance for them: he hath promised it to them; he has already taken, and still keeps possession of it for them; and he will put them into the full and final possession of it at the great day. Learn, 4. That the great end and design of God, in all the distinguishing favors and benefits which by Jesus Christ we obtain from him, is this, That we should be to the praise of his glory. The words may be understood; 1. Passively; the praise of his glory was to be manifested in them. 2. Actively; that the high praises of God were to be set forth by them.

13 In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, 14 Which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory.

Here the apostle recounts the favors and privileges which the Gentiles, as well as the Jews upon their believing in Christ, were admitted to the participation of: he assures them that in and through Christ they had obtained a right to this heavenly inheritance also, as well as the Jews, having been brought to trust and believe in him, by hearing the word of truth, the doctrine of the gospel, preached to them: and next, that they were sealed for the children of God by the sanctifying Spirit promised to the sons of God, which produced a real renovating change in their hearts and lives, and so was a pledge and earnest of, as well as made them meet and fit for the heavenly inheritance; the full enjoyment of which is not to be expected till the last day, when, and not before, all believers shall obtain complete redemption, and their bodies being raised, shall be re-united to their souls, and both rendered perfectly and everlastingly happy. The end of God, in all this dispensation of grace and mercy to the Gentiles, being the same with that before mentioned to the Jews; namely, the praise of his own glorious grace. Here observe, 1. That both the Gentiles and Jews are saved by the same faith and trust in Christ; In whom ye also trusted; as they have the same common inheritance, so have they the same common assistance and faith in Christ. Observe, 2. That the faith of the Gentiles came by hearing of the word; In whom ye also trusted, after ye heard the word, &c. that is, presently after they heard, they believed and obeyed; Col. i. 6. Ye obeyed from the first day that we preached the gospel. What a shame and reproach is this to those amongst us, who have heard the gospel preached all their days, yet never did believe or obey the gospel? Observe, 3. A double encomium which the apostle gives the gospel by which these Gentile Ephesians were converted; he calls it, 1. The word of truth; that is, a word of the most eminent and excellent truth. There is no truth that ever God swore to, but the truth of the gospel. The law is truth as well as the gospel, but the law was made without an oath; had it been made with an oath, it had never been recalled; the gospel is sealed with an oath, and therefore shall never be reversed. 2. He calls it the gospel of salvation, and the gospel of their (the Ephesians) salvation. It is called a gospel of salvation, because the matter of it is salvation, because the offer of it is salvation; and it declares the only way and means by which lost sinners may obtain salvation; and the gospel of their salvation, because God had by his Holy Spirit, made the preaching of this gospel effectual for their conversion and salvation. Observe, 4. The privilege which the Ephesian Gentiles obtained, after they had by faith consented to this gospel of salvation, and that was their sealing; After ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise. Where note, That the privilege of sealing always follows the duty of believing, never goes before it. Sealing doth imply that precious and excellent esteem which they have with God: nothing but what is precious is sealed by us: who seals up dung and pebbles in a bag? Believers are God's jewels, his treasure, therefore sealed. Sealing also is for safety and security, for discrimination, and for confirmation. The Holy Spirit, by sanctifying of us, doth discriminate and distinguish us from the rest of the world, doth secure and preserve us from the fatal danger of a ruinous apostacy, and doth also confirm our hopes of the glorious inheritance. Observe, 5 That the Holy Spirit is given to believers in the nature of an earnest; sanctifying grace wrought in the heart here, is a sure earnest of glory hereafter, which is the earnest of our inheritance. An earnest binds the bargain; and is a part of the bargain; if it be but a shilling given as an earnest, it secures a contract for a thousand pounds. Believers are to consider and look upon grace not barely as grace, but as an earnest of glory. Oh, be thankful to God for his sanctifying Spirit, not only as abiding the corruptions, but as a pledge and earnest of a glorious inheritance. It is a great comfort to find grace in the soul, as sanctifying, as quickening and renewing, but a greater matter of rejoicing to find it also there as witnessing, as sealing and confirming, as a part of our inheritance in glory, and as a pledge and earnest of the whole. Observe, 6 That the Holy Spirit of God is God. To sanctify, to seal, to confirm our hearts, are divine operations; be that doth these must be a divine person. True; how the Spirit of God is God, and how he proceedeth from the Father and the Son, cannot be comprehended by our reason and shallow understandings. No wonder that the doctrine of the Trinity is inexplicable, seeing the nature of God is incomprehensible; our faith then must assent to what our reason cannot comprehend, otherwise we can never be christians. Observe, lastly, That heaven is here called a possession, and a purchased possession: that is, by the blood of Christ. A king's ransom we account a vast sum; Oh, what will our ransom by the blood of the Son of God come to? Grace is purchased, and glory is purchased, both by the blood of Christ. Lord! what will that glory come to! in eternity we shall admire it, but never fully comprehend it!

15 Wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints, 16 Cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers;

Observe here, 1. The special duties which St. Paul performed on the behalf of these Ephesians, he gave thanks for them, he prayed for them, and both without ceasing; "I cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers." Where note, How enlarged St. Paul's heart was in thankfulness to God for the salvation of others, as well as unwearied in his endeavours in order to their salvation. This will be one great exercise of our grace in heaven; namely, thankfulness to God for the salvation of others, as well as our own: and verily, it ought to be a mighty argument to move the heart of any one to work out his own salvation, when he sees another, be it his minister, his parent, his master, or his neighbour, so solicitous for it, and taking such care of it. Note farther, That the duties of prayer and praise, of supplication and thanksgiving, ought to accompany one another: we are never to pray for fresh mercies, either for ourselves or others, without giving thanks to God for former mercies. Besides there is no such effectual way of begging, as thanksgiving; he that is spiritually thankful for what he has received, engages God to confer upon him the mercies which he wanteth. Add to this, That holy thankfulness is an evidence of true grace in us: need and want will make us beggars, but grace only thanksgiving. Observe, 2. The occasion of St. Paul's prayers and praises in the Ephesians' behalf; namely, his having heard, 1. Of their faith in Christ; 2. Of their love to all saints. Where note, How he joins faith and love together, as the two most eminent graces, and as the two great evangelical commandments, faith in Christ, and love to saints. But how comes he not to make mention of their love to God? Ans. Because love to God is supposed and necessarily included in our love to saints, as saints; for he that loves them that are begotten, much more loves him that begetteth; he that loves the child for the father's sake, loves the father much more for his own sake. Note farther, It is love to saints, as saints, and to all saints without exception, that is the evidence of true faith; poor saints as well as rich, weak saints as well as gifted. There are froward and fretful saints, passionate and peevish christians, who have many infirmities, great infirmities cleaving to them, though disallowed by them; yet these professing christians are loved and to be beloved by us, even as a brother loveth all his brothers, for his father's sake that begat them all, though one but little, another lame, a third crooked, a fourth sickly. Lord, how far are the professors of this day from the practice of this duty? How doth a little difference in judgment, occasion a great deal of judging, and rash censuring one another? Christ hath received us, why should we reject one another? One heaven will hold us all hereafter, why should not one communion hold us here? Verily, if children quarrel and fall out with one another at a full table, there is an enemy at their backs that will quickly take away the vider. If our hearts be not turned suddenly to one another, Almighty God will certainly come and smite the earth with a curse.

17 That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, in the knowledge of him:

These words give us a short, but very comprehensive account of that affectionate prayer which St. Paul put up to God on the behalf of these Ephesians, newly converted to christianity; in which, observe, 1. The person whom he prays unto, God, under a very endearing title, for the strengthening of his faith; he styles him, not as the Old Testament saints, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but in the language of the New Testament, The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Father of glory. The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, as he is a man and Mediator, commissioned of him, and sent by him; and the Father of glory as being in himself infinitely glorious: to whom all glory is and ought to be ascribed, and from whom alone it is communicated. Learn hence, That as all our prayers and requests are and ought to be directed unto God only, so in order to our having access to God with assurance in prayer, it is our duty to apply to him as a Father, as a Father in Christ, as a Father in Christ to us, and under this notion and apprehension to strengthen our faith for the obtaining of what we ask in prayer; "May the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, give unto you, &c. Observe, 2. The great and comprehensive blessing prayed for; namely, divine illumination, and spiritual knowledge; that is, farther increase of that wisdom and saving knowledge of divine mysteries, whereof the Spirit of God is the author. Learn hence, That as spiritual wisdom, or the saving knowledge of divine mysteries, is necessary to a christian; so those who have a good measure of this grace already received, ought not to sit down satisfied with it, but aspire after farther measures and degrees of it: spiritual knowledge is as necessary for increasing grace, as it is for working grace in the soul. Observe, 3. The title here given to the Holy Spirit of God, he is styled "Spirit of wisdom and revelation;" he being the author of all that knowledge in the mysteries of religion which we attain unto, and it being his proper work and office to reveal unto us the will of God for our salvation. Learn hence, 1. That believers themselves, who are divinely enlightened by the Holy Spirit of God, have yet need of farther measures and fuller degrees of spiritual wisdom. Learn, 2. That the way to obtain this fuller measure of divine wisdom and spiritual illumination, is to be earnest with God in prayer for his Holy Spirit. So the apostle here.

18 The eyes of your understanding being enlightened; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints.

Our apostle proceeds in this verse, and to the end of the chapter, in a very affectionate and fervent prayer, on the behalf of the Ephesians; namely, that the blessed Spirit of God, the author of all divine illuminations would farther open the eyes of their understanding, formerly shut up in heathenish blindness and darkness, that so they might know, 1. "What is the hope of his calling;" that is, what high and glorious hopes he had called them unto; for hope here, is taken for the object of hope, or the great and good things hoped for; and it is said to be "the hope of their calling;" because, as their conversion from heathenism to christianity, they were entitled to, and called to the expectation of these great and good things, which were the object of hope. Where note the Ephesians' deplorable state before conversion; they were without hope; and the happy exchange of their condition by embracing christianity, they were begotten to a lively hope of glorious things, which before they were wholly ignorant of, and strangers to. As a sinner's misery lies not in what he feels, but what he fears; so a christian's happiness consists not in what he has in hand, but in what he has in hope; May you know what is the hope of his calling. The second blessing which he prays for on their behalf is, that they may know what is the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints; that is, say some, what an exceeding glorious thing it is to be a christian; or, what an exceeding glory redounds to God, by his people, which are his inheritance, say others: but most understand the words as a description of heaven, which is here called an inheritance, a rich inheritance, a glorious inheritance, in or among the saints; that is, the saints in heaven, who hold that in possession, which the saints on earth have in hope and expectation. Learn hence, That heaven is the saints' inheritance. An inheritance is an estate that belongs to children, to all such, and none but such. It is an undeserved possession, and it is a sure and certain possession. Here note, That Almighty God is said in scripture, to make heaven as sure to his saints, by all sorts of ways, as a man can make an inheritance sure to his child: It is theirs by promise, it is theirs by purchase, it is theirs by gift, it is theirs by bequest; it is given by will to them, St. Luke xxii. 29. "I appoint by will unto you a kingdom." Can any thing be sure, or more ways made secure to any person, than this inheritance of heaven is to the holy servants of God? But farther the apostle calls it "the riches of the glory of his inheritance;" that is, a very rich and exceeding glorious inheritance; such abundant riches and transcendent glory are found in it, as overwhelm the mind of man, that here enters upon the close contemplation of it. Heaven will appear to be a glorious inheritance, if we consider the glory of the place, the glory of the company, the glory of the employment, and the glory that will be then and there put upon our souls and bodies. Lord, make us meet for this glorious inheritance of thy saints in light!

19 And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power;

20 Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead.—

The next particular which the apostle prays for, on behalf of the converted Ephesians, is this, that they might know, or sensibly apprehend, the greatness of that divine power, which God had exerted, first in their conversion: next, in carrying on that work step by step, in spite of all opposition; then in giving them the extraordinary gifts of his Spirit, as miracles, tongues, and prophecy; also, the sanctifying graces of the Spirit, as knowledge, faith, hope, love, joy, and patience, to enable them to go on in suffering for Christ to the uttermost; and lastly, That they might know the exceeding greatness of that power which God will farther exert towards them as believers, in raising up their dead bodies to enter upon that glorious inheritance which God by promise insured to them; which power, he assures them, would bear some likeness to, and correspondence with, that omnipotent power which God put forth, in raising Christ from the dead, and advancing him to the heavenly glory, where he is Lord of all. Observe here, What an heap of words our apostle makes use of, to set forth the power of God in the soul's conversion from the power of sin, and in the body's resurrection from the power of the grave; he calls it "Power, the power of God, the greatness of his power, and the exceeding greatness of his mighty power, and the power which raised up Christ from the dead." Lord! what a glorious power was that which opened our Redeemer's grave, when he lay in the heart of the earth, with a mighty stone rolled upon his sepulchre; may the same Almighty power break asunder all those bars of unbelief, which keep our souls under the power and dominion of sin now, and at the great day, break in pieces the bars of death and the grave, that it may be altogether impossible for us any longer to be holden by them: for towards thy saints, and in order to their salvation, thou dost engage the uttermost of thine attributes, the uttermost of thy love, and the exceeding greatness of thy power.

—And set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places,

21 Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come;

22 And hath put all things under his feet,—

Our apostle, in these words, discovers to us Christ's exaltation, or that glory and dignity, which, after his resurrection and ascension, the Father put upon him as God-man or Mediator, far surpassing the glory of all created beings. Now, this is represented to us by the notion, and under the metaphor, of Christ's sitting at God's right hand: This imports, 1. Fulness of rest and pleasure, that he quietly, securely, and everlastingly possesses all that happiness and satisfaction in heaven, which God himself is possessed of and delighted with, far above all the pleasures and delightful satisfactions, which all the glorified saints and glorious angels do, or can possibly enjoy. 2. It implies a fulness of honor and glory, of dignity and respect. When Solomon set Bathsheba at his right hand, it was in token of honor and respect to her. Heb. ii. 9. we see Jesus to be crowned with glory and honor, sitting down at the right-hand of the Majesty on high. 3. Christ's sitting at God's right-hand, imports, his having all rule, dominion and power, put into his hand to govern all things, both in heaven and on earth. 4. It imports and implies ability to execute that power: all those royal glorious endowments, which God filled the human nature of Christ with, to make him fit to be the supreme Head of his church, and the great and wise governor of the world; all this doth God's setting Christ at his own right-hand import and imply. In the next verse (the 21st) the apostle expresses more plainly, what he had said in the former verse figuratively; God hath exalted Christ (says he) "far above all principalities and powers, might, and dominion, and every name that is named; and hath put all things under his feet." Where note, 1. The eminency; 2. The universality of our Lord's exaltation. Its eminency appears in the height of his exaltation: he is not only above but far above, all principalities and powers, and might and dominion; and in the lowness of the subjection of all things to him, "having put all things under his feet." And the universality of Christ's exaltation appears, by instancing, in "principalities and powers, might and dominion;" under which he comprehends all things that are excellent in heaven and earth, angels and men, &c. all creatures whatsoever being placed in a degree of inferiority beneath him, and in the lowest state of subjection under him. Whence we learn, 1. That the human nature of Christ, and his glorified body, by virtue of that unspeakable union between the two natures of Christ, his Godhead and manhood, is so highly dignified and exalted in heaven, that all the glory of heaven and earth, of kings and emperors, of sun, moon, and stars, of the souls of just men made perfect, yea, and of the spotless glorious angels themselves, is nothing to it, nor may be compared with it. Christ sits now in heaven, in our glorified humanity united to his glorious Deity; that body which hung on an ignominious cross in blood and gore, now shines brighter than ten thousand suns in the kingdom of his Father. All this honor and homage, glory and praise, dominion and power, is due to our Lord the Redeemer, as the reward of his sufferings; God hath set him at his own right hand, far above all principalities and powers. "Learn, 2. That although the mediatorial kingdom of Christ shall cease at the last day, (and be delivered up by Christ unto his father) as to the way wherein he now administers it, by ruling in the midst of his enemies, whom he shall then have finally subdued and destroyed; yet his natural kingdom as God, shall never cease, but continue, "in the world to come" without end. Those words here, "not only in this world, but in the world to come," do show the duration of Christ's kingly government, and that he is king for ever and ever, that his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion endureth through eternal ages.

(No. 55.)

—And gave him to be the head over all things to the church.

23 Which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all.

St. Paul having spoken of Christ's sovereignty in general, over all created beings, both in heaven and in earth, in the foregoing verses, doth, in the words before us, declare, that as he is an head of dominion and authority to the whole creation in general, so he is an head of influence to his church in particular. Note, Christ was given by the Father to be the church's Head: now, this metaphor of an head implies several things: as, 1. Eminency above the church, as the head is above the members. 2. Authority over the church; the head governs all the members. 3. Oneness of nature betwixt him and his church: To see an head of one nature, and members of another, is monstrous. 4. It implies a strict, intimate, and close union betwixt him and his church, as betwixt head and members; which union, as to the members of the visible church, is a political union; but as to the invisible members (real believers), the union betwixt Christ and them is mystical, spiritual, supernatural, and indissoluble. Lastly, This metaphor of an head, given here to Christ, implies a communication of influences from himself unto all his members; an influence of common gifts to the visible members of his body, and an influence of spiritual life and motion to the invisible members, true believers. Indeed, Christ is the Head of angels as well as saints, but in different respects; to angels, he is an Head of dominion and government, an Head of authority and superiority: but to his church, he is an Head of dominion and direction also; not only an Head of authority, but an Head of vital influence too: the angels are Christ's honourable subjects, but saints are the mystical members of his body; the former are as the nobles in his kingdom, that attend upon his person, but the latter are the endeared spouse that lies in his bosom. Oh glorious dignity of the meanest believer above the highest angel! For as the nobles in a prince's court think it a preferment and honor to wait upon his queen, so the glorious angels account it no dishonor to them, to serve and administer to the saints, to which honorable office they are appointed, Heb. i. 14. namely, to be "ministering," or serviceable "spirits, for the good of them that are the heirs of salvation." As the chiefest servants disdain not to serve the heir, so the angels delight to serve the saints.—Observe, 2. As the character here given of Christ "the head of his church;" so the honorable titles put upon the church, she is his body; "The head over all the church which is his body;" not his natural, but his mystical body. This implies, 1. The church's union with Christ, and her relation to him. 2. The church's receiving influences from him, life, motion, and strength; all which the members of the body receive by virtue of union with their head. 3. It implies the duty of subjection and obedience due from the church to Christ, as from the members to the head. 4. It implies the union and order among the members themselves: that as all the members of the natural body sympathize with, and are subservient to each other, so should all the members of the church, Christ's mystical body, employ their gifts, and improve their functions and offices for the general good of the whole, and the mutual benefit and advantage of each other, as becomes the body of Christ, and members in particular. But especially, the church is said here to be the body of Christ, and He her Head; 1. With respect to a communication of influences; Christ our Head is our fountain of life;" our Head is our heart also, "out of it are the issues of life;" from him we live, by him we move, and our spiritual being is derived from him, strengthened and sustained by him: the whole church receives spiritual life, motion and strength from Christ, as the body doth from the animating and enlivening soul. 2. Christ is called here "the head of the church, his body," with respect to a complication of interest, as well as a communication of influences: As the head and the body, as the husband and the wife, so Christ and his church are mutually concerned for each other; they stand and fall, live and die together: whatsoever he has, is theirs; they have nothing but through him, they have all things in him, and by him; his God is their God, his Father is their Father; his blood, his bowels, his merit, his spirit, his life, his death is theirs; and as all that he has is his church's, so all that he did is for his church, called here his body. He obeyed as his church's Head; he died as her Head; he rose, ascended and reigneth as her Head; and hath in his church's name, taken possession of heaven, as a purchased inheritance for her. How fitly then may Christ be called the Head of the church, and the church be called the body of Christ? Observe, 3. How Christ came to be the Head of his church. God the Father gave him this authority, ver. 22.—"And gave him to be the Head over all things to the church;" that dignity and superiority, that dominion and power which Christ has over his church, is given to him by God the Father; none else was fit for it but himself; and although it was due unto himself, yet it must be given him: Now, if Christ did not exercise any authority over the church till it was given him, what bold presumption is it, and will it be, in any person upon earth to assume any power over, or to exercise any office in the church, when never called to it, nor authorised by Christ to undertake it? We may demand of such confident undertakers, as the pharisee demanded of the holy and humble Jesus. "By what authority dost thou these things; and who gave thee this authority?" Observe, 4. The high honor which is put upon the church by being Christ's body, by this she becomes Christ's fulness.—"The church which is his body, the fulness of him."—Yet note, The church is not the fulness of Christ personal, but of Christ mystical; not of his natural, but mystical body; every saint, and every degree of grace in a saint, is a part of Christ's fulness. The work of the ministry then, is the best and noblest work in the world, because it is an adding to the fulness of Christ. God had but one Son in the world; and he made him a minister: and if increasing the number of converts, and adding to persons' growth in grace, be an addition to Christ's fulness, then how glorious a sight will the great day afford, when Christ shall have all his fulness; when there shall not be one saint wanting, nor one degree of grace in any saint wanting; when head and members shall both be full, full of grace, full of joy, full of glory: when Christ shall be fully glorified in his saints, and they everlastingly filled with the fulness of him that filleth all in all. Observe, 5. The glorious title here given to our Lord Jesus Christ, as Head of his church: "He filleth all in all; he filleth all persons, both angels and men; he filleth all places, heaven with glory, earth with grace, hell with horror; he filleth all ordinances, prayer with prevalency, preaching with efficacy, &c. he filleth all relations, fathers with paternal affections, mothers with maternal bowels; he fills all conditions, riches with thankfulness, poverty with contentment.

CHAPTER II.

The design and scope of our holy apostle, in this chapter, is to set forth before the Ephesians, the happiness of that state and condition, which, by their embracing Christianity, upon the preaching of the gospel, they were brought into: to which end and purpose, he shows them the deplorable misery of their former condition, before conversion; declaring that their natural heathenish estate, was a state of spiritual darkness, yea, of spiritual death, they being dead in trespasses and sins: in which they, and the whole heathen world with them, did generally then lie, before the publishing of the gospel: as appeared by their manifold idolatries, which the grace of the gospel had both convinced them of and turned them from. Accordingly, the apostle thus bespeaks them:

AND you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins.

Observe, here, 1. The deplorable condition which the Ephesians were in by nature, and all persons with them, before their conversion from sin to God. It is a state of spiritual death; the natural and unregenerate man is a dead man, spiritually dead in sin: Our apostle doth not say they were in a dying, but in a dead condition: not half dead, but altogether dead. But how so? Not dead as to natural actions, they can eat and drink; not as to rational actions, they can reason and discourse: not as to civil actions, they can buy and sell, bargain and trade: nor is the natural man dead to moral actions; he can pray, read and hear the word, meditate upon it, and discourse of it; if he please, he can hearken to the voice of God's judgments, consider and call his own ways to remembrance; but as to spiritual acts, to be spiritually performed, here he is dead, till quickened by a vital act of the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to enlighten blind eyes, and whose delight it is to quicken and enliven dead souls. But what doth this state of spiritual death imply? Answer, It doth suppose and imply a state of separation from God, insensibility of that dismal state, an impotency and inability to recover ourselves out of that condition, and our loathsomeness and offensiveness to Almighty God, whilst we continue in it. In short, every unregenerate man is a dead man, in a double sense: He is, 1. Legally dead, being under the condemnatory sentence of the law; we call a man under legal sentence of death, a dead man. 2. Spiritually dead, as being destitute of a principle of spiritual life, a quickening principle to enable the soul to perform spiritual operations. Thus before regeneration are we dead, in opposition to justification; and dead in opposition to satisfaction also; and the fatal instrument, by which our souls die, is here discovered, "dead in or by trespasses and sins." This is the sword that kills souls, and cuts them off from God; "you hath he quickened, being dead in trespasses and sins." Observe, 2. The choice and singular privilege and favor vouchsafed to the Ephesians, in and under the power of spiritual death: they were quickened; that is, made spiritually alive, by the quickening or life-giving power of the Spirit of God. A regenerate man is a living man; he lives a life of justification, which consists in pardon of sin: a condemned man's pardon is his life; and he lives a life of sanctification, having received from the Holy Spirit a vital principle of grace in all the powers and faculties of the soul; justification reconciles God to us, sanctification reconciles us to God: justification takes away the legal enmity, sanctification the natural enmity between God and us. Here note, That the person who is spiritually quickened, is universally quickened: there is not a faculty in the soul but is spiritually dead, and therefore not a faculty but must be spiritually quickened: as there is an universal pollution in every faculty, so must there be an universal renovation; for no spiritual duty can be performed without it, no spiritual privilege can be enjoyed without it, and we can never be saved hereafter, if not spiritually quickened here: but if quickened aright, we live a divine life, the life (in some measure) which God himself lives: and this must needs be an excellent life and a pleasant life here on earth, and shall be an everlasting life with Christ in heaven! "Whosoever liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die." Observe, 3. The person quickening described, "you hath he quickened;" that is, God the Father, who, chap. 1. 17. is said to have given them the "spirit of wisdom and revelation, in the knowledge of himself;" man in his natural state considered, is unable of himself to quicken himself; he doth not so much as desire the quickening grace of God, till God gives the grace of desire. Alas! the understanding is naturally so blind, the heart so hard, and the will so stout and stubborn, that none but a divine power can enlighten the one, and efficaciously incline the other. It is a change of stone into flesh, of a dead sinner into a living saint. A change from nature to grace requires as much, or more of divine power, than a change from grace to glory. To see a creature naturally filthy, now, to delight in purity; to see a sinner, that by nature drinks iniquity like water, now thirsting after righteousness; to see a man that loathed the holy law, and holy ways of God, now longing to walk in them, and to come as to an exact conformity to God in them: these acts are above nature, contrary to nature, and consequently the God of grace is the author of them; "you hath he quickened."

2 Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience:

Our apostle having in the former verse described the Ephesians by their natural state and inward condition, as dead in trespasses and sins, doth in this verse set forth their misery in respect of their outward conversation; they walked in, and made a constant trade of sin: "Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, &c." Here note, 1. Their constant and continued course of life, set forth by walking; a metaphor frequently used in scripture, to set forth the tenor of a person's conversation; wherein, that is, in which sins in time past ye walked. Note, 2. The path in which they walked, in sins and trespasses; this denotes the abundance of sin that was in them, and committed by them with facility and ease, with satisfaction and delight: walking is a motion, a voluntary motion, a progressive motion, a pleasant and delightful motion; it is natural to men whilst unregenerate, to walk in sin with some sort of delight and pleasure; but alas! it is the pleasure of the beast, and not of the man, a sensual and not a rational satisfaction. Note, 3. The guides which they are said here to follow, the world and satan. 1. The world; that is, the corrupt course and sinful customs of the men of the world according to the time and place in which they live; for though the world alters in the course and fashion of it; from time to time, yet it is and ever will be the world still; and the unregenerate part of mankind will always walk according to the course of this world. The second guide which the Ephesians followed, was satan styled here a prince; in regard of that mighty power which he has in and over the men of the world; and "the prince of the power of the air," because he exercises his power by God's permission, in the lower regions of the air: all the elements and the meteors stoop to his direction; when God gives him leave, he can command the fire, the water, the winds, the thunders; all these powers that are in the air he can command, therefore he is called prince; yet here is matter of comfort to us, satan is the prince of the air only: if so, when the air shall cease, his kingdom shall cease; when the world is ended, his dominion and power is ended. Again, there is farther comfort in this, satan is prince of the air, but Christ is prince of heaven and earth, and the air too; both our prayers, whilst we live, and our souls when we die, pass through the air, but satan can neither intercept the one, nor stop the other, in their passage thither: Christ, when he ascended into heaven, went through the air, this kingdom of devils, and spoiled their principalities and powers; he entered heaven in the sight of them all, and led them all captive in triumph at his chariot, so that they shall never hurt the souls of his people, nor ever keep them from heaven. Again, the devil is here described by the influence he has upon the minds of sinners, "he works in the children of disobedience." Satan's way of working in and upon obstinate and impenitent sinners, is very powerful and efficacious, Hence it is here said, 1. That they are led by satan, "they walk according to the prince of the power of the air;" that is according to his guidance, according to his mind and will: he has them at his beck: he says to one sinner, go, and he goeth; and to another, come, and he cometh. 2. They are excited and assisted by satan, he worketh in them and suggests evil thoughts to them: he defiled the heart of Ananias and Sapphira to lie unto the Holy Ghost; he put a lie first into their hearts, and then into their mouths. Now from hence we may infer, that the Holy Spirit of God doth also inwardly work in pious persons, enabling them to will and to do, according to his own good pleasure: for it is unreasonable to conceive, that the evil spirit should have more power over the children of disobedience, in whom he dwells, than the good Spirit has in those pious persons, in whose hearts he is said to dwell: surely the Spirit of God doth more to the saving of souls, than the devil can do to the damning of them.

3 Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh, and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others.

Our apostle, in these words, is supposed to set forth the condition of the Jews by nature, as he had done before of the Gentiles; and that he declares, that even they had their conversation amongst the number of disobedient persons, and were no less obstinately rebellious against God, than the disobedient Gentiles, following the motions of their corrupt lusts and vile affections: nay, he affirms roundly, concerning himself and all the Jews, without exception, that as to their way and course, whilst unregenerate, they did whatsoever their corrupt minds willed, liked, and inclined to; and as to their state, "were by nature the children of wrath, as much as others;" yea, even as much as the despised Gentiles were. Here note, 1. The case of all men, Jews and Gentiles, alike described, children of wrath; that is, our estate and course is such by nature as deserves destruction, as tends to, and will end in destruction, without the renewing grace of God. Note, 2. The rise of this case, expressed by nature, which implies, 1. The term from which this commences, namely, from the first receiving of our beings and natures from our immediate parents, and together with the depravation of our natures, we received an obnoxiousness to the wrath and curse of God. 2. It implies the ground for which this wrath doth impend and hang over us, namely for that depravity of nature, which since the fall is found with us. Learn hence, 1. That original corruption is universal to all mankind, both Jew and Gentile. 2. That this original corruption leads to, and will lodge under eternal wrath, every person in whom regeneration and transplantation into Christ are not found: "We were by nature the children of wrath, even as others."

4 But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us.

5 ¶ Even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved);

St. Paul having set forth that miserable state, which both Jews and Gentiles were in by nature; namely, dead in sin, and children of wrath; he doth next set forth their deliverance from that woeful estate, by the rich mercy and free grace of God: "God, who is rich in mercy, &c." Here observe, 1. The author of our deliverance, God; and the moving or impulsive cause of it, rich mercy and great love. Where note, That God hath done more for us, infinitely more than he did for the angels: he showed love to them, but mercy to us; they are vessels of honor, but we are vessels of mercy; the object of mercy, is a creature in distress and misery. Note farther, That all the attributes in God are subjected to his love; this is the great prevailing attribute which sways all the rest; which way love goes, all attributes go; mercy, power, justice and wisdom, they all work in subordination to love, they are all at love's beck, and love sets them all on work for the good and benefit of the object loved. Note, 3. That the love which God bears to the children of men, is a great love; and the mercy which was set on work by it, is rich mercy; his love so great, that it can never be expressed; his mercy so rich, that it can never be conceived; rich mercy, is abundant mercy, inconceivable mercy, inexhaustible mercy, sure mercy. Note, 4. The blessed effects and fruits of this great love and rich mercy in God towards the Ephesians, in quickening them when dead, in saving them when lost, in doing all things for them when they had undone themselves; "God, who is rich in mercy—even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ." Learn hence, That poor lost sinners, do stand in need of all the riches of mercy that are in God, in order to their regeneration and salvation; if ever we be saved, it is the riches of mercy that must save us. Note, 5. How the apostle ascribes the whole work of their salvation to God's free grace, in opposition to any merit or worth in the persons to be saved; "by grace ye are saved." Learn hence, That the dependency on salvation has in the whole, and in all the parts of it, upon the free grace of God, is the great thing which St. Paul delighted to discover and make known to us here: By grace ye are saved; and he asserts it again, ver. 8. "By grace &c."

6 And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

The apostle here instances in two branches more of that salvation, which he had in the foregoing verse affirmed to be of grace, namely, that of our resurrection and glorification, both which are yet to come, and yet they are spoken of as already past; when the Father raised and glorified Christ, all believers were raised and glorified in him; for in his resurrection and glorification, he did sustain the quality of a public person, representing his whole church as their head and husband; and accordingly, believers are and may be said to be raised already, and glorified already, not in their own persons, but in Christ their Head; the apostle says, "God has raised us up, and has made us sit together;" not, he shall raise us, and will make us sit; to denote the dependency which our resurrection and glorification has upon Christ's, as the effect depends upon the cause, and also the undoubted certainty that they shall come to pass; Christ's resurrection and glorification being a pledge of ours. Learn hence, 1. That Christ rose from the dead, and ascended up into heaven, not as a private person, but as the common head and parent, root and representative of his church and people; so that what he has done, they may be said to have done; they rose in him, and are set down in heaven, in him; and blessed be God for the well-grounded hopes, that as we sit now together in Christ, so ere long we shall for ever sit together with Christ. Learn, 2. That Jesus Christ is the cause of our resurrection and glorification; he is the efficient cause, the meritorious cause, and exemplary cause of our resurrection and glorification. Learn, 3. From the phrase here used of sitting; and of sitting together in Christ; that believers shall certainly partake of the same kingly state and dignity, of the same honor and glory, of the same delight and pleasure, of the same rest and tranquillity, of the same safety and security with Christ in heaven: "He hath made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

7 That in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus.

These words are expressive of the final course or special end of that salvation which God propounded in his gracious workings upon the hearts of these Ephesians, namely, that in all present and succeeding ages, to the end of the world, he might give a convincing proof and example of the exceeding riches of his grace, for the encouragement of the greatest sinners to hope for mercy in and through our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That the instances and examples of God's mercy, grace and goodness, love and kindness towards lost sinners, in one age, are and ought to be an encouragement to future generations to hope in the same mercy, to draw nigh to the same fountain of rich grace, for pardon of sin, and salvation by Christ. O! when we consider that others are as unworthy as ourselves (these Ephesians, for instance) have been admitted to the participation of such divine favors, Lord, what encouragement is it to us, and to others, to venture our salvation upon the same grace! Verily, the primitive christians were intended by God as patterns of grace to succeeding christians; nay, God did not only design them as patterns, but as pledges, that he would go on as he had begun, in after-ages to magnify the riches of his grace, in the conversion of the vilest and worst of sinners.

8 For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God.

9 Not of works, lest any man should boast.

In these words our apostle informs the Ephesians, and in them all succeeding christians, that their complete salvation, from the first to the last, from the lowest to the highest step, depends upon God's free favor and grace in Christ, and not upon any merit or desert in ourselves; works having no meritorious or casual influence upon our salvation, (for they are not causes, but effects of that grace by which we are saved) to the intent that all boasting may be excluded, (No. 55.)

and that all the saints glorying may be in God, and not in themselves. Note here, 1. That believers are saved already, in some sense; not only because they have salvation begun in their new birth here, but they have already a right and title to, yea, a pledge and earnest of complete salvation:—Believers are saved here. Note, 2. That the believer's salvation is through faith in Jesus Christ. Note, 3. That faith by and through which they are said to be saved, is not of themselves, it is the gift of God; faith is the gift of God as well as Jesus Christ, and the one as necessary as the other; for as the only way to heaven is by Christ, so the only way to Christ is by faith; as sin has put a vanity in the creature, so unbelief puts a vanity in Christ, that he should profit us nothing: Wrestle we then with God in prayer for a believing heart.

10 ¶ For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, asserted the whole of our salvation to be of grace, and not of works, lest by magnifying of grace he should seem wholly to set aside good works, and the necessity of a holy life; he declares in this verse, that christians are ordained to them, created and prepared for them, and consequently they are effects flowing from grace, though not causes producing grace: "We are his workmanship:" 1. In our natural capacity, as men: 2. In our civil capacity, as such or such men, high or low, rich or poor: 3. In our spiritual capacity, as saints; this is intended here: believers are God's workmanship, as such, by supernatural renovation and spiritual regeneration; they are not only once made, as other persons, but they are new made, as saints; not by receiving new faculties, but new qualities; for grace is not a substantial, but a qualitative change. Lord, as we are all thy workmanship by natural creation, let us be so by gracious renovation likewise! "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works." Observe here, 1. The manner of this workmanship, created; this denotes two things: 1. That in their new making, they were intended to good works; this was God's mind and meaning in fore-ordaining that they should walk in them: 2. That in their new making they were fitted and prepared for good works, therefore did they receive a new nature from God, new principles, new affections, new dispositions and inclinations, on purpose to fit them for a holy life, fruitful in good works. Here note, That as good works are antecedently necessary to salvation, so renewing grace is absolutely necessary to good works; therefore, before there can be a good work, there must be a good workman, and that good workman must be God's workmanship, created anew through the power of God. Observe, 2. The meritorious cause of this spiritual workmanship, and that is Christ Jesus: "We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus;" that is through the intervening mediation of Christ Jesus. The life which we live in this new created state, namely, a life of holiness, it is purchased by his death, produced by his spirit; all spiritual life comes from God, through Christ as a Mediator; he is a quickening Head and life-giving Spirit: 1. John vi. 9. "God sent his Son, that we might live by him;" Christ is first our ransom, and then the fountain of life unto our souls, created in Christ Jesus. Observe, 3. The final cause of this divine workmanship, and that is, to good works: all those that are new creatures, are created unto good works; so that a holy life is the necessary fruit of their new creation: new creatures are not to live idly, much less to live wickedly, but to make conscience of every duty, to bring forth fruit of piety towards God, of righteousness towards our neighbour, of love and universal charity towards all mankind; "which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them;" that is, God hath before prepared these works for us, and also prepared us for them; he hath prepared these works for us, first by his decree and purpose; he that ordained the end, salvation, hath appointed good works as the means thereto, by his precept and command: Micah vi. 8. "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good, &c." And as God hath prepared these works for us, so he hath prepared us for them by his Holy Spirit, making our hearts fit for our work, by enlightening our minds, and inclining our wills. Learn hence, That new creatures are both ordained and obliged to, and also fitted and prepared for good works; God will have his children distinguished from others by the good they do, as well as the devil's children are characterized by the mischief, which they do. Observe, lastly, The constancy of the christian's duty declared, with reference to good works; he is to walk in them. Now walking denotes and implies both a way and action.—Walking, 1. It implies a way; and intimates plainly to us, that good works are the way and means to obtain salvation; we can never come at heaven as the end, but by walking in the path of good works as the way and means. 2. An action; walking denotes spontaneity in the principle, progress and perseverance in the motion; he that walks, goes forward, gets round, gives not over till he comes to his journey's end. A good man is as diligent and zealous, as constant and persevering in good works, as if he were to be saved for them and by them; and at the same time relies by faith on the merits of the Mediator for his acceptance with God, renouncing all confidence in his own good works; he knows they cannot justify themselves, much less can they justify him, who has a better righteousness than that of his best obedience, to denominate him righteous in the sight of God. Thus are we "God's workmanship created in Christ Jesus to good works; which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."

11 Wherefore remember, that ye being in time passed Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands;

12 That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world.

Our apostle doth two things in these two verses, namely 1. He calls upon the Ephesians to remember their former miserable condition before conversion, when they were in their heathen and unregenerate state, when they were Gentiles, and reproached by the Jews for being uncircumcised, and looked upon by the Jews as dogs; he calls upon them here, to remember their obligations to God, for bringing them out of this miserable state and deplorable condition: "Remember that in times past ye were Gentiles in the flesh." Learn hence, that believers, remembering and calling to mind the sin they were guilty of, and the misery they were exposed to, in their natural and unregenerate state, may many ways be of singular use and advantage to them, and be spiritually improved by them; namely, thus, 1. To excite us to magnify the greatness of God's love, and to admire the freeness and riches of his grace: this we shall certainly do, when we remember that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. 2. To inflame our love to Jesus Christ; Mary loved much, when she remembered that much was forgiven her. 3. To increase our godly sorrow for sin; "then shall they be confounded" when they remember "that I am pacified towards them for all their abominations." Ezek. xvi. 63. 4. To quicken us up to greater zeal and industry for God: it was the remembrance of what Paul was before conversion, that fired him with holy zeal, and carried him forth with such vigor and industry after his conversion, that he labored more abundantly than all the apostles. 5. The remembrance how bad we were ourselves before conversion, will be a special mean to keep up our hearts in hopes of, in prayers for, and endeavours after the conversion of others though very bad at present: What they are, that thou once wert: and what thou now art, that they may also be. Observe, 2. That as St. Paul does put the Ephesians in mind of their former miserable condition; in their heathenish and unregenerate state; so he does particularize the same and branch it forth into its distinct parts and members. When they were unconverted Gentiles. 1. "They were without Christ;" that is, without the knowledge of Christ, without any relation to him, or interest in him, without any union and communion with him, without any communications of life and light, of grace and holiness, of joy and comfort, of pardon and protection, received from him: they did not discern any excellency, nor taste any sweetness in Christ; and consequently had no love to him, no longings after him, no delight or satisfaction in him. Ah miserable condition of a Christless soul! if thou art without Christ, thou art without the spirit and grace of Christ to enlighten thee, to quicken thee, to sanctify and save thee. 2. They "were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel;" that is, they were no members of Christ's church, either visible or invisible; they did not so much as profess themselves to be a people that stood in any relation to God; they were uncircumcised Gentiles; for in Jewry only was God known, and his name great in Israel, Psal. lxxvi. 1: Verily, whatever the world thinks of it, it is a very great favor from God, to be born within the pale of the visible church, and to have communion with her; for thereby we partake of many excellent privileges, namely, the word and sacraments, the communion of saints, together with the offers of Christ, and salvation by him. 3. "They were strangers to the covenants of promise;" that is, to the covenant of grace, first made with Adam after the fall, then with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, afterwards with Israel upon mount Sinai; for which reason, it is here by the apostle called covenants, in the plural number, though it was always one and the same covenant in substance; and its being called the covenants of promise, seems to point at the promise made to Adam, Gen. iii. 15. that first grand original promise, of which promise all the following promises were but branches, or more full explanations. Now the Ephesians are here said to be strangers to the covenants of promise; because, as Gentiles, this covenant was never revealed to them, nor any offer of it made by the ministry of the word, and consequently they could have no actual interest in the blessings and privileges of it. This intimates to us, that for men to live, and die without an offer of the covenant of grace made unto them, is a woeful, sad and dangerous condition, because their salvation is rendered in an ordinary way impossible, forasmuch as the terms upon which salvation may be had, are concealed from them. 4. They were without hope; that is they were without the grace of hope, and without the means of hope; they were without hopes of redemption, without hopes of pardon and reconciliation, and consequently without any well-grounded hope of eternal life and salvation: such as are Christless, must be hopeless;—such as are without faith, must needs be without hope; and such as are without the promise, must necessarily be without faith; for the promise is the ground of faith, and faith is the ground of hope. Learn, That for a person to be without a well grounded hope of future happiness is a very deplorable case and condition; but all such as are without the pale of the christian church, without the bond of the covenant of grace, without the offer of a Saviour in the gospel, they must be without hope, even in this life, and so are of all men most miserable. 4. They were “without God in the world;” that is, without the knowledge of the true God, without worshipping of him as God, without any alliance or trust in him, without performing any obedience to him: not that the Ephesians, and other Heathens lived without all sense of a deity, for they worshipped false gods abundantly; but they lived without any sense or sensible apprehension of the majesty and holiness of the true God: now this is to live without God in the world; and verily, such a life is worse than death. The apostle calls all the Gentiles, not only the barbarous and savage, but the best polished and civilized nations, Atheists, because they wanted the right knowledge of God by and through a Mediator: there is no knowing God acceptably, except we know him in Christ, and approach unto him by Christ. In this affecting manner doth our apostle set before the Ephesians their dark and dismal state, whilst Gentiles, and before brought into the christian church, by preaching the gospel of Christ unto them: “they were without Christ, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world.” God grant that every unregenerate sinner may think of it, till his heart and soul are affected with it!

13 But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who sometimes were afar off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

The apostle having set before the Ephesians the black and dark part of their lives, before the conversion to christianity, in the foregoing verse; comes here in this to acquaint them with the blessed change which was made in their state, and by whom. Now, says he, in or by Christ Jesus, “ye, who were sometimes afar off,” namely, from Christ, his church, his covenant, from saving hope, and from God himself, are made as nigh as the Jews, and have as much right to expect the aforesaid benefits as they, the blood of Christ having purchased them for you, and sealed them to you.—“Ye, that were before afar off, are now made nigh by the blood of Christ.” Where note, That persons who are most remote, and at the farthest distance from God, are sometimes unexpectedly brought home unto him; “Ye, who were afar off, are now made nigh.” Note, 2. That it is owing to the blood of Christ, to his death and sufferings, that any soul is brought into a state of nearness unto God, and finds acceptance with him: “Ye are made nigh by the blood of Christ.”

14 For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us;

15 (Having abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the law of commandments, contained in ordinances; for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace:

He is our peace; that is, 1. He is the mediator of our peace, the peace-maker betwixt God and man. 2. He is our peace; that is the purchaser of our peace. 3. He is our peace; that is the establisher of our peace. All which is to be understood not only of peace betwixt God and man, but also betwixt man and man who hath made both one; that is, both Jews and Gentiles one church. Here note, That there was a very great and deep-rooted enmity betwixt Jews and Gentiles, until Christ purchased their peace and reconciliation. The Jews derided, scorned, and hated the Gentiles, as unclean, compared them to dogs and swine; the Gentiles they reproached the Jews for circumcising their flesh, esteemed them, of all nations, the worst; and would hold their nose at the Jews when they met them, and cry O fatentes Judæi! O ye stinking Jews! and turn away their eyes from them. Learn, from hence then, That the uniting of both Jew and Gentile into our church, was one blessed effect and sweet fruit of the purchase of Christ's blood; Christ's offering of himself was intended as a sacrifice for enmities between man and man, as well as for enmities between God and man; “He is our peace who hath made both one.” Observe next, What Christ hath done in order to his making peace between Jew and Gentile: 1. He has abolished the ceremonial law, called here a partition-wall between the Jews and the Gentiles; in allusion, no doubt to that wall in Solomon's temple, which separated the court of the Jews from that of the Gentiles, that they could neither come at, nor look at one another. So that this partition-wall being said to be broken down, intimates to us, that Jew and Gentile, who before had two manners of religious, the one in and under a covenant with God, the other other afar off, and without God, yet now by Christ are both adopted into the same church, partakers of the same covenants, incorporated into the same faith, intitled to the same glory. 2. Christ has abolished the enmity and perpetual strife which was occasioned between Jew and Gentile, upon the account of the observation of the ceremonial law, and the ordinances thereunto belonging; “He hath abolished the enmity, that is, the ceremonial law, which made the enmity between them. The ceremonial law was the cause and continuer of that enmity which was betwixt Jew and Gentile; this is called “the law of commandments contained in ordinances;” because Almighty God did actually separate the Jews from all the world, by giving them ordinances and commandments, judicial and ceremonial laws, containing many visible and external observances, which forbade them to communicate with the Gentile world. Now Christ being come in the flesh, all those observances ceased, and those legal ordinances vanished away; all nations became blessed in Christ, and Jews and Gentiles became one church, both alike the people of God, both admitted equally into covenant, and both alike blessed. Here note, That the moral law, summarily comprized and comprehended in the ten commandments, was no part of the partition-wall between Jew and Gentile; nor did the death of Christ abrogate this law, or is it at all abolished; but it was the law of ceremonies only, which the sufferings and death of Christ put an end unto; for when he died, they all vanished; as the shadow disappears when the substance is come.

16 And that he might reconcile both unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby;)

17 And came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh.

18 For through him we both have an access by one Spirit unto the Father.

Our apostle had declared in the foregoing verses, that one end of Christ's death was to make peace between Jew and Gentile; here he assures us, a second end was, to make peace between God and man; that he might reconcile both Jew and Gentile thus united, to an offended God. This he did by the sacrifice of himself upon the cross, whereby he did destroy that enmity which was betwixt God and man, by undergoing the punishment of sin, the cause of that enmity. Learn hence, That in order to our reconciliation with God and being at peace with him, a price was paid by Christ upon the cross, to satisfy divine justice and atone divine displeasure. Observe, next, That Christ having purchased peace, he came and preached peace both to Jews and Gentiles: to the Gentiles, said here to be afar off, and to the Jews that were nigh: But how did Christ preach to the Gentiles; where do we read that he ever did so? Ans. Though he did not in his own person preach peace to the Gentiles, yet he gave commission to the apostles to preach to them, Matt. xxviii. and they and their successors, pursuant to such commission, did preach peace unto them, even to them that were afar off, and them that were nigh. Learn hence, That when the ministers of Christ do come in his name, and by a commission received from him, to preach peace, and offer terms of reconciliation unto lost sinners, it is all one as if Christ himself did come and preach; he expects the same readiness from them in receiving the message, as if it were delivered to them from his own mouth; and will treat the despisers of his ministers, and the contemners of their message, as if the affront were offered immediately to his own person. Observe, 3. The apostle's argument to prove that the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, were effectually called, by the preaching of the gospel, to partake of peace and reconciliation with God; because they had both equal access and liberty to approach unto God in all holy duties, as unto a father, by the manuduction of the Spirit; through him, that is, through Jesus Christ, we, both Jews and Gentiles have access, that is, liberty of approach, by one and the same Spirit, unto the Father. Learn hence, that through Jesus Christ, all believers, of what denomination soever, have access to God by the Spirit of Grace. Quest. What doth this access to the Father denote? Ans. It supposes a preceding distance between God and us, both a natural and a moral distance, as creatures, and as sinners: it denotes a propinquity and nearness unto God in opposition to this distance, and that our approach to God is free and voluntary, friendly and complacential, peculiar and privileged, fruitful and advantageous. Quest. 2. In what respects have believers access to God as to a father? Ans. In this life they have access to the Father's heart, and love to the Father's ear and audience, to the Father's care and protection; to his providing care, to his guiding and counselling care, to his comforting and supporting care, but especially to his sanctifying care. Quest. 3. Through whom have we this access to God? Ans. Through Jesus Christ, through his mediation and manuduction, we have access to God's heart, to God's ear, to his fatherly care on earth, and to his gracious presence in heaven. Quest. 4. What influence the Holy Spirit gives unto this access unto the Father. Ans. It is by his influence that they are at first brought home to the Father; he prepares them for this access unto the Father; he stirs up holy affections, and enkindles holy desires in them after God, and helps them to make improvement, an holy, fruitful and advantageous improvement of all their access unto God.

19 Now, therefore, ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God;

20 And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone;

21 In whom all the building fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord:

22 In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit.

Our apostle began this chapter, with setting before the Ephesians the horror and dread of their heathenish state before converted to christianity; here he closes the chapter with an account of that glorious and blessed state which the christian religion, embraced by them, had translated them into; "Now, ye are no more strangers, but fellow-citizens, &c." Where observe, 1. Their present happy condition is set forth, both negatively and positively; negatively by showing what they were not, neither strangers nor foreigners, but freemen and fellow-citizens, &c. Where it must be remembered, that all the nations of the world, except the Jews, were called strangers to the God of Israel, but the Jews were all propinqui, his neighbours, or near ones; but, says the apostle, there is now no such difference, for the believing Gentiles are equally admitted with the believing Jews, to the privileges of the New Jerusalem, and are fellow citizens with one another; they are no longer aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, but freemen. Observe, 2. The apostle sets forth their happy condition positively, under a threefold similitude; namely, that of a city, that of an household or family, and that of an edifice or building. Note, 1. Our apostle compares the christian church (of which the Ephesians now were members) to a city, and shows, that themselves, as believing Gentiles, had a right to all the privileges and immunities of that city, as well as the Jews: who accounted themselves the only free members of it: "Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints;" that is, the patriarchs and prophets, and all other members of the church of the Jews; ye are free denizens, burgesses, and enfranchised citizens, with the rest of that holy society, ye are all members of the Holy catholic church. Note, 2. Our apostle compares the christian church to an household or family; "Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." Now this metaphor intimates a greater degree of nearness to, and communion with the church, than what the former metaphor did imply, there being a straiter tie of familiarity and friendship between the members of a family, than between the members of a city. Whence we learn, That the church of Christ under the gospel, is God's great household or family, in a peculiar manner admitted to an intimate communion with him, in a special way provided and cared for by him; and every sincere christian becomes a member of this blessed family, and enjoys all the privileges thereof: "Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." Note, 3. St. Paul proceeds yet farther, and compares the church of Christ to an edifice, or stately building: "Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, &c." Now this similitude holds forth unto us, still a farther degree of nearness to, and communion with, God and his church, than the former: what can be more closely united, and more strictly joined together, than stones in a building? And our apostle calling the church an holy temple, seems to allude to Solomon's temple, which was a type of the christian church, as the tabernacle was of the Jewish church; the tabernacle was ambulatory and changeable, made of decaying and corruptible materials, and so fitly typified the Jewish dispensation, which was temporary and transient; the temple was made of durable and rich materials, and thereby a proper type of the christian church, which is called "a kingdom that cannot be shaken." But, observe further, How our apostle doth describe this stately edifice, this spiritual building, the christian church, these several ways; 1. By its foundation which it stands upon, namely, the apostles and prophets; that is, upon the doctrine of the prophets and apostles, not upon their persons; Christ himself being the personal foundation and chief corner-stone. Learn, That though Christ himself be the builder of, and the chief corner-stone in his church, yet he employs his ministers now, as he did the prophets and apostles of old, to lay the foundation, and carry on the superstructure, and no one apostle had a privilege in this above another; and therefore, for the Pope, as St. Peter's successor, to style himself the Foundation of the catholic church, is an imprudent presumption; for no more is here said of Peter, than is said of all the apostles and prophets. 2. The church, as a spiritual building or temple, is here described by the unity and compactness of its parts, "in whom all the building fitly framed together;" that is, all the members of the church, are by faith firmly joined to Christ as the foundation, and to one another by love, and their unity is both their strength and their beauty,

(No. 55.)

3. This building is described by its growth and perpetual increase, "it groweth unto an holy temple." The church groweth two ways, by an addition of new and particular converts, and by an addition of new graces in every particular convert: where remark, how this spiritual edifice, the church of Christ, differs from all other buildings; both the whole of it, and all the individual parts of it, are endued with life, a life flowing from Christ the foundation, a life far from a state of perfection, "in whom all the building groweth;" all a christian's life and spiritual growth flow from his union and communion with Christ; "in him all the building groweth." 4. This building, namely, the christian church, consisting both of Jews and Gentiles, is here described by the end and design of Christ in erecting this growing edifice; namely, to be an holy temple unto God, wherein now, (as in the material temple of old) he may manifest his gracious presence, and be perpetually worshipped, glorified, and served: the whole church, or collective body of believers jointly, and each believer severally and apart, are a spiritual and holy temple unto the Lord, in and by whom all spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise are offered up, and all duties of new and sincere obedience acceptably performed.

CHAPTER III.

The design and scope of our apostle, in this chapter, is, to let the Ephesians know, that he was now a prisoner at Rome for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles in general, and consequently, that they (the Ephesians) had no cause to be offended at his present sufferings, in particular, especially considering that his calling to that work and office, was by divine revelation: and that he was not only extraordinarily called to it, but qualified and fitted for it: from all which considerations, he exhorted them from fainting upon the score of his sufferings, which he gladly underwent for so good a cause, and in discharging so honorable an employment; accordingly, he thus bespeaks them:

FOR this cause, I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles;

"For this cause," that was, for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles in general; and in particular, for asserting, that the privileges of justification and salvation by Christ, belonged equally to the Gentiles as well as the Jews, though they were not circumcised: for this cause I was persecuted and imprisoned by the Jews. Where observe, The apostle styles himself Christ's prisoner, "I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ;" he was at once Christ's prisoner, the Jews' prisoner, the Romans' prisoner, the Gentiles' prisoner; Christ's prisoner, as suffering for his gospel; the Jews' prisoner, as suffering by their accusation; the Romans' prisoner, as suffering by their sentence; the Gentiles' prisoner, as suffering for his labors in order to their salvation. Lord, what a title of honor is here put upon the apostles! "I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ;" his imprisonment for Christ was verily a greater honor, and matter of higher glorying, than his rapture in the third heavens.

2 If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to you-ward:

3 How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery, (as I wrote afore in few words;

Observe here, 1. The title given to the gospel; it is styled "the grace of God;" partly, because the glad tidings which the gospel brings, are the effect and product of God's grace and favor, and partly because the gospel is the instrument and means of working grace in the souls of persons. Observe, 2. The title given to St. Paul's apostleship, he styles it "the dispensation of the grace of God;" because God had commissioned him to declare and dispense the gospel of grace to them; Christ's ministers are the dispensers of his mind to the children of men. Observe, 3. The title here given to the calling of the Gentiles; he styles it a mystery. The calling of the Gentiles to salvation by faith in Christ, without the works of the law, was a mystery hid from ages. Observe, 4. The way and manner how St. Paul came by the knowledge of this mystery; it was divine revelation from heaven; ver. 3. "How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery." The mystery of man's redemption in general, and of the calling of the Gentiles in particular, to the participation of that grace, was made known by divine revelation to the apostles, by God himself. The truth is, the redemption of a lost world, by the incarnation, death, and passion of the Son of God, is so stupendous and surprising, so wonderful and amazing, that the very thought of it had been the highest blasphemy, if God himself had not revealed it.

4 Whereby when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ.)

5 Which in other ages, was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit;

6 That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel.

Our apostle here proceeds in setting forth this great mystery of man's redemption in general, and the calling of the Gentiles in particular; he styles it a mystery. 1. Now, a mystery is a purpose and decree of God, unknown to, and unsearchable by, man, unless first by revelation discovered and made known by God himself; such a mystery was the whole gospel in general, and this article concerning the calling of the Gentiles in particular. 2. St. Paul styles it a mystery, "in other ages" of the church "not made known," that is, not so plainly and clearly, unto the sons of men, Jews or Gentiles; for the calling of the Gentiles was foretold and prophesied of under the Old Testament, but darkly and obscurely; the time when, the manner how, and the means by which were not understood, till now the Holy Spirit of God revealed it to the apostles and evangelical prophets under the New Testament. 3. The apostle amplifies and sets forth the glorious excellency of that mystery which here he had mention of; namely, that the Gentiles should have access into the church, with an entrance by the door of circumcision be joint heirs of the heavenly inheritance with all believers, and together with the Jews, taken into the bond of the covenant; and finally, that they were brought into this happy estate by the preaching of the gospel, and by believing and obeying of it. Learn hence, That the calling of the neglected and despised Gentiles to the knowledge of Christ, and the participation of the gospel privileges with the Jews, was a great mystery, awfully to be admired, and a glorious mercy, with all thankfulness to be acknowledged; "That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs of the same body, &c.

7 Whereof I was made a minister according to the gift of the grace of God, given unto me by the effectual working of his power.

8 Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ;

9 And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ.

As if the apostle had said, "Of this gospel it pleased God to make me a successful minister or dispenser, furnishing me with ordinary and extraordinary gifts and graces from his Holy Spirit, for that weighty work and service; unto me, even unto me I say, was this special favor granted, though unworthy, (being "less than the least" of all saints, because once a great persecutor,) yet unto me was the apostolic office committed, to preach unto the Gentiles the incomparable and incomprehensible riches of God's mercy towards them in Christ, in receiving them fully, freely, and finally, into covenant with himself; and to make known unto all men what is the communion or fellowship of this mystery; namely, that the Gentiles with the Jews should have one faith, one Lord, one hope, one heavenly inheritance; which was a mystery hid in the secret intention and decree of God, until discovered by divine revelation." Observe here, 1. How careful the apostle was to assert his authority and apostolical commission, "I was made a minister; and how he refers his calling immediately to the grace of God, "unto me was this grace given." It was the grace of God converted him, it was the grace of God revealed the gospel to him, and that called him to reveal it unto others. Observe, 2. How the apostle attributes the success of his ministry to the power of God, and not to his own endeavours, "by the effectual working of his power." The grace of God in him, and the power of God accompanying him, was effectual to the conversion of very many sinners, and to the producing of great signs and miracles which were wrought by him. Observe, 3. The noble subject of St. Paul's sermons, what it was he preached amongst the Gentiles; namely, the unsearchable riches of Christ;" riches imply abundance, and abundance of such things as are of worth and value; in Christ are riches, all riches eminently and transcendently found; riches of grace, and riches of glory; and these are called unsearchable; not as if it were unlawful to search after them, but because after our utmost search after them, we can never fully discover them. Learn hence, That there are such mazes, such mysteries of love and goodness in our Lord Jesus Christ, as, though it be our duty to be continually searching after them, yet we can never, by our utmost searching, fully discover them and find them out. Observe, 4. The humble and low opinion which this great apostle had of himself; he styles himself not barely the least, but "less than the least of all saints;" he was, in his own esteem, as little as could be "less than the least;" a double diminutive; a comparative made of a superlative: thus he debases himself, upon consideration of his former enmity against Christ and his church: lower he could not lie than he lays himself; the greatest and chiefest of sinners; the least, yea, less than the least of all saints; growth in grace, and increase in humility, accompany one another.

10 To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places, might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God.

Observe here, 1. The title given to the holy angels, they are styled principalities and powers, because God makes use of their powerful ministry in governing the kingdoms and principalities of this world; and they are said to be in heavenly places; not as if they were never here upon earth below, but because the ordinary place of their residence is in heaven above. Observe, 2. That the angels are not omniscient and all-knowing. The wisdom of God in the work of redemption was a secret unknown to the glorious angels; they did not know it until God made it known unto them. Observe, 3. That God did not make the mystery of the gospel or the glorious work of redemption, known unto angels immediately, but occasionally; by the revelation of it first to the church, and by the church to them: as if the apostle had said, "Had it not been for the light given to, and spread abroad in the church, the angels had been in the dark about the mysteries of the gospel to this day." "By the church is made known unto the angels the manifold wisdom of God."

Quest. But how could the church communicate this knowledge to angels? Ans. Either the angels did gather up their knowledge of these mysteries, by the ministry of the apostles preaching them to the world in a way of information, or else they saw, as in a glass, the manifold wisdom of God, and the dispensations of his mercy, grace and goodness towards his church, in a way of contemplation. Observe, 4. The title here given to the work of redemption; it is styled, "The manifold wisdom of God." O, how full of variety was the wisdom of God in man's recovery! It is of many folds and plaits, manifold in kind, manifold in degrees, manifold in its administration; there are manifold secrets in this wisdom, some less perfectly seen, some more perfectly understood, and some that will never perhaps be thoroughly understood: doubtless there are some secrets in the wisdom of God, which it belongs only to God to understand and know. Blessed be God, that so much of the manifold wisdom of God, in the glorious work of redemption, is made known unto us, as will eternally ravish and delight us.

11 According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord:

12 In whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of him.

13 Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory.

Our apostle here shows, 1. That whatever the wisdom of God has done in the work of redemption, was from all eternity purposed to be done, and that our Lord Jesus Christ was the person by whom God would in time execute his eternal purpose; "According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus." Next, he shows the great and gracious privilege which all believers are admitted to the participation of, by and through our Lord Jesus Christ: namely, boldness, access and confidence; "in whom we have boldness and access with confidence through the faith of him." Access; that is, a liberty of approaching to God as a father: Boldness; that is, a freedom of speech in delivering our heart, our whole mind and heart, to him in the duty of prayer, and thanksgiving: Confidence; that is, a well grounded persuasion, that both our persons and performances shall find acceptance with God. All which privileges are enjoyed by the exercise of faith in Christ: "We have boldness, access, and confidence through the faith of him." Lastly, he exhorts them not to faint under, or be discouraged at his present sufferings, much less to backslide from christianity upon that account, seeing that his tribulations were both profitable, and also glorious and honorable; "I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory."

Observe here, 1. That new converts to christianity are subject to fainting and drooping discouragements at the news of sufferings. Observe, 2. That persecution for the gospel of Christ, is a trial, not only to those who are under it, but to those that hear of it. St. Paul here was more afraid of the Ephesians' fainting under their sufferings than he was of his own fainting, and therefore he doth carefully guard against it; I desire you not to faint at my tribulations." Observe, 3. That the persecutions and afflictions, the hardships and severities, which the ministers of Christ do for the most part endure and undergo, are for the sake of their people; they might shift off and shun the cross as well as other men, did not love to the souls of their people engage them to suffer the sharpest persecution for their sake: I desire ye faint not at my tribulations for you; that is for preaching the gospel to you. Observe, 4. From those words, "My tribulation which is your glory." So honorable it is to suffer, that not only the ministers of Christ themselves, who suffer, are thereby honored, but the people of their charge also are greatly honored, thereby; it testifying God's high esteem of such a people, in sending his ministers not only to teach and instruct them, but to suffer with them, yea, even to die for them. Which consideration ought not only to prevent our people's fainting at our sufferings, but should make them glory in them, and take encouragement from them: "My tribulation," saith St. Paul, "is your glory."

14 For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

15 Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named,

16 That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man.

Our apostle having exhorted the Ephesians, in the foregoing verse, not to faint at his tribulations for the gospel, here he puts up a most affectionate prayer to God for them on the same account; "For this cause," and in order to this end, "I bow my knees, &c." Now in this affectionate and most excellent prayer of the apostle, we have several particulars worthy of our notice and remark. As, 1. The humble gesture which the apostle used in his prayers, "I bow my knees;" thereby expressing the fervent frame of his heart in prayer. Learn hence, That the gestures which we use in prayer should be such as may best express our reverence of God, and denote our profound humility before him. Observe, 2. The person prayed to, God, under the appellation of a Father, and in particular, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; "I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Blessed be God, that believers and Christ have one and the same Father; he by nature, we by grace; he by eternal generation, we by gracious adoption. By virtue of this relation, we may expect to be heard in prayer, as Christ was, and to be helped in our diseases, as Christ was, and in God's good time to be possessed of the inheritance of children, as Christ is. Observe, 3. The title given to the church, it is styled God's family, his household; all the saints on earth, whether Jews or Gentiles, and all the glorified angels and saints in heaven, do make but one family. There is but one catholic or universal church, comprehending all its members, both in heaven and earth; and all within the church are of one kindred and line, descending of one common Father; and his family is named, that is, united under Christ, he being the head of all. Observe, 4. The mercy prayed for, ver. 16. "That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man." Where note, 1. The mercy itself, spiritual strength, strength in the inner man, to enable them to bear afflictions, to endure persecutions, to resist temptations, to grapple with all their spiritual enemies in the progress of their christian course. Note, 2. The fountain from whence all spiritual strength flows, and that is, from the Holy Spirit, "strengthened with might by his Spirit." It is the Holy Spirit of God that constantly renews the believers' strength, by upholding and actuating their graces, which otherwise would fade and wither, would languish and die. So many and so mighty are our spiritual enemies that we have to wrestle with, and strive against, that except we be under-propped and strengthened by the Almighty power of the Holy Spirit in the inner man, we cannot keep our ground, and much less get ground of our enemy, but shall become an easy prey to every temptation. Note, 3. The moving, impelling, or impulsive cause from whence the foregoing mercy is expected to proceed and flow, namely, from the rich and glorious mercy of God; "God grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened." In all our approaches to God for any blessings, especially for spiritual blessings, it is our duty to direct the eye of our faith to that inexhaustible fountain of rich mercy, and almighty power in God, whereby he is both able and willing to bestow upon us whatever is agreeable to his holy will. "God grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man."

17 That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye being rooted and grounded in love,

18 May be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height;

19 And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.

Our apostle here proceeds with affectionate ardor to pray for further spiritual blessings on the behalf of his beloved Ephesians; 1. He prays that Christ may dwell in their hearts by his most holy faith. The phrase of dwelling in us, imports a very close and intimate union between Christ and believers; he dwells in them subjectively and effectively, by his gracious influences, by his powerful assistances, by his quickening impressions. The holy Spirit is the bond of union on Christ's part, and faith on our part. 2. He prays that they may be rooted and grounded in love; that is, they might be so deeply possessed with a sense of God's love, that they might find their hearts inflamed with love to God, and one towards another; and that love might be the very habit of their souls, and rooted nature in them. 3. He prays that the Ephesians may comprehend what is the "breadth, length, depth, and height" of the love of God, and the mysteries of the gospel; intimating to us, that we are not to content ourselves with a superficial view of God's free love in Christ, but to make an accurate inspection into all the dimensions of it; to view it in its breadth, as extending to all ages, Jewish and christian; in its length, as reaching from eternity to eternity; in its depth, as it stoops down to succour and relieve the vilest and the greatest, if penitent sinners; in its height, whereby it reaches up to heaven, and entitles us to the joy and felicity of the saints above. Verily, the love of God, in Christ to a lost world, is so vast and boundless, so rich and matchless, exceeding not only our comprehension, but conceptions also, that not only the natural man cannot understand it, but the renewed man also is unable to fathom it, but must be daily endeavouring to take dimensions of it; for the love of Christ surpassingly transcends the knowledge of the most illuminated believer; it surpasses natural knowledge, apostolical knowledge, yea, angelical knowledge; "that ye may be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth and height." 4. He prays that they may know the superlative love of Christ, which surpasseth all human understanding and knowledge, implying that the love of Christ to a lost world is a transcendent love; that the knowledge of it may be attained in some measure; that it is our duty, to seek after it, and search into it; but after all, we can never fully comprehend it: what created understanding can know what is unknowable, or comprehend what is incomprehensible? Learn, There are such dimensions and degrees in the love of Christ to sinners, which, at least in this present and imperfect state, do surpass all comprehension and conception; also, that love whereby he took our nature upon him, that love whereby he took our sins upon him, is so stupendous and amazing, that the holy angels lawfully admire it, but even their enlarged capacities cannot fully comprehend it. 5. He prays that they might be filled with all the fulness of God: that is, with such measures of grace, knowledge, faith, holiness and love, which God hath appointed believers unto, and they are capable of in this life. Note here, 1. That there is a fulness in God, which we neither can be filled with, nor may we strive to be filled with: God is essentially full, originally full, independently full, inexhaustibly full of all holiness and grace; now this fulness of his is undiminishable and consequently incommunicable. Note, 2. That there is a fulness of God which we may, and therefore ought to pray and endeavour to be filled with, namely, to be filled with the knowledge of God, to be filled with the grace and Spirit of God, to be filled with the wisdom of God, that we may know God more, serve him better, glorify him on earth, and be glorified with him in heaven: in a word, we may pray for, and strive to be filled with such a measure of the fulness of God and his grace, as God shall see fit to give, and as our capacities are or may be prepared to receive; God is not straitened towards us, let us not be straitened in ourselves; Open thy mouth wide, says God, and I will fill it. Blessed be God for a present fulness of sufficiency, and for the hopes of a future fulness to satiety.

20 Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us.

21 Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

Observe here; 1. How our apostle closes his prayer with thanksgiving and praise; intimating to us, that praise should evermore conclude that work which prayer began, and that spiritual blessings principally deserve our praises. Observe, 2. The title which St. Paul's faith fixed upon, in his approaches to God in prayer and praise, and that is, his omnipotence or almighty power. In all our addresses to God, it is our duty to have such apprehensions, and use such expressions concerning him, as may most strengthen our faith. He is able, saith the apostle, "to do exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think." Note here, The comprehensive fulness of this expression, he is able to do for us, to do abundantly for us, to do exceeding abundantly for us, above what we ask, yes, to do exceeding abundantly for us, above what we can think as well as ask. O! how narrow, short and poor are our prayers, compared with the power of God! It is much that the tongue can ask; it is more that the mind can think: but the Lord is able to do for us, not only above what we can ask, but abundantly above what we can think. Lord, what an everlasting spring of comfort is this! what encouragement doth it administer to thy people! what encouragement to prayers, what encouragement in prayer! They pray to him who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that they can ask or think. Observe, 3. That it is not God's absolute power that St. Paul bottoms his faith in prayer upon, (for God can do many things that he never will do,) but it is his operative, promised, and formerly experienced power, "according to the power that worketh in us:" that is, according to that infinite and almighty power which God had exerted and put forth in their first conversion: this power was, and is a main prop for confidence in prayer. Learn hence, That the experience we have had of God's gracious power in working in us, by converting and quickening grace, may and ought to confirm our faith, that he will do exceeding abundantly for us, above what we can expect, yea, above what we can ask or think, when we are upon our knees in prayer before him. Observe, 4. The concluding doxology: "To him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen." Where note, 1. The divine praise given to Almighty God, namely, that of glory; To him be glory. Glory is the fountain of all excellency in the creatures: they all shine with beams borrowed from God's excellencies, as stars shine with the light they receive from the body of the sun: Almighty God is that infinitely glorious being, in whom all the excellencies and perfections in the creatures are eminently and transcendently found. Note, 2. The persons giving this glory unto God, the church; To whom be glory in the Church. True, it is the duty of all reasonable creatures to set forth God's glory; but only the church (holy and gracious persons alone) can perform it in an active and acceptable manner. Note, 3. The person through whom this duty becomes acceptable unto God, through Christ Jesus; "To him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus." The duty of praise and thanksgiving is what we owe to God for received favors, and indeed is all we have to pay him; but neither this, nor any other duty, can find acceptance with God, but by and through the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ. Note, 4. The duration and continuance of this duty of thanksgiving, "throughout all ages, world without end." As God shall never want glory from his church, so there shall always be a church to the end of the world, to give glory unto God, against which the gates of hell shall never prevail. Note lastly, In this divine doxology, after what manner, and with what affection this praise is given, intimated in the word Amen; World without end. Amen. This Amen, 1. Is a note of assent, and as such used by the Jews and Christians in all ages, at the end of prayers, to testify that they assented and agreed to what was put up to God in their name, and on their behalf. Again, 2. It importeth earnest desire. Hence Jeremiah (chap. xviii. 6.) said Amen to the prophecy of Hananiah, concerning the return of the captives to their land, to show how earnestly he desired that it might be so. 3. It imports steadfast faith, that the thing we pray for shall be granted; and accordingly, in the testimony of our desire, and assurance to be heard, we say, Amen, so be it; so let it be; so let it be, O Lord for ever.

CHAPTER IV.

Our apostle having, in the three foregoing chapters, managed the doctrinal part of this epistle, and treated of the great and deep mysteries of the christian religion, comes now (as his manner was in all his epistles) to the practical part of it; wherein he exhorts his beloved Ephesians to many excellent christian duties, which Almighty God expected from them, for all the distinguishing favors and privileges received from him. These duties are laid down, first, more generally, and then more particularly; the more general duties he begins with here in this chapter, ver. 1, 2.

I Therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called.

As if he had said, "Seeing the riches of God's grace in Christ have so abounded towards you, who were once Ephesian idolaters, but now converted Gentiles, I Paul, who am a prisoner for preaching the gospel, and for declaring this grace to you, do most affectionately exhort you, that ye live answerably to your profession, and according to the great obligation of your high and holy vocation from heathenism to christianity." Here note, 1. the person exhorting and beseeching, "I Paul, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you; I that am in bonds for Christ, I that am imprisoned for preaching the gospel to you, and for proselyting you by it to christianity." Nothing can more oblige a people to hearken to the exhortations of the ministers of Christ, than this consideration, that the truths which they deliver to them, they stand ready, both to suffer for, and to seal with their precious blood: "I the prisoner of the Lord beseech you." Note, 2. The comprehensive duty exhorted to, "That ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called;" worthy, that is, beseeching and becoming your holy profession, answerable to the dignity and obligation of your christian name; or, as he exhorteth the Philippians, chap. i. 20. Walk as becometh the gospel of Jesus Christ: but when may we be said so to do? Ans. When we walk according to the precepts and commands of the gospel; answerable to the privileges and prerogatives of the gospel; answerable to that grand pattern of holiness which the gospel sets before us, the example of Jesus Christ; answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords. Finally, to walk worthy of our vocation is to walk answerable to those high and glorious hopes which the gospel raises the christian up to the expectation of.

2 With all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love.

3 Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

Having exhorted them to the practice of their general duty; namely, to walk worthy of their holy vocation, in the former verse; in these two verses he presses upon them more special and particular duties, the chief of which is the duty of christian unity and concord, "endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit." The word signifies, a diligent, industrious, and united endeavour to preserve and keep, to support and maintain, the unity of the Spirit: an union of heart and spirit, an unity of faith and doctrine, an unity of judgment and affection, amongst all the professors of christianity. Observe, 2. The means by which this duty may be performed, and the unity of the Spirit maintained; namely, in or by the bond of peace; a peaceable disposition and temper, a peaceable deportment and behaviour, is the bond or ligament which binds christians together; whereas discord and division cuts that bond asunder. Observe, 3.

The special graces which the apostle recommends unto us, as excellent helps for preserving unity and peace: namely, humility, meekness, and mutual forbearance. 1. Humility, ver. 2. With all lowliness; that is, with all submissiveness of mind, and humble apprehensions of ourselves. What Tertullus said of Festus flatteringly, we may say of humility truly, By thee, O humility, we enjoy great quietness: the humble man is the peaceable man; only by pride cometh contention. 2. Meekness, which consists in a backwardness to provoke others, or to be provoked by others: as lowliness stood in opposition to pride, so meekness here stands in opposition to perverseness; with all lowliness and meekness. 3. Long-suffering and mutual forbearance: when christians are so far from resenting every wrong, and revenging every injury that is offered to them, that they can bear with one another's weaknesses, cover each other's infirmities, pity another's failings, and pardon each other's provocations. And this duty of mutual forbearance, ought to proceed from a principle of love to each other, "forbearing one another in love."

4 There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling;

5 One Lord, one faith, one baptism;

6 One Lord, and one Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all,

The apostle having exhorted the Ephesians to a strict unity and concord amongst themselves, next proceeds to enforce his exhortation with several arguments; and there are no fewer than seven summed up in the three verses now before us. 1. Says the apostle, there is one body, that is, one universal church, whereof ye are all members, 2. There is one Spirit, by which we are all animated and enlivened, and therefore keep the unity of the Spirit. 3. There is one hope of eternal life, by which we are all excited: our inheritance in heaven is the same; God doth not give one a double portion, or a party-colored coat, above another; but it is called an inheritance in light, because all are alike partakers of it, and sharers in it; the saints have all one hope, therefore should have all but one heart. 4. One Lord Jesus Christ, the Head of his church, the Saviour of the body, one whom we all profess to serve and obey: be ye therefore one, for your Lord is one. 5. There is one faith; that is, either one grace of faith whereby we believe, or one doctrine of faith which is believed; ye all believe in one and the same Saviour, and are all justified by him, after one and the same manner; therefore be ye also one; one in affection, as well as one in belief. 6. There is one baptism, one door by which we all enter into the church; both Jew and Gentile, bond and free, rich and poor, they are all one in Christ Jesus, and by one Spirit baptized into one body. 7. One God and Father of all things: and of all persons in Christ, whom we all expect one and the same salvation from: and this God is transcendently above all, and over all; his eye penetrates and pierces through you all, and he is in and among you all, as in his holy temple; therefore, such as endeavour to divide you, do as much as in them lies to divide God himself that dwells in you. This then is the sum of the apostle's argument: "Seeing ye are all member-of one body, partakers of one Spirit, expectants of one hope, having one Lord and common Saviour, one faith and belief, one and the same baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and one and the same God and Father in Christ; seeing you are one in all these particulars, be one among yourselves, and "endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." From the whole learn, That so many are the obligations, so strong the bonds and ties, which lie upon all the members of the church to be at unity among themselves; of one judgment, and of one heart; that such as violate these bonds, and culpably divide and separate themselves from communion with their brethren, Christ looks upon them no longer as members of his body, but as having rent and torn themselves from it.

7 But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ.

8 Wherefore he saith; When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.

9 (Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?

10 He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.)

11 And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers;

12 For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ:

13 Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

Our apostle here, in these verses, supplies us with another weighty argument to persuade us "to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace;" namely, that it was one great and chief end which Christ aimed at, in instituting the ministry of the word, in appointing the several officers in his church, of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, and also in the several gifts which he bestowed upon those officers; he assures us, it was Christ's great design, in and by all these, to bring his people, not only to faith and knowledge, but "to unity in the faith, and in the knowledge of the Son of God." And here, 1. Our apostle shows, that the diversity of gifts and graces, and the different measures and degrees of those gifts and graces bestowed by Christ upon the several members of the church, do all tend to preserve and to promote unity, they all coming from one and the same author, and being all given for one and the same end. "Unto every one of us is given grace, according to the measure of the gift of Christ." Learn hence, 1. That there is grace given by Christ to all his members, bearing some proportion and similitude to that grace which was conferred upon Christ himself. Learn, 2. That the design of Christ, in dispensing his grace in different measures and degrees, is the general good of his church, and particularly for preserving and promoting unity and love amongst his members; for seeing every one has his several graces from God, and no one has all, if one hath that grace which another wants, and if one wants that grace which another has, it shows that we want the help of one another, and therefore ought to love one another: this is the apostle's argument. Next he proceeds to prove that Christ has dispensed this diversity of gifts amongst his members; affirming, that in the day of his ascension into the highest heavens, "he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men." In which expression there is manifest allusion to the Roman conquerors, who in the day of their triumphs, scattered their magnificence and bounty, their largesses and donatives among their soldiers and subjects. Thus Christ, after he had triumphed over his own and his church's enemies upon the cross, rode in the triumphant chariot of his ascension into heaven, where he received gifts as the purchase of his blood, and shed forth those gifts of his Spirit in various kinds, upon his members in general, but upon his ministers in particular; which gifts, in the first ages of christianity, were extraordinary, as the gift of tongues and miracles, but now ordinary, and to continue to the end of the world. Now from the apostle's scope and design in this argument, we learn, That though diversity of gifts in the church, and divers measures of grace in and amongst the members thereof, are too often a sad occasion of division and strife, through the prevalency of envy and pride, and other dividing lusts, yet this great variety and diversity of gifts and graces, rightly considered, would be found to be one of the strongest ties and bonds of union, seeing we all stand in mutual need of the gifts and graces of each other. It is very evident, that our apostle's scope here is, to urge and enforce unity, from the diversity of gifts and graces which are amongst the members of the church; God forbid then, that they should occasion envy and animosities, strife and contention, rents and divisions. Our apostle's next argument for unity, is in the 11th and 12th verses, where he proves, that as the unity and education of the church, was the design of Christ in dispensing divers gifts and graces amongst the members of his church, so was it likewise his aim and end in instituting such variety of offices and officers in his church; for this end it was that he gave to his church by qualification and mission, first, apostles, sent forth first by his own mouth, to be witnesses of his doctrine and miracles, and then to preach the gospel throughout all the world, having received the Holy Spirit in an extraordinary manner, at the feast of Pentecost, to fit them for that service, Acts ii. 1, 2. Next, prophets, who explained the mysteries of faith, foretold things to come, and expounded the writings of the old prophets.— Then, evangelists, who were sent out by the apostles, some to plant, others to water the churches which they had planted, without being fixed to any particular place. Lastly, pastors and teachers, called also bishops and elders, who were set over the churches as guides and instructors. Learn, hence, 1. That it is Christ's special prerogative, as Head of the church, to institute and appoint such offices and officers in his church, as to his own wisdom seems meet for the edification and government of it. Learn, 2. That the great end and design of Christ, in instituting such variety of offices, and officers in his church, was, his church's unity, that by all ministerial helps and endeavours, his members might be compacted and knit together, and made one entire body; by the increase of sanctity, concord, and unity. "He gave some apostles, some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints (not for converting of sinners only) and for the edifying of the body of Christ." Observe lastly, The apostle declares how long the work of the ministry appointed by Christ for his church's edification and advantage, was to continue; namely, to the end of the world, to the day of judgment, till all come, by means of the same faith in Christ, and knowledge of him, unto a perfect man, and unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; that is, till the church, which is Christ's mystical body, shall be complete and perfect, and attain its full stature from infancy to full manhood. Learn hence, 1. That the church of Christ here on earth, is laboring for, and endeavouring after perfection in grace and knowledge, to come unto a perfect man, and to attain to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. 2. That the ministry of the word, is an ordinance of Christ's own appointment, to continue to the end of the world, in order to that purpose and design. 3. That none of the most eminent saints on earth (the most knowing and pious ministers of the gospel not excepted) are above ordinances, above the ministry of the word, above receiving benefit and advantage by the plain and practical preaching of it; even St. Paul here puts himself in, and reckons himself among the number of those who stood in need of the ministry of God's word, to bring him to a perfect man, and to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; he says not, till ye, but till we all come to a perfect man. Such people then, as think themselves above ordinances, are above God himself; none need ordinances so much, as those that want them least. And such hearers as turn their backs upon the preaching of the word, because they know more than the minister can teach them, and can better instruct the preacher, than be instructed by him, they betray their own ignorance both of the intent and end of the ministry of the word, and also of the state of their own hearts; for if their understandings want no light, do their affections need no warmth? Have you no graces to be perfected, no corruptions to be weakened, no good resolutions to be strengthened? If your knowledge be imperfect, as sure it is, do not your affections want a fresh excitement? Admit the despised preacher cannot be your instructor, yet sure he may be your remembrancer, and excite you to that duty which you know already perhaps better than you practise it.

14 That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the slight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive;

St. Paul, in these words, declares one special end for which the ministry of the word was instituted and appointed; namely, to preserve from error and seduction, to prevent instability of mind, and unsettledness of judgment, and to confirm persons in fundamental truths; "that we henceforth be no more children tossed to and fro, &c." Observe here, 1. The name which St. Paul gives to unstable persons, and unsettled professors, he calls them children; not in regard of age, but in respect of knowledge and understanding; children, is a word that denotes imperfection and weakness, instability and ungroundedness in knowledge. Observe, 2. How the unsteadiness of these professors is expressed by a double metaphor; the former is drawn from a wave of the sea, they are "tossed to and fro;" the latter is drawn from a light cloud hovering in the air, carried about from place to place; neither wave nor cloud have any consistency, but are both moving, if the least wind be stirring. Observe, 3. The cause of this instability, every wind of doctrine, professors that have no solid principles, every wind of doctrine, has power over them to drive them to and fro, every teacher can cast them into what mould he pleases, and blow them, like glasses, into this or that shape, at the pleasure of his breath. But why wind of doctrine? Because there is no solidity in it, but being wind in the preacher, it breeds but wind in the hearer, because of its variety and novelty, and because of its prevalency over untaught men. How suddenly, sometimes, is a family, a town, yea, a whole country, leavened with a particular error? Observe, 4. The character of those impostors and seducers that do thus unsettle and unhinge men, they use slight; a metaphor taken from gamblers, who with art and slight of hand, can cog the dice, and win the game. Seducers cheat with false doctrines, as gamblers do with false dice: cunning craftiness; the word signifies the subtlety and deep policy of the old serpent; implying, that seducers are old and cunning gamblers, skilful to deceive: "That lie in wait to deceive;" the word signifies an ambushment, or stratagem of war, implying, that all seducers' slight and craftiness is to this very end and purpose, that they may entrap and catch men within the ambush of their impostures. From the whole learn, That seducers and false teachers are craft-masters of slight and subtlety, and stratagems of deceit; they have artifices, ways and methods to take men unawares, and to make merchandise of the people; they wrest and rack the scriptures to make them speak what they please, not what the Holy Ghost intended: if all this art fails, their last device is, to recommend their doctrines upon some private pretended revelation, and uncommon impulse of the Holy Spirit; by all which methods they lie in wait to deceive.

15 But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ;

16 From whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that, which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love.

Our apostle had set forth the excellent end of the ministry, in the foregoing verse, for furthering our stability and steadfastness in grace; here he declares the admirable fitness of it for helping forward our proficiency and growth in grace. "Speaking the truth in love;" that is, cleaving to the truth of Christ's doctrine, and living in love with one another, you may grow up in Christ, by making progress in all christian graces, being united to him as members to the head. Here note, How the apostle draws a comparison between the natural and mystical members, and the increase of both: as there must be a fellowship betwixt the natural head and members, so must there be an union betwixt Christ, the spiritual head, and believers, his mystical members; and as there is further required, a mutual communion and fellowship of the members of the body within, and amongst themselves, in order to growth and increase; so must there be concord, love, and unity amongst believers, if they expect to see grace growing in themselves, or in one another. Are the members of the natural body severally distinct one from another, some principal, others ministerial, but all concurring to the service of the whole? So, in order to spiritual growth, must all the members of Christ's mystical body keep their rank and order, and act in their own sphere with spiritual wisdom and humility; the eye not doing the work of the hand, nor the hand the work of the foot, but every one in the calling wherein he is called, must there abide with God. Again, Is there a supply of nourishment from one member to another, according to the measure of every part in the natural body? So is there a supply from head to members in the mystical body, and from one mystical member to another; one is apt to teach, another ready to comfort, a third able to convince, a fourth willing to exhort, a fifth to advise and counsel: and all these, and every one of these, contributing all they can to the welfare and growth of the whole. Happy is it both for the natural and mystical body, when the members of both are subservient to each other, and contribute all they can to the mutual growth and improvement of one another, and especially for the benefit and advantage of the whole.

17 This I say, therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind;

18 Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart:

19 Who, being past feeling, have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness.

Our apostle having finished his grand exhortation to love and unity amongst all christians, and enforced it with the most weighty arguments and motives in the former part of the chapter; comes now, In the latter part of it, to press the Ephesians to the practice of particular duties. The first of which is this, to take special care, that being now converted christians, they walk no more like ignorant and unconverted heathens: Walk not as other Gentiles walk. Next, he gives particular instances how, and after what manner the Gentiles, in the black night of Paganism, did walk; namely, 1. In the vanity of their minds, following their own imaginations, and not any revelation from God, in the matters of his worship. 2. Having their understandings darkened, their minds void of saving knowledge. 3. They were alienated from the life of God, that is, from a godly life; they were strangers to the life which God commanded, which God approved, and which God himself lived. Here note, that holiness is called the life of God, because it is the life which God requires of us, it is the life which he works in us, it is the life whereby God liveth in us, the life whereby we live unto God; it is an ever-living life, not obnoxious to death, as the Ephesians were; so every carnal man, before conversion, is alienated from this life of God; he has no liking of it, no inclination to it, but prefers a life of sin before it. Lord, how many that are surrounded with the celestial beams of the gospel, are as impure and impenitent now, as these Gentiles were then in the black night of Paganism! 4. They were past feeling; their sottish stupidity had benumbed them, the flames of their lusts had seared their consciences to a desperate degree of hardness and insensibility; they were at once insensible of their sin, and of their danger by reason of sin. A dead conscience, and a desperately dissolute life, are inseparable companions. 5. "They gave themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness." Here see, how insensibility of sin begets insatiableness in sinning; they work uncleanness with insatiable greediness, who have once abandoned themselves to sin, especially to the sin of uncleanness. Lord, this was the deplorable case of the heathen world, before the light of the gospel did arise and shine upon them; but, alas! it is the case of multitudes that sit under the brightest beams of gospel light, they shut their eyes, and will not see; they extinguish all sense of immortality and a future state, and so abandon themselves to a life of brutish sensuality, working all uncleanness with greediness; but let them know assuredly, that though they live like beasts, yet they shall not die like them, nor shall their latter end be like theirs, the soul being under a divine ordination to an everlasting existence in a future state, in which it shall be eternally happy, or intolerably miserable, according as we manage our deportment in this present world.

(No. 56.)

20 But ye have not so learned Christ;

21 If so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus;

22 That ye put off concerning the former conversation, the old man which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts;

23 And be renewed in the spirit of your mind;

24 And that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

In these verses, 1. Our apostle acquaints the converted Ephesians, that the saving knowledge of Christ, which they had received, instructed them better than to practise such licentiousness and wickedness as the unconverted Gentiles wallowed in. But ye have not so learned Christ, that is the gospel of Christ. Nothing curbs sin, nothing cures sin, in a licentious sinner, like the doctrine of Christ revealed in the gospel; no moral precepts from the school of the heathens, which some so much magnify and applaud, can compare with this, which lays open the root of this accursed disease, and leads us to the remedy which the wisdom of God has appointed for its cure, even the blood of his own Son, then blessed be God for revealed religion. Observe, 2. The apostle acquaints them what the truth as it is in Jesus, that is, the doctrine of the gospel, doth direct them to, enjoin and require of them, namely, to put off the old man, that is, their former heathen conversation, and manner of life, say come; but this they had put off already, at their first conversion to christianity: by the old man, then understood the old corrupt nature, so called, because it is old as Adam, and derived from Adam, and which daily more and more corrupts and depraves us by its deceitful lusts, if it be not resisted and subdued. But this is not sufficient, that we put off the old man, unless we put on the new, and be renewed in the spirit of our minds after God; that is after the image of God, which consisteth in righteousness and true holiness. Note here, 1. That regenerating grace is called the new man, because the person has a new principle infused into him (says the pious Bishop Fell, upon the place,) which enables him to lead a new life. Regenerate men, then, are new men, they have a renewed and enlightened understanding, they have a sanctified and renewed will, renewed affections and desires: old things are passing away, and all things becoming new. Note, 2. That God himself is the pattern and exemplar, after which, and according to which, the new man is formed in the soul, "which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness:" what is godliness, but godlikeness, what is holiness, but the conformity of our natures to the holy nature of God, and the conformity of our lives to the will of God? Acts xiii. 22. I have found David a man after my own heart, who shall perform all my will. Note, 3. That holiness is not only the reforming of the outward man, but it is the renewing of the mind; and not only of the mind but of the spirit of the mind; by which understand, the highest and most refined faculties of the mind, that part which is most free from the dregs of sin, and which comes up nearest to God as the spirit of the mind and understanding doth; verily, not our minds only, but even the spirit of our minds needs renewing, because corruption is got into the highest powers and faculties of the soul, and because we must serve God with all our mind: and if so, with the spirit of our mind; and blessed be God, that regenerating and renewing grace is an universal principle, as sin was. Did sin invade the whole soul, all the powers and faculties of it, and deprive us of the divine image? It is the work of grace to restore our depraved natures to their primitive integrity. The renewed person is sanctified totus (though not totaliter); a new nature is found with him, which "after God is created in righteousness and true holiness."

25 Wherefore, putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour: For we are members one of another:

Our apostle closes this chapter with an exhortation to several duties belonging to the second table, namely, to abstain from lying, from anger, from a railing, from corrupt communication, from all bitterness of spirit, from malice and revenge, and to exercise brotherly kindness and mutual forgiveness. From whence note, That christians must make conscience of the duties of the second table, as well as of the first, and perform their duty towards their neighbour, as well as towards God, for the law is one copulative, God spake all these words: The authority of the lawgiver is despised in the violation of the least command: when therefore second-table duties are performed by us from arguments and motives drawn from the first table, that is, when in obedience to God's command, and with an eye at his glory, we perform our duty to our neighbour, this is both an argument of our sincerity, and also an ornament to our profession: "Wherefore put away lying, &c." Lying was a vice very common among the heathens: it is like the Ephesians, in their heathen state, had been very guilty of it, for they thought it lawful, when it was beneficial, to lie; and affirmed that a lie was better than a hurtful truth. Our apostle therefore exhorts them, now converted to christianity, to speak exact truth one to another; and adds a forcible reason for it, because they were members one of another; that is, of human society, which by lying is destroyed; falsehood dissolves the bond of human society. Learn hence, That there is no sin more unseemly in a christian, more inconsistent with grace, more abominable to God, more like unto the devil, more injurious and prejudicial to human society, than the sin of lying; fidelity towards each other, and mutual confidence in each other, being that which makes human society both safe and easy.

26 Be ye angry and sin not: let not the sun go down upon your wrath;

27 Neither give place to the devil.

Some understand these words only as a cautionary direction, and sense them thus: If ye be angry at any time, take heed that ye sin not, by exceeding due bounds; and if at any time it doth so, suppress it speedily, before the sun go down: this was a practice even amongst the heathens; before the sun went down they would shake hands and embrace one another; to the shame of christians, who gave place to the devil, according to the known proverb, Contubernalem habet diabolum, qui tectum petit iratus; he that goes angry to bed has the devil for his chamber-fellow, yea for his bed-fellow; nay, he lies not only in his bed, but in his bosom. Others understand the words as a precept and command. Be angry, but take heed of sinful anger: now the way to be angry and not sin, is to be angry at nothing but at sin; it is our duty to be angry, when we see others depart from their duty. Meek Moses, who was cool enough in his own cause, was not in God's; he has no zeal for God, that is not moved when he sees or hears God dishonored. Learn hence, 1. That anger being an affection implanted by God in the human nature, is not in itself evil or sinful, but in some cases, a necessary duty. Learn hence, 2. That there is an easy and ready passage from what is lawful, to what is sinful. Be angry, and sin not; implying, that it is a very easy matter to sin in our anger, and no easy matter to be angry and not to sin. Learn, 3. That it is very difficult, if not impossible to avoid sin in our anger, if we let anger hang upon our spirits, and continue with us; anger may pass through the heart of a wise man, but rests in the bosom of fools: anger against sin must continue, but continuance in anger will be sinful. To prevent the sin of immoderate anger these rules will be useful: 1. Desire not to hear what others say of thee, lest you want patience to bear what you hear; many tear themselves with anger, when they hear themselves torn with slander; we had better be in the dark concerning our own wrongs, than by knowing of them, wrong ourselves by passion or desire of revenge.

2. What you do hear said of you, interpret always in the most favorable sense; call it an infirmity, and distinguish between the action and intention, between what is spoken, and the intent of the speaker. 3. In and under all provocations, cast your eye upward: look up to God, and cast your eye inward, and see what you have deserved, though not at your neighbour's hand, yet at God's hand. Shimri gave David provocation to boil up his anger to the height of fury, 2. Sam. xvi. 5. but by eyeing God, how calm and meek was his spirit? Thus, lie angry and sin not.

28 Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labor, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth.

Observe here, 1. The sin dissuaded from, theft, and stealing. This the heathen nations counted no crime; they made no conscience, either openly or fraudulently, to take away their neighbour's goods. Therefore, says the apostle, let those of you, who in the time of your Paganism and unregeneracy, were given to stealing, now being converted to christianity, do so no more. Observe, 2. The remedy prescribed for the prevention of this sin, and that is, diligence and labor in some honest calling: let him labor, working with his hands. Idleness occasions poverty, brings men to want, increases their necessities, and then they betake themselves to indirect and unlawful means to supply them. Observe, 3. One special reason why persons should labor in the way of their calling, that they might have to give to him that needeth; not only that they may have wherewith to relieve their own wants, but the wants of others. Where note, That God expects charity from the hands of those who get their living with their hands: day-laborers, and such as have nothing to live upon but their work, must yet give their mite, their alms for the help of the indigent. Observe, 4. The restriction and qualification of this labor of the hands, he must work that which is good, that he may give to him that needeth: to relieve others with the gain of oppression, or with the hire of an harlot, is unacceptable; the matter of our alms must be goods righteously gotten, otherwise it is robbery, not righteousness.

29 Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers.

Here the apostle directs us how to manage our tongues, both negatively and positively telling us, what we should not speak, and what we should: Let no corrupt, rotten, filthy discourse come out of your mouth; such as have rotten lungs, have a stinking breath: filthy discourse argues a polluted heart: such noisome discourse is unsavory to an holy ear, and greatly offensive, contagious, and infecting to common and ordinary hearers. Next he tells them what they should speak, that which is profitable and edifying, and that which may minister increase of grace to the hearers: our speech should be so gracious and savory, as to discover grace wrought in our hearts, and be a means of working it in the hearts of others: elsewhere, St. Paul advises, that our speech be savory seasoned with salt, Col. iii. 6—Truth, holiness, and prudence, is the salt of our word: christians must not suffer their tongues to run at random in their ordinary discourse; it is not sufficient that they do not speak to evil purpose; but they must speak to edifying purposes: that which has a tendency to make the hearers some way or other either wiser or better: this the apostle calls, that which is good to the use of edifying.

30 And grieve not the holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption.

Observe here, 1. The title given to the Spirit of God, he is styled the holy Spirit, being essentially and infinitely holy in himself, and the author of all grace and holiness in us. —Observe, 2. The affection of grief, which is here attributed to the Spirit, not properly, but improperly; when we do that which would most certainly afflict and grieve him, were he a subject capable of grief, and when, upon provocations given on our parts, he carrieth himself towards us after the manner of a person grieved, namely, when we provoke him to suspend his influence, to withdraw his comforts, leaving us without any present sense or feeling of his assistances; he is also then grieved when he is opposed, interrupted, controled, and disturbed in his operations of grace and comfort upon our souls. Observe, 3. The argument used to enforce the exhortation, not to grieve the holy Spirit of God, because by it we are sealed to the day of redemption. But, what doth God's sealing his people by his holy Spirit intimate and imply? Ans. 1. It intimates that God has distinguished them from others. 2. That he has appropriated them to himself. 3. That he has put a value upon them, and a very high esteem. And, 4. It imports the irrevocable purpose of God for their salvation. Seals are for these uses, ends, and purposes: seals are for distinction, for appropriation, for confirmation, and argue a high valuation and precious esteem of the person or thing which the seal is put upon: "Grieve not the Spirit, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption," that is, the day of judgment.

31 Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil-speaking, be put away from you, with all malice:

32 And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

Our apostle had exhorted, in the former verse, not to grieve the holy Spirit of God; in the next verse, he acquaints us with the particular sins that would afflict and grieve him; namely, bitterness, that is, a secret grudge, and a smothered displeasure against our brother; wrath, or an impetuous fierceness of spirit, upon some real or apprehended injury; anger, an eager desire of revenge; clamor, loud threatenings or reviling language; evil-speaking, either of others, or to others; malice, a rooted enmity, the rage of the devil, and renders a man as like the devil, as any sin.

on this side hell: all those sins do exceedingly grieve the Holy Spirit, they make him both loathe and leave his lodgings. In the last verse, as a proper remedy against all the foregoing sins, he exhorts them to mutual kindness: Be ye kind one towards another: that is, of a sweet and loving disposition, affable and courteous to each other; neither carrying it loftily nor morosely, but affably and humbly; tender-hearted, having a compassionate sense of the miseries and infirmities of one another; forgiving one another whatever has been matter of provocation in each other, according to the example of God, who for Christ's sake has forgiven us. Learn hence, 1. That christians are obliged, by the laws of their holy religion, to forbear and forgive one another. Learn, 2. That they are obliged to forgive one another, as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven them. As God forgives us universally, freely, heartily, and sincerely, and when he has power in his hand to revenge, so should we in like manner forgive one another, even as God for Christ's sake, hath forgiven us.

CHAPTER V.

BE ye, therefore, followers of God, as dear children;

Our apostle having, in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, exhorted the Ephesians to mutual offices of love and kindness towards each other, in the beginning of this chapter, he makes use of several very cogent arguments to excite and quicken them thereunto: the first of which is drawn from the example of God, as he has been kind to us, and for Christ's sake forgiven us; let us therefore, be followers of him, not as our God only, but as our Father; "Be ye followers of God, as dear children." Where note, 1. The duty exhorted to, Be ye followers of God; that is, in all the excellencies of his communicable attributes, and particularly in the exercise of universal goodness and kindness, mercy and forgiveness. Note, 2. The argument exciting to this duty, as dear children; you are children, and who should children imitate but their Father? And you are dear children, will not you imitate such a Father? Learn from both, That such as lay claim to a relation to God, without imitation of him, are not children, but bastards: they may be of his family, but not of his household; of his family, by instruction, but not by descent: there is no implantation in Christ, without an imitation, both of the Creator and Redeemer, Heb. iii. 6. "Christ as a Son over his own house: whose house are we, if we hold fast, &c."

2 And walk in love as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savor.

Here we have a second argument urged to walk in love, one with, and one towards another, drawn from the example of Christ; he also, as well as God the Father, has loved us; and the instance given of his love, is the highest that ever was or can be given: he gave himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savor." Observe here, 1. The great duty of the law, [walk in love.] This implies the exercise of this grace, not barely to have it in the principle and habit, but to exercise and exert it in the act: and it implies the universal exercise of grace; whatever we do both to God and man must be done in love, 1 Cor. xvi. 14. "Let all your deeds be done with charity." Observe, 2. As the great duty of the law, to walk in love, so the great pattern of the gospel, as Christ also hath loved us. The particle, [as] hath first the force of an argument, and is as much as because Christ hath loved us; and it has also the force of a rule to direct us in the manner how we should love one another, with an [as] of identity, but not equality; not with the same degree, but with the same kind of love wherewith Christ hath loved us. But why hath, rather than doth love us; Why in the preter, rather than in the present tense? Ans. To denote both the priority of Christ's love, that he loved us before we loved him; yea, before we loved ourselves; nay, before we had any being in the world, we had a being in his love, even from all eternity. And also to denote the indubitable certainty of his love; he hath loved you; you need not doubt it, nor question it, he has given actual and undeniable proof of it; follow him from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven again, and you will find every step he took to have been in love: "Walk then in love, as Christ also hath loved us." Learn hence, 1. That our Lord Jesus Christ hath given an ample and full demonstration of his great and wonderful love unto his church and people. 3. That this love of Christ towards us, should not only be an argument and motive to excite and quicken us to walk in love one towards another, but also an exact rule and copy to direct and guide us in our walking. There were some incommunicable properties in Christ's love which we cannot imitate: as his love was an eternal love, an infinite love, a free love, without motive, and in despite of obstacles, a redeeming love; such cannot our love be one to another: but as Christ's love was an operative love, a beneficent love, a preventing love, a soul love, a constant love, thus we are to imitate it, and walk in love one towards another. Observe, 3. The high instance and expression which Christ has given of his love unto us. "He gave himself for a sacrifice unto God, &c." He gave: now gifts are expressions of love; he gave himself, that is more than if he had given the angels in heaven, and all the treasures on earth for us, more than the whole world, yea, than ten thousand worlds; he gave himself an offering and sacrifice, a voluntary sacrifice, a meritorious, efficacious, expiatory, and propitiatory sacrifice: and this for us, to be stuck and bled to death in our stead: and he gave himself a sacrifice to God, as an injured and offended God; to God, as a revenger of sin: to God as the guardian and giver of the law; to God, as the asserter of his truth in his threatenings; he appeared before God as sitting upon a seat of justice, that he might open to us a throne of grace. Lastly, For a sweet-smelling savor, that is, he gave himself with an intention to be accepted, and God received him with a choice acceptance; our sin had sent up a very ill savor to heaven, which disturbed the rest of God: Christ expels this ill scent by the perfume of his precious blood. Learn hence, 1. That the sacrifice and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ were very free and voluntary: he offered himself, and his offering was a free-will offering. Learn, 2. That this voluntary sacrifice and free-will offering of Christ, was acceptable to God, and efficacious for men, it was acceptable to God, because a complete satisfaction for sin's wrong; and efficacious for us, because a discharge from the obligation of sin's guilt.

3 But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named amongst you, as becometh saints;

The apostle, in this and the following verses, exhorts the Ephesians to shun several sins, which were frequently practised among the Gentiles before their conversion to christianity, as, first, fornication, and all sorts and degrees of uncleanness; this was looked upon as an indifferent action, and no sin at all, by the Pagan world. Next, he advises them to beware of covetousness, that is, all irregular and inordinate desires, and lusting after things forbidden in the general, and particularly all insatiable love of riches, which in trading cities (such was Ephesus) doth usually very much abound, which sins he earnestly desires may not be named amongst them, that is, not named with approbation, not named without reprehension; not named, that is, not committed by any of them, yea, not so much as named by them without detestation. And the argument offered to dissuade from these sins, is drawn ab indecoro, as not becoming saints, that is, converted christians, who profess separation from the world, and solemn dedication to God and Christ, and therefore ought to be holy in heart, chaste in mind, heavenly in desire, undefiled in body: a life of purity and chastity well becoming saints; they must be pure in heart, pure in tongue, pure in hand, pure in intention, pure in expression, pure in conversation, otherwise they answer not their name, nor walk according to their renewed nature: "Let no uncleanness be once named amongst you, as becometh saints."

4 Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient; but rather giving of thanks.

Here our apostle advises christians to guard against the sins of the tongue, to avoid all filthy discourse, and all foolish discourse, all scurrilous and obscene jesting, all excess in drollery, which is nothing but the sham of frothy wit; moderate mirth, by innocent and inoffensive jesting, is not here forbidden, but when we jest by tart reflexions upon the way, gesture, natural imperfections of others, especially when we furnish out a jest in scripture attire, and in a jocular humor make light and irreverent applications of scripture phrases. Lord! what an impious liberty do some men take, to bring forth scripture, as the Philistines brought forth Samson, only to make them sport. These men, ere long, will find Almighty God in earnest, though they were in jest when they played the buffoon with the most serious things in the world. Observe, farther, Our apostle's argument to dissuade from such talk, is this, they are not convenient; not convenient in themselves; not convenient for the speaker, not convenient for the hearers; for they poison instead of profit the company, and pollute both the minds and manners of the hearers. O, what a great and common instrument of sin is the mouth or tongue of man! The tongue of a good man is his glory, the tongue of a sinner is his shame; there is no member of the body that doth so much service for the devil as the tongue, especially in common conversation; then it is that men let their tongues run riot, then they utter oaths and blasphemies against God, censorious, opprobrious, slanderous words against their neighbour; to prevent all which, the apostle exhorts, in the last words of the verse, that when we meet together, we should rather recount the favors received from God, and bless him for them; But rather giving of thanks. As there is at all times, and in all places, cause of thanksgiving administered to us by God, so is it our duty to take all occasions and fit opportunities to excite both ourselves and others to the practice of it, who are naturally very averse and backward to it. From the whole, note, That so quick and easy is the passage from what is lawful and allowed, to what is sinful and forbidden, that it is a task of no small difficulty to keep within the bounds of lawful and allowed mirth, especially by recreating our spirits by pleasant and delightful discourse, so that we exceed not either in matter, manner, or measure. Well might St. James say, (chap. iii. 2.) "If any man offend not in word, he is a perfect man," intimating, that there are many, very many, that do thus offend; and such as do not, are christians of no common attainments, but great proficient in grace: persons of extraordinary measures both of piety and prudence.

5 For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God.

6 Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience.

7 Be not ye, therefore, partakers with them:

Our apostle, considering how exceeding common the fore-mentioned sins were among the Gentiles, and how ready persons were to esteem lightly of them, advises the Ephesians here not to entertain in their minds light thoughts of them, or to believe any libertines which should represent them as small and inconsiderable matters; for how can a little sin be committed against a great God? or that sin be accounted light which brings down the heavy wrath of God upon the person, and shuts him out of the kingdom of God? Note, here, 1. The description of heaven, it is a kingdom, for its eminency and glory, for its fullness and sufficiency, for its safety and security, for its duration and perpetuity, so called: and it is the kingdom of Christ, and of God, that is, either the kingdom of Christ who is God, or the kingdom of Christ by purchase, and the kingdom of God by free donation. But mark, The kingdom of Christ and of God, of Christ first, because there is no coming into the kingdom of God but by Christ; Christ is first named, because we enter by him into the kingdom, and in his right. Note, 2. The sins enumerated, which will assuredly shut persons out of this kingdom, and they are not external and corporeal sins only, as whoredom and uncleanness, but internal and spiritual, covetousness, which is idolatry - as a man may be guilty of adultery, and yet never touch a woman, and of murder, yet never strike his neighbour, so he may be guilty of idolatry, and yet never bow his knee to an idol: secret idolatry, soul idolatry, will shut out of heaven, as well as open idolatry. Any thing that has our highest esteem and regard, our extreme love and delight, and is the special object of our hope, our affiance and trust, of our fear and care, this we make our God: and thus the covetous man is an idolater, for he gives these acts of soul worship to the creature, to something in the world which is not God. Every natural man is an idolater; either the world, or some worldly lust, is his god: and no idolater can have, while such, an inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. Note, 3. The seasonable advice which St. Paul gives the Ephesians, and us in them, not to be partakers of other men's sins: Be not ye therefore, partakers with them, lest ye be also partakers with them in their plagues and punishments. Quest. But when may we be said to be partakers of other men's sins? Ans. When we consent to them, connive at them, rejoice in them, give counsel or command for them, by not hindering of them, by not publishing and punishing of them if in our power, by not mourning over them, but especially by joining with them in the sinful practice of them; all these ways are they partakers of other men's sins.

8 For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light;

Here the Ephesians are put in mind of the darkness and blindness of their heathen state, before the light of the gospel came among them; they were not only dark, very much in the dark, but darkness itself: he next acquaints them with their happy condition, by entertaining of the gospel of Christ, they thereby became light in the Lord, they were savingly enlightened by the Word and Spirit of God; and accordingly he urges them to walk answerably to their christian profession, walk as children of light. Note here, 1. That the state which every soul is in by nature, and before conversion, is a state of spiritual darkness; like men in the dark, they go they know not whither, they do they know not what, they stumble and fall they know not how nor when. Note, 2. That all those whom God calls effectually out of the darkness and ignorance of their natural and unregenerate state, he doth enlighten them by his Word and Holy Spirit. Note, 3. That such as are so called and enlightened, ought to walk suitably to their privilege, and answerably to their high and honorable profession. Walk as children of light; that is, holy, humbly, cheerfully, thankfully before God, exemplarily, and unblameably before the world.

9 (For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth;)

10 Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord.

These words contain a reason why the Ephesians, who were once in darkness, but then enlightened by the Holy Spirit, should walk as children of light, namely, because the fruits of that light, or of the Holy Spirit, the author of that light which they had received, is in all goodness, righteousness and truth; that is, it consisted in these things, these are the fruits of the enlightening and enlivening Spirit of God; so that the force of the argument lies thus: such a walking as is here directed to, namely, in the love and practice of universal righteousness and goodness, is the genuine fruit and natural result of the Holy Spirit, and accordingly, as such, they were obliged to it; none can walk as children of the light, but such as are renewed and quickened by the Holy Spirit of God, and made children of light, and such will be found in the practice of those duties wherein that walk consisteth; proving what is acceptable unto the Lord; That is, first, To study the word, and find what is pleasing unto God. Secondly, To embrace with our hearts what we find to be so. And, thirdly, To practise in our lives what we embrace with our hearts. The scripture acquaints us with some persons and some performances which are very acceptable unto God; such persons as live most by faith, as are very upright in their walking, very sincere in all they do, such are greatly acceptable unto God; so the performances are also acceptable, namely, when we do justice and judgment, this is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice; both commutative and distributive justice betwixt man and man, more pleasing to God than the highest acts of worship performed to him without this, Prov. xxi. 3. To serve Christ with a pure intention, with good will, or a willing mind, and to suffer patiently for well doing, this is highly pleasing and acceptable unto God, 1 Pet. ii. 20.

11 And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them.

Observe here, 1. The odious character wherewith sin in general is branded; it is styled darkness, a work of darkness, works of darkness, and an unfruitful work. Sin is styled darkness, because it originally springs from darkness, it naturally delights in darkness, it ultimately leads to eternal darkness. Sin is called a work of darkness, to imply the drudgery and toil, the labor and pains, that the sinner is at in the service of sin; the work of sin is a mere drudgery; it is not a pleasurable service, but a laborious servitude. And the apostle calling sin by the name of works, doth intimate to us, that one sin never goes single and alone, but has a dangerous train and retinue. Finally, sin is an unfruitful work; not materially and subjectively unfruitful, for the corrupt nature of man is a rank soil in which sin thrives apace: but terminatively and untimely, it is unfruitful in the conclusion, in the event and issue, Rom. vi. 21. What fruit, &c. Observe, A dehortation, or a negative precept, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness:" it is both the duty and interest of every christian to have nothing to do with any sinful work; the preceptive will of God requires this, sin being contrary to the holiness of his nature and will; and the dignity and purity of the gospel calls for this, which is a law of holiness, and a rule of holy living. Observe, 3. A positive injunction, but rather reprove them, how are we to reprove the unfruitful workers and works of darkness? Two ways, 1. By our lips; with plainness, but yet with prudence; with faithfulness, but yet with meekness; in reproof never use sharp words, if soft words will serve the turn. 2. With our lives; thus Nehemiah, by his princely demeanour, did reprove the covetousness of former governors, Neh. v. 15. "So did not I, because of the fear of the Lord;" a holy life is a visible and daily reproof given both to sin and sinners.

12 For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret, 13 But all things that are reprov'd, are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest is light:

Here our apostle assigns particular reasons why the Ephesians should have no fellowship with the unfruitful workers and works of darkness, but reprove them, namely, 1. The abominable filthiness of those sins which the wicked Pagans committed, especially in their heathen mysteries, prescribed by the devil as parts of his worship; such things done in secret, as it was even a shame to speak of. 2. Because admonitions and reproof make the works of darkness manifest to the sinner's conscience, set sin forth in its black and ugly colors. A discovery of sin in its vileness, odiousness, and ugliness, is necessary to a sinner's conviction of it, and conversion from it; and God doth not only bless the ministry of the word from the pulpit, but sometimes by a word of reproof from the mouth of a private christian, and the light of his holy example, for this great end. A reproof piously and prudently given to open sinners, by private christians, shall not miss of its end, it will certainly have its effect, either in the sinner's conversion and salvation, or in his obduration and condemnation; as all things reprobable are made manifest by light, so a prudent reproof and pious conversation puts sin to shame, if not to silence.

14 Wherefore he saith, Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

The last argument which our apostle offers to consideration, for enforcing the duty of reproof the unfruitful workers and works of darkness, is drawn from the example of God himself, whose great design it is, by his holy word, to awaken men out of the sleep of sin and death, that Christ may give them light. Here note, The dangerous and deplorable, though not hopeless and desperate state of an unconverted and impenitent sinner, namely, spiritual sleep, and death; every man by nature is in a dead sleep till the renovating change: he apprehends things as a man asleep; all his thoughts of God and Christ, of heaven and hell, of sin and holiness, are slight and hovering notions, not real and thorough apprehensions; the most substantial realities are with them but phantasms and imaginations:—imaginary dangers startle them, like men in a dream; but real dangers, though never so near do not affect them: as in natural sleep, all the senses of the body, so in spiritual sleep, are all the senses of the soul bound up; and accordingly, this sleep is not casual, but connatural to our present sinful state; a soul drenched in sensuality sleeps as it were by choice, and not by chance. But how, O sinner! canst thou sleep under such a load of sin and guilt, with so many wounds in thy conscience, with so many ulcers in thy soul? Can a diseased man sleep? Can a condemned man sleep? Can a man in debt sleep? All this the sinner is; and yet though God thunders above, and hell gapes from beneath, and the sinner hangs over it by the fretted thread of his life, yet he is in a profound sleep; but his damnation slumbers not if he doth not speedily awake, "and arise from the dead, that Christ may give him light."

15 See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise.

These words may be considered two ways; either, first, As a direction to those, who, according to the foregoing exhortation, do reprove sinners for their unfruitful works of darkness, namely, to walk very circumspectly themselves; see then how circumspectly you walk, so the words may be rendered; and it intimates to us, that those only are fit to reprove sin in others, who walk very circumspectly and unblameably themselves; such only have authority to reprove, and such only can hope for success in reproof, ver. 11. "Rather reprove them; see then that ye walk circumspectly. Secondly, The words may be considered as a new precept, added by St. Paul to the former given in this chapter, for directing the Ephesians to an holy life; he assures them, that if they will walk holily, they must walk circumspectly, and that circumspect walking is a wise walking. Observe here, 1. The necessity of circumspect walking, see that ye walk circumspectly. Learn hence, That it is impossible for a christian to maintain a holy course of obedience to the commands of God, without great care and caution, heedfulness and circumspection; none can walk holily, that do not walk circumspectly and watchfully; such is that weakness and inconstancy of our nature, so many and so subtle are our spiritual enemies, and so intimate with us, so strict and exact is the law of God we are to walk by, and so holy and jealous is that God we are to walk before, that it is impossible to walk before him acceptably, if we do not walk circumspectly. Observe, 2. As the necessity, so the excellency of circumspect walking: it is not foolish, unadvised, unaccountable walking, but it is truly wise walking: such walking as the wisdom of God recommends to us, and such walking as bespeaks us truly and really wise; such as walk loosely, walk foolishly; careless walking is foolish walking, but circumspect walking is wise walking, for it is to be wise for ourselves, and wise as to our best and true interest; it is to be wise for time, and wise to eternity; wise both for this, and for the coming world. "See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise."

16 Redeeming the time, because the days are evil.

Observe here, 1. A most important and necessary duty exhorted to, namely, to redeem the time: this cannot be done in a natural sense: time once past, is irrecoverably lost, we can no more recal it: but in a moral sense, time may be said to be redeemed, when our diligence to improve it is redoubled, when we do much work in a little time; to redeem time, supposes and implies a right knowledge of the use and end of time, and high valuation of the worth and excellency of time, and resolution to rescue it out of the hands of those that would devour it; idleness, excess of sleep, inordinate adorning of the body; immoderate recreations, vain company, an excess of worldly business, all these are robbers of our time, and time must be rescued out of their hands. Quest. Who are the persons more especially concerned to redeem time? Ans. All those that are young; such as have idly wasted a great part of their time; all that are ignorant and graceless; all that are weak and aged, and have but a few sands in their glass; all those that are recovered from sickness; and all such as, through poverty, restraint, or service, are scant of their time, should wisely redeem it, and industriously improve it, for God and their souls; because upon this moment depends eternity, and according to our present choice, will be our eternal lot. Observe, 2. The apostle's argument here, to excite all persons wisely to redeem their time, namely, because the days are evil; that is, full of sin, by the scandalous lives of professors; full of error, by the subtlety of heretical seducers; full of affliction and misery, by reason of sharp and hot persecutions; when days are most evil, most sinful, or calamitous, then it is a christian's duty to improve his time well and wisely, for God and his soul. "Redeem the time, because the days are evil."

17 Wherefore be ye not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is.

As if he had said seeing the times are so perilous, and your opportunities of doing good so uncertain, be wise, and understand what are the proper duties of your place and station, and know how to manage yourselves in every relation, with reference to the duties, dangers, snares, and temptations which may be before you, and this according to the will of God revealed in his word. Learn hence, That it is a special part of divine wisdom, to understand and know what is the mind and will of God concerning us, in every condition of life which his providence brings us into; to the intent that we may fill up every relation, with the proper duties of it, to the glory of God, and our own and others satisfaction: "Be ye not unwise, but understand what the will of the Lord is."

18 And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit;

Observe here, 1. Our apostle's reasonable dehortation, be not drunk with wine; drunkenness, as well as uncleanness, and drunkenness with uncleanness, for they commonly go together, were sins which the Ephesians and unconverted Pagans were generally guilty of: St. Paul therefore cautions these new converts against this old sin which transports men to insolvent and outrageous practices, as the next words intimate, for therein is excess; the original word may be rendered lewdness and lusts, to denote that when persons are inflamed with wine, they are liable to all manner of excessive wickedness, and particularly to the sin of uncleanness. Observe, 2. The duty exhorted to, in order to the prevention of that sin, and that is, to labor and endeavour, instead of being filled with wine, to be full of the Holy Spirit of God, to be filled with the sanctifying graces of the Holy Spirit: blessed be God, he allows us to seek after the greatest and fullest measures of the Holy Spirit; and injurious we are to ourselves, if we content ourselves with small measures and degrees of it. The sense of the words seems to be this: let no christian allow himself in any sinful excesses; let him never fill himself with wine or strong drink, or with meat and drink to the full, for that fulness will breed all manner of sensual lusts in him; but let his desires and endeavours be carried out after the grace and Spirit of God, let him be filled therewith; for that fulness will keep the soul holy, the body chaste, and render the christian fit for the service of God on earth, and meet for the fruition and enjoyment of God in heaven. Take your fill of the Spirit, you can never be overfilled.

19 Speaking to yourselves in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord;

The apostle in the foregoing verse, cautions the Ephesians against that drunkenness and uncleanness which did commonly attend them at the solemnities of their heathen god; their Bacchanalia, or feasts dedicated to Bacchus the god of wine, were usually concluded with excessive drunkenness and uncleanness. In these drunken feasts, they had their drunken hymns, which they sang to their drunken deity, in praise of him whom they called the god of wine: now in opposition to these drunken and impure sons, the apostle exhorts the christian Ephesians to sing the psalms of David, or the hymns composed by spiritual men, such as Zacharias and Simeon, or by the afflatus of the Holy Spirit, which in those times did immediately inspire persons both to pray and sing in their assemblies, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. singing these with the mouth, and also making melody in your hearts to the Lord. Note here, The hearts and spirits of good men are full of spiritual mirth and joy; they are as merry in the Lord, as sinners in their lust; that it is lawful and laudable for them to express their mirth, and give vent to their spiritual joy, by singing; that psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs do best become their mouths, when they perform those spiritual exercises; that in singing these, there must be an inward harmony, and musical melody in the soul and heart, as well as in the tongue; besides, a melodious turning of the voice, the exercise of the understanding, and the orderly motions of the affections, must accompany them that will make melody in the heart to the Lord in their singing. Singing of psalms then, both in public assemblies, and in private families, and sounding forth the high praises of God for mercies received, is a special duty to be jointly performed by all persons capable of it: "Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns."

20 Giving thanks always for all things unto God, and the Father, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

The next duty St. Paul exhorts to is, that of spiritual thanksgiving. Where note, 1. The time when it ought to be performed, always, that is, at least every day, and upon every solemn occasion, keeping the heart continually in a praising, as well as a praying frame. Note, 2. The matter for which we are to give thanks, for all things; that is, first, for all providences, whether prosperous or adverse; for sickness as well as health, God intending our good by both Secondly, For all mercies, for sparing mercy, preventing mercy, recovering mercy, for common benefits, for peculiar and distinguishing favors, for mercies received, for mercies expected, for what we have in hand, and what we have in hope. Note, 3. The person to whom our thanksgivings are to be offered, to God and the Father, to God our Creator, to God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our Father in him. Note, 4. The person through whom our thanksgivings are acceptable unto God, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; as all spiritual addresses, both of praise and thanksgiving, must be offered up to God, so their acceptance with God is only to be expected by or through our Lord Jesus Christ.

21 Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God.

22 Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord.

23 For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church; and he is the Saviour of the body.

24 Therefore, as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing.

Our apostle having exhorted the Ephesians to such general duties as belong to all christians, comes now to exhort them to the practice of relative duties, as they are members of societies, and particularly as they live in a family society one with another, as husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants; much of the life and power of religion appearing in the conscientious practice and performance of relative duties. But, first, he gives them a general direction, to submit themselves one to another in the fear of God; that is, by yielding and mutually condescending to each other, stooping to the meanest offices of love and kindness one towards another, and this in the fear of God; that is, either in obedience to the command of God, which enjoins this submission, for them we perform our duty towards one another acceptably, and as we ought, when we eye the command of God in what we do; or else in the fear of God; that is, making the fear of God the rule and measure of our submission one to another; for we are by no means bound to submit ourselves, in order to the pleasing of our neighbour, any farther than is consistent with that subjection and obedience which we owe to God. Learn hence, That where that noble and divine principle of the fear of God prevaileth in the heart, it will make a man conscientiously careful of his duty towards man; the fear of God in him will have both the force of a motive to quicken him up unto, and also of a rule to guide and direct him in that submission, which, in obedience to God, is due and payable to his neighbour. Having laid down this general rule, now he comes to press us to the practice of particular duties; Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands, &c. Note here, he begins with the wife's duty first, before the husband's, probably because her duty of entire subjection is the most difficult duty, and being conscientiously discharged, is a compelling motive (No. 56.)

to the husband to set about his duty in like manner. Note, 2. The particular and special duty which the wife is exhorted to, and that is submission; Wives submit yourselves. This supposes the wife's due esteem of, and her affectionate love unto her husband, as the root of this submission. Note, 3. The universality and extensive nature of the command, it is to all wives, to pay this tribute of subjection to their own husbands; no honor, superiority, or antecedent dignity in the wife, no personal infirmity, no moral infirmity; nay, no error in religion, can give a discharge from this obligation; there is no wife, whatever her birth and breeding, whatever her parts or privileges may be, that is exempted from this tie of subjection to her husband, for the law of nature, the ordinance of God, and her own voluntary covenant and promise in marriage, do oblige and bind her to it. Yet, note, 4. The qualification and manner of this submission: it must be as unto the Lord; that is, in obedience to the command of the Lord, who has given the husband power over the wife, and required, and will reward her obedience to him; or else, as unto the Lord, it pointeth out a similitude, and likeness, and resemblance, in the wife's subjection to the husband, with that which they owe to Christ the Lord; that is, it must not be feigned, but sincere; it must not be constrained, but willing, from a complacency taken in the doing of this duty. And, lastly, As unto the Lord, that is, in all lawful things; the wife is by no means to obey the husband in any commands which are contrary to that submissive obedience which she owes to Christ, her supreme Lord. Now, with this limitation, the wife in subjecting herself to her husband, is subject unto the Lord. Note, 5. The reason given by the Holy Ghost for enforcing this duty of submissive obedience upon wives, ver. 23. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church, &c. That is, the wife ought to submit herself to her husband, because, 1. He is her head; and, 2. Therein doth resemble Christ's headship over his church. Observe here, That this metaphor of an head, applied to the husband, denotes both the dignity and duty of the husband; it implies his eminency, by reason of his sex; it implies his authority to govern and direct, as the head has the power to guide and govern the whole body; and it points out his duty, as well as his dignity; as the head is the seat of wisdom and knowledge, so husbands should be endowed with greater measures of knowledge and prudence, to enable them to guide and govern in the place God has set them. And further the apostle would have wives consider and observe, that God will have some resemblance of Christ's authority over the church, held forth in the husband's authority over the wife. Is Christ an Head of dominion and direction also to his church? So shall the husband be to his wife. Doth Christ exercise his dominion and power over the church, not rigidly and tyrannically, but with meekness and gentleness? So should the husband rule. In a word, is Christ the Saviour of the body meritoriously? So should the husband be ministeriously, to defend the wife from injuries, to supply her necessities, and to improve his whole power and authority over her for her good. Note, 6. The manner of the subjection specified, and declared; as the church is subject, so let the wife be subject. Is the church subject to Christ willingly, cheerfully, dutifully, delightfully? So let the wife be subject. Doth the church subject itself to Christ universally? So let the wife be subject in all things: Not absolutely in all things, but in all things lawful, godly, and honest: nothing is excepted out of the wife's subjection to her husband, but that which is contrary to her duty to him who commanded this subjection; when there appears little discretion in the husband's command, then there will appear a great sense of duty in the wife's obedience.

25 Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it;

26 That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water, by the word;

27 That he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy, and without blemish.

The apostle having propounded the wife's duty, recommends the husband's next duty: hers was the duty of submission, his of love and intire affection. This the apostle mentions because the husband, for want of love, is too ready to abuse that sovereignty and superiority which God has given him over his wife, by proving rigorous and bitter unto her; therefore says he, Husbands, love your wives, that is, with a special, peculiar, conjugal love, such as no other must share in. This duty of love is very comprehensive, and it includes a very affectionate regard to her, a tender care over her, cohabitation with her, contentment and satisfaction in her alone, a patient bearing with her weaknesses, a prudent hiding of her infirmities, a providing a supply for her wants suitable to her rank, a readiness to instruct and direct her, a willingness to pray for her, and with her: where true conjugal love is found, these duties included will be performed. Observe next, as the apostle propounded the church for a pattern of subjection to the wife, so he propounds Christ as a pattern of love to husbands; Husbands, love your wives even as Christ also loved the church. Did he love his church with an active and operative love, with a real and sincere love, with an intire and undivided love, with a lasting and constant love, notwithstanding all his church's weaknesses and failings? Such ought the husband's love to be; that is, every husband to his own wife: no meanness of birth, no want of education, no homeliness of person, no frowardness of disposition in the wife, will discharge the husband from the obligation of this duty towards her; Christ's example hath the force of an argument to excite us to it, and is also an exact rule to guide and direct us in it: Husbands love your wives, as Christ also loved the church. Observe farther, The instances and evidences which Christ has given of his love unto his church: He gave himself for her, that he might sanctify and cleanse, and present her to himself a glorious church, without spot or blemish. Here note, 1. The church's polluted and impure condition, supposed before Christ gave himself for her; the church in herself was, as the world is, polluted, otherwise she had stood in no need of Christ's washing and cleansing,

Note, 2. The care of Christ to purify and cleanse his church from this pollution; he gave himself for her, that he might sanctify and cleanse her; he loved her, and washed her from her sins in his own blood. Note, 3. The instrumental means of the church's sanctification, it was with the washing of water by the word: the word and sacraments are the great and instrumental means, in the hand of Christ, by which he applies the virtue and efficacy of his death, for the sanctifying and cleansing of his church and children. Note, 4. The holy and glorious condition which the church shall be found in at the great marriage day, without spot or wrinkle, that he might at the last day, present her to himself a spotless spouse, a glorious church, having no spot of sin, or wrinkle of deformity, or any such imperfect thing, but be perfectly beautiful, holy, and without blemish; intimating, that the church hath her spots and wrinkles now in her militant state; but when Christ shall at last present the church triumphant to himself, then shall she be like himself, without spot. Blessed be God, believers have now a righteousness in Christ, without spot or wrinkle; then shall they have an holiness in themselves, without spot or wrinkle; nothing of imperfection cleaving to them, or inheriting in them. The blood of Christ has already perfectly justified, and thoroughly cleansed believers from sin's guilt; ere long the Spirit of Christ will perfectly cleanse them from all sin's filth. Oh, what a pure and spotless, what a perfect and beautiful creature will the church come out of Christ's hands, and be presented to the Father, at the great day, in the shining beauty of perfect holiness! God strengthen our faith in the belief of it, and prepare us for the full fruition and final enjoyment of it.

28 So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife, loveth himself.

29 For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church;

30 For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.

Our apostle here propounds a further argument to enforce this duty of love from husband to wife, taken from that near conjunction between them, showing, that they are one flesh and one body, not in a natural, but in a relative sense; and accordingly a man should so love his wife, even as himself: doth a man love himself superlatively, cordially, tenderly, industriously, perseveringly? So ought he to love his wife. Will a man be out of love with himself, much less hate himself, though he be deformed, or by some accident maimed? In like manner ought not any natural defect, or accidental mischance, to cause a remission, much less a cessation of the man's love unto his own wife; as it is an unnatural thing for a man to hate his own flesh personal, so his own flesh relational. Again, A man is so far from hating his own flesh, that he nourisheth and cherisheth it with the utmost care and tenderness; in like manner ought he to be kind to, and tender over his civil-self, the wife of his bosom; in imitation likewise of Christ's example, who nourishes and cherishes his church, as being flesh of his own flesh, and bone of his own bone; that is, as near to one another by a mystical and spiritual union, as Adam and Eve were by a matrimonial union, O stupendous privilege, for believers and Christ to be as one flesh! Husband and wife are not so near, soul and body are not so near, as Christ and believers are to each other.

31 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.

32 This is a great mystery : but I speak concerning Christ and the church.

33 Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular so love his wife, even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

Here the apostle uses a farther argument to excite the husband's love to his espoused wife, taken from the law of marriage, which maketh them two one flesh in a civil sense, therefore the man should leave father, and mother, and cleave to his wife: not that their obligations cease to their parents, or as if they were to cast off natural affections to them; but he shows, that there is a nearer union betwixt husband and wife, than betwixt parents and child, and that the bonds of matrimonial love are stronger than those of nature. Their being said to be one flesh, implies a most strict union, and most intimate communion, whereby they have one interest, common goods, common friends, yea, and all things common, as if they were but one person; but the apostle further intimates to us, at the 31st verse, that this matrimonial union betwixt man and wife was designed by God to shadow forth and represent that mystical union which is betwixt Christ, and his church. Both the conjugal union give the wife an interest in the estate and honor of the husband, be she never so meanly descended in herself? In like manner from the saints' union with Christ, does there immediately result a sweet and blessed communion or fellowship with Christ in graces and spiritual privileges; all that Christ is, and has, is theirs by communication to them, or improvement for them; well might the apostle therefore say, This is a great mystery, &c. In the 33d verse, the apostle shuts up his discourse upon this argument, with a repeated exhortation to the husband to love his wife, and to the wife to reverence her husband: Let every one of you in particular, so love his wife even as himself: so love, that is, with an extensive love, reaching the whole person, soul and body; with an intensive love, above all persons and relatives whatsoever; with an hearty love, without dissimulation; with an holy love, without pollution: with a constant love, without alteration; and with great love, beyond comparison.— And let the wife see that she reverence her husband. The great duty which the wife owes to her husband is reverence. This is made up of three ingredients; namely, estimation, love, and fear; the wife that reverences her husband, esteems him, and dares not think meanly of him; her esteem of him provokes her love unto him; and her love of him is accompanied with an ingenuous fear to offend and grieve him; and the wife expresses this reverence in her gestures, by a respectful demeanour towards him, in her speeches to him, when with her, and of him when absent from her, always mentioning him with respect and honor; in her actions, by complying with his desires, by following his directions, by hearkening to his reproofs, and by her cheerful and respectful behaviour towards him at all times, and in all places, as well at home, as abroad before the world. And that the wife may thus reverence her husband, let her be earnest with God in prayer, for wisdom and understanding, for prudence and patience, for humility and meekness; a proud spirit would not agree with an angel, but the humble will agree with any person.

CHAPTER VI.

CHILDREN, obey your parents in the Lord: For this is right.

2 Honor thy father and mother, (which is the first commandment with promise.)

3 That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth.

Our apostle, in the foregoing chapter, began to treat of relative duties, and concluded that chapter with the duties of husbands and wives; he begins this with the duty of children and parents to each other: and here we have observable, that he begins with the duty of the inferior first, of the child to the parents, as he did before with the duty of the wife, chap. v. 22. He first puts them in mind of their duty who are to obey; that being the most difficult duty, and the persons concerned in it usually more defective, and the work less easy and pleasing to our nature. Observe, 2. The important duty which children are directed to, the duty of obedience and honor; Children, obey; honor your father and mother; this duty of honor and obedience implies inward reverence, and a lawful estimation of their persons, and honoring of them in heart, speech and behaviour; it implies also outward observance, a pious regard to their instructions, executing all their commands which are not sinful, depending on their counsels, and following their good examples, owning with thankfulness their parents' care and concern for them, and covering the failings and infirmities found in them. Observe, 3. The object of this duty, both parents; not the father alone, or the mother only, but both father and mother jointly; Children, obey your parents, honor thy father and thy mother: as obedience belongeth to all children, of what age or sex, or condition soever, so are children obliged to obey both parents, the mother as well as the father, yea, she is named first, Lev. xix. 3. her sex being weaker, she is the more subject to contempt; and because the mother, in old age, is liable to be despised, God has particularly guarded about her, by his positive and express command, to free her from contempt, Prov. xxiii. 22. saying, Hearken to thy father who begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old. Observe, 4. The noble principle from whence this obedience in children to parents ought to flow, namely, from the fear of God; obey them in the Lord, that is, in obedience to his command, and in all things agreeable to his will, fearing his displeasure in case of disobedience; let not your obedience be barely natural and prudential, but christian and religious. Observe, 5. The arguments used by our apostle to excite to the practice of this duty. The first argument is drawn from the equity of it, this is right, that is, the law of God and nature requires it. The great motive which ought to excite us to the practice of any duty, is not so much the advantageousness, as the righteousness and equity of the duty, as being commanded by God, and well-pleasing in his sight Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right. A second argument is, because this is the first commandment of the second table, which has a particular promise annexed to it; This is the first commandment with promise, that is, with an explicit and express promise; for every commandment hath both a promise and a threatening implied in it, and annexed to it; but this is the first commandment with a promise expressed, and that is a promise of long life, that thy days may be long; and this promise is always fulfilled, either in kind or in equivalency, either by enjoying a long life on earth, or a better life in heaven. Learn hence, That although our first and chief motive to obedience, be the equity and righteousness of what God requires, yet we may as a secondary encouragement, have respect to the promised reward, and particularly to the temporal advantage of our obedience. Long life is here promised to children, as an encouragement to obedience, which is in itself a very valuable mercy and blessing; and having eyed the command of God, in the first place, they may and ought to have respect to the recompence of reward in the next place.

4 And, ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

Here the duty of both parents to their children is laid down. Where note, 1. The apostle's dehortation, or negative precept, Provoke not your children to wrath, that is, be not too severe towards them, abuse not your parental power over them, provoke them not, nor embitter their spirits against you, by denying them what is convenient for them, by inveighing with bitter words against them, by unjust, unseasonable, or immoderate correction of them. To provoke or stir up any to sin, especially young ones, and particularly our children, renders us guilty before the Lord, of all that sin which they have committed through our provocation; Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath. Note, 2. St. Paul's positive injunction given unto parents; Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord: Where, 1. He directs to their education; Bring them up. 2. To join nurture and admonition with their education: Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; That is, give them good instruction, withhold not early correction; set before them good example, begin with them beimes, and suffer not the devil, the world, and the flesh, to bespeak them for their service, before you engage them for God's: and remember, that there is a tie of nature, a tie of interest, and a tie of religion, which parents are under thus to do; Provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition, &c.

5 Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ;

6 Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart;

7 With good will doing service as to the Lord, and not to men:

8 Knowing, that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

Observe here, 1. The general duty incumbent upon servants, that of obedience to their masters, according to the flesh, that is, in temporal things only; obey your earthly masters in things pertaining to the world, leaving the soul and conscience to God only, who alone is the sovereign Lord of it. Christian liberty is not inconsistent with civil subjection; such as are God's freemen may be servants to men, though not the servants of men; and, as servants, obedience is their duty in all lawful things. Observe, 2. The qualifications and properties of this obedience, which is due and payable from servants to masters. 1. It must be with fear and trembling, that is, with fear of displeasing them; yet they must not act barely from fear, but out of love both to God and their masters. 2. It must be in singleness of heart, in great simplicity and sincerity of spirit, without guile, hypocrisy and dissimulation. 3. They must eye their great Master in heaven in all the services they perform to their masters here on earth, not with eye-service. But how should servants have an eye to their great Master in heaven? Ans. They should have an eye to the presence of their great Master, to the glory of their great Master, to the command of their great Master, and to the assistance and acceptance of their Master in heaven. Learn hence, That our eyeing of God in all the services we perform, and making him the judge and spectator of all our actions, will be a singular help to make us sincere and single hearted in all we do, and in all we design. Again, 4. Their service must be performed with good will, that is, with cheerfulness and delight, not grudgingly, unpleasantly, or from fear of punishment only; eyeing the Lord Christ in all that service they do for men. Learn hence, That the meanest and basest services and employments, in the place and station which God sets us in, being done with right qualifications, with faithfulness and cheerfulness, from right motives, and for right ends, is service done to Christ, and, as such, shall be accepted and rewarded by him, with good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men. Observe lastly, The reward which the Holy Ghost propounds, as an encouragement to poor servants, in their obedience to their masters; and that is, the assurance of a reward from God; whatever disappointment they may meet with from men; knowing that whatever a man doth out of obedience to the Lord, a reward of the same shall he receive, whether he be a poor bond-servant, or a free man and master. Note here, How the basest drudgery of servants, when performed in obedience to God, and with an eye at his glory, is called here a good work, and shall not fall of a good reward: "Whatsoever good thing any man doeth;" when a poor servant scours a ditch, or does the meanest drudgery, God will reward him for it; for he looketh not at the beauty, splendor, and greatness of the work, but at the integrity and honesty of the workman: the mean and outwardly base works of poor servants, when honest and sincere, shall find acceptance with God, and be rewarded by him, as well as the more splendid, honorable, and expensive works of their rich masters; "the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free."

9 And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.

Here the master's duty to his servants is directed to, both generally, and more particularly; in general, he directs masters, to do the same things to their servants; not the same things for kind, but for manner of doing them; that is, in obedience to the same command of God, with an eye to the same glory of God, with the same singleness of heart, with the same love and good-will. Here note, That the greatest master, yea, the greatest prince and potentate upon earth, lie under obligations, in point of duty, to their servants and inferiors; and it ought to be as much their care to discharge their duty sincerely, cheerfully, with good will, and, eyeing their great Master in heaven, as it concerns the poorest servant to obey them in and after the same manner; ye masters, do the same things unto them. Next follow the particular directions given to masters, namely, To forbear threatenings; that is, let them not exercise their authority over them imperiously and with rigor, but mildly, and with gentleness; rule them not tyrannically, but govern with moderation and temper. Lord! how ordinary it is for men in place and power a little above others, to insult over, and trample upon others, forgetting that there is one above them, whom they must be accountable unto themselves! "Forbearing threatenings, knowing that your Master also is in heaven, with whom there is no respect of persons." Here we have Almighty God described two ways: 1. From his magnificence and stately palace in which his illustrious glory shineth; your Master is in heaven; not as if he were only there, and no where else, but eminently there, though every where else. 2. God is here described by his justice and impartiality in judging; There is no respect of persons with him, that is, when the rich master and poor servant come to stand upon a level before him, he will not respect either of them for their outward circumstances, but, as a just judge, reward them both according to their works. Thus our apostle concludes his exhortation to the practice and performance of relative duties, between husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant. He now closes his epistle with a special exhortation to all christians, to look upon themselves as spiritual soldiers, listed under Christ's exalted banner, engaged in a continual warfare with the world, and the prince of the world; and accordingly, he bespeaks them in martial phrase to the end of the chapter,

10 Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.
(No. 57.)

11 Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil.

Our apostle, calling us here forth to the christian warfare, gives forth first the word of encouragement to battle. "Be strong in the Lord, and in his mighty power." A christian above all men, needs resolution, and a daring courage; if he be possessed with fear, he is unfit to go into the field; if dispirited with strong impressions of danger, how unready for the encounter! Cowards win neither earth nor heaven. But where lies the christian's strength? Verily, in the Lord, and not in himself; the strength of the whole hosts of saints lies in the Lord of Hosts, and accordingly it ought to be the christian's great care, in all difficulties and dangers to strengthen his faith on the Almighty power of God. Observe, 2. A direction given how a saint may come to be strong in the Lord, namely, by putting on the whole armor of God; that is, by being clothed with the following graces, which are hereafter mentioned in this chapter; as, "the shield of faith, the breastplate of righteousness, the sword of the Spirit, &c." Now these are called armor of God, because they are of his appointment and institution, and of his make and constitution; and this armor must be put on, that is, our grace kept in continual exercise: it is one thing to have armor in the house, and another to have it buckled on in the field; it is not sufficient to have grace in the habit and principle, but it is grace in act and exercise that must conquer spiritual enemies. Observe, 3. A reason assigned why the christian is to be thus completely armed, that he may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; intimating, that the devil is one chief enemy we have to combat with in the christian warfare, and that this enemy is a wily, subtle enemy, discovering his dangerous policy, first by tempting and alluring into sin, and then by vexing and tormenting for sin. But satan, with all his wits and wiles, shall never finally vanquish (though he may, in a particular battle, overcome) a soul clad in spiritual armor; nay, he that hath this armor of God on, shall certainly vanquish and overcome him: "Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against, &c."

12 For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

The apostle mentioned our enemy in the former verse: here he describes the combat in this verse, We wrestle: A christian's life is a perpetual warfare, a continual wrestling, but with what? and with whom? Ans. Negatively, not with flesh and blood; that is, not only or chiefly with flesh and blood, with human enemies, but we must grapple and contend with angelical powers, with devils, who are principalities and powers, &c. Note here, How the devil and his angels are described; 1. By their prince-like authority and government which they exercise in the world, called therefore principalities and powers, to denote that satan is a great and mighty prince; a prince that has the heart and knee of all his subjects. 2. By the seat of his empire, he rules in this world, not in the other: the highest the devil can go, is the air; heaven fears him not: and he is a ruler of the darkness of this world, that is, in such sinners as labor under the darkness of sin and ignorance. 3. Satan and his angels are here described by their spiritual nature, called spiritual wickedness, that is wicked spirits, intimating to us, that the devils are spirits; that they are spirits extremely wicked; and that these wicked spirits do chiefly annoy christians with, and provoke them to spiritual wickedness. 4. They are described by their residence or place of abode, in high places; that is, in the air, of which he is called the prince. From the whole note, How plainly Christ our captain deals with all his soldiers, and the difference between Christ's dealing with his followers, and satan with his: satan durst not let sinners know what that God is whom they fight against, but Christ is not afraid to show his saints their enemy in all his power and strength; well he might, because the weakness of God is stronger than the powers of hell.

13 Wherefore, take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand.

14 Stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness;

15 And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;

16 Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked.

17 And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God:

18 Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints;

Observe here, 1. How our apostle having described the enemy in the foregoing verse, and set him forth in all his formidable strength and power, comes forth at the head of his Ephesian camp, gives them a fresh alarm, and bids them arm! "Take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand in the evil day;" intimating that an evil day is before us; that it will be of mighty advantage to us, to be able to stand in the evil day; and that without the help of divine armor, we cannot stand in that day. The sanctifying graces of God's Spirit, are this armor; he that has not these, let his common gifts be never so gay and glorious, he will never hold out to fight the last battle, but fall into the enemy's hand, and be taken captive by him at his will. Observe, next, How our apostle comes to describe the armor of God, piece by piece, which the christian is to put on before he takes the field against the enemy: here is the soldier's girdle, his breastplate, his shoe, his shield, his helmet, and his sword, all described; his offensive and defensive weapons, wherewith soldiers of old used to arm their bodies from head to foot; now the apostle assigneth to particular graces, an use and excellency answerable to these pieces of armor, and shows that there is some resemblance between every grace and that piece of the bodily armor to which it is here compared; but observable it is, that although there be pieces of armor for all other parts of the body, here is none assigned for the back, nor back parts, because there must be no running away, no hope of escaping by flight, in this spiritual warfare; if we turn our back upon our enemy, we lay open to his darts, and are in danger of destruction; if we fight on, we have our second in the field, and are sure of victory, provided we enter the field in order, and stand to our arms, maintain our watch, keep our ground, and appear armed cap-a-pee, from head to foot, with the several pieces of armor here recommended: The first of which is the girdle of truth, ver. 14. Having your loins girt about with truth, that is sincerity of heart. Doth a girdle or belt adorn the soldier? So doth sincerity adorn the christian. Doth the girdle strengthen the soldier's loins? So doth sincerity strengthen the soul, and every grace in the soul; it is sincere faith, that is, strong faith; it is sincere love that is mighty love. Secondly, the breastplate of righteousness; by which is to be understood the love and practice of universal holiness. But why is this compared to a breastplate? Ans. Because, as the breastplate defends the most principal parts of the body, where the heart and other vitals are closely couched together; thus holiness preserves the soul and conscience, the principal parts of a christian; from the wounds and harms of sin, which is the weapon which satan uses, to give conscience its deadly stab with. The third piece of christian armor, is the spiritual shoe, fitted to the soldier's foot, and worn by him, so long as he keeps the field against sin and satan; the soldier's way is sometimes full of sharp stones, and sometimes by the enemy strewed with sharp iron spikes struck into the ground: the soldier will soon be wounded or fundered if not well shod; therefore the direction here is, Let your feet be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; that is, maintaining an holy readiness of spirit, and a resolute frame of heart, to undergo any suffering, and endure any hardship in your christian warfare; which frame of spirit being wrought in us by the doctrine of the gospel, is therefore called the preparation of the gospel of peace. The fourth piece of armor recommended above all, to be put on, is the shield of faith; this is that grace, by which we believe the truth of God's word in general, and depend upon Christ in particular, as crucified, for pardon and life, and this upon the warrant of the promise. But why is faith compared to a shield? Ans. Because, as the shield defends the whole body, so faith defends the whole man; the understanding from error, the conscience from searedness, the will from rebellion against the will and command of God: and, as the shield defends the whole armor, as well as the soldier's whole body: it defends the breast-plate, as well as the breast; so faith is our armor upon armor, a grace that preserves all other graces whatsoever. The fifth piece of armor is mentioned ver. 17. The helmet of salvation; by which the grace of hope is understood, which has for its object salvation, called therefore the hope of salvation; salvation is the ultimate and comprehensive object of the christian's expectation; and it is compared to an helmet; because, as the helmet defends the head, so doth the hope of salvation defend the soul; it keeps the head above water, and makes the christian bold and brave: hope is a grace of singular use and excellent service to a christian, in the whole course of his christian warfare; it puts him upon noble services, it keeps him patient under the greatest sufferings, and it will enable the soul to wait long for the performance of divine promises. The sixth piece of spiritual armor is the sword, ver. 17. The former were defensive, but this is both an offensive and defensive weapon, such is the word of God: but why compared to a sword? Ans. In regard both of necessity and excellency; the sword was ever esteemed a most necessary and useful part of the soldier's furniture; of such usefulness, necessity and excellency, is the word of God, by which the christian doth defend himself, and offend his enemies: but why is it called the Sword of the Spirit? Ans. Because the Spirit was the author of it; the Spirit of God is the interpreter of it; and it is the Spirit that gives the word its efficacy and power in the soul; the word of God, contained in the scriptures, is the sword by which the Spirit of God enables his saints to overcome and vanquish all their enemies. The seventh and last piece of spiritual armor is mentioned, ver. 18. that is, prayer; praying always with all prayer, &c. Here note, The time for prayer, praying always; the sort and kind of prayer, praying always with all prayer; the inward principle of prayer, from which it must flow, in the spirit; the guard to set about the duty of prayer, watching thereunto; the constancy to be exercised in the duty with all perseverance; the comprehensiveness of the duty, for all saints. Learn, That prayer is a necessary duty, for all christians, and to be used, with all other pieces of spiritual armor, by the christian soldier.

19 And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel:

20 For which I am an ambassador in bonds: That therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak.

Our apostle having directed the Ephesians to the duty of prayer in general, desires them here to pray for himself in particular. Where observe, 1. His exhortation and direction to pray for himself, and all the ministers of the gospel; and for me. Learn hence, That the ministers of Christ are and ought, in an especial manner, to be remembered in the saints' prayers. Observe, 2. The mercy which he desires them to pray for, that utterance may be given; namely, a readiness to deliver to others what God has handed in to us. Ministers depend upon God for utterance, and it is their people's duty to be earnest with God to give it to them. Observe, 3. The end why he desires this utterance, that he may open his mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel. Where note, 1. The sublime nature of the gospel, it is a mystery. 2. The work of a gospel minister; and that is to make known that gospel mystery. 3. The manner how he is to perform this work, that I may open my mouth boldly; namely, in asserting truth, and in reproving sin, with a wise and prudent, with a meek and humble, with an active and zealous boldness. Observe, 4. A double argument to back and enforce his request, to pray for him; 1. From his office, for which I am an ambassador; The ministers of the gospel are God's ambassadors; and shall not their people pray for the success of their embassies? 2. From his afflicted state he was an ambassador in bonds; his zeal for God, and his truth, confined him to a prison; he preached himself into a gaol; well therefore might they pray for him, who had now lost his liberty, and soon afterwards to lose his life for them; no prayers can be too much to strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts of such as suffer tribulation and persecution for the sake of Christ; "Pray for me, that I may make known the mysteries of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds."

21 But that ye also may know my affairs, and how I do, Tychicus, a beloved brother, and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things:

22 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts.

Observe here, 1. The tender love and affectionate regard which St. Paul bore to these Ephesians, in the midst of his sufferings, and during his imprisonment; he not only wrote, but sent to them; no doubt the apostle had but few, very few fast friends with him at Rome, whom he could repose an entire confidence in, and receive great consolation from; however, he will deny himself, to serve them: a faithful minister of Jesus Christ, is so tenderly affectionate towards his flock, that he prefers their spiritual edification before his own private and particular advantage; though St. Paul was now a prisoner, and under a daily expectation of death, and had few to attend him, yet he sends one of his most beloved friends away to them, choosing rather himself to want an attendant, than that they should want a comforter; nothing better becomes a minister of Christ than a public spirit. Observe, 2. The character of the person whom St. Paul sent unto them; he is described, 1. By his name, Tychicus. 2. By his state, he was a brother, that is, a christian, a beloved brother, a brother in Christ. 3. By his office, he was a minister, yea, a faithful minister in the Lord, that is, in the work of the Lord: between whom and St. Paul there was a sweet harmony, an happy union of hearts, a joint care and endeavour to carry on the interest of Christ amongst the churches: behold! how good and pleasant a thing it is, when ministers of Christ are dear to each other; when instead of divisions, emulations and strife amongst them, they can give testimonials of each other, as well deserving; without endeavouring to conceal and obscure the gifts and graces of God, which are eminent in any of their fellow-laborers, on purpose only to set off themselves, that their own performances may be the more taken notice of. St. Paul was far from this spirit, as appears by the character which, upon a fit occasion, he gave of Tychicus. Observe, 3. The design and end which St. Paul had in sending Tychicus unto them, and that was two-fold: 1. That he might acquaint them with St. Paul's condition and state; that ye might know my affairs, how I do, and what I do, I have sent Tychicus to declare unto you all things. What! all things without exception? Yes, both doings and sufferings, the apostle was ashamed of neither. Learn thence, That the life and conversation of ministers, both public and private, must and ought to be such, that they need not be ashamed to have it known, or concerned that the church should know what they do, how they manage, to the intent that their people may be edified by their conversation, as well as instructed by their preaching; "Tychicus shall declare unto you all things." The second end St. Paul had in sending Tychicus from himself to the Ephesians, was, that he might comfort their hearts. But how could Tychicus do this? These ways; 1. By making known to them the true cause of his sufferings. St. Paul's enemies had laid heavy things to his charge, these might perhaps fly as far as Ephesus; now, though the apostle regarded little what the wicked world said of him, yet he desired to be set right in the thoughts of the churches, and accordingly sends Tychicus to acquaint them with the cause of his imprisonment. 2. To keep them from discouragement, and being inordinately cast down at the report of his sufferings: no doubt, St. Paul's chain entered into their souls, and his sufferings were their sorrows; he therefore sends Tychicus to prevent their immoderate sorrow and mourning upon his account. 3. To comfort their hearts with the report of that holy joy and cheerfulness of spirit which was found with him in and under all his sufferings, Oh! it is an excellent sight to behold the saints at liberty mourning over their afflicted brethren; and them that are sufferers become comforters of them that are at liberty. Lord! never doth thy holy religion appear more glorious, than when thy ministers commend it by their sufferings for it: and no way can they commend it higher, than by an holy, humble cheerfulness of spirit, in their suffering for it; thy ministers preach with far greater advantage from a prison, than they can from a pulpit. 4. Might not St. Paul send Tychicus now to the church at Ephesus, to engage the churches to pray with earnestness for himself, as well as to comfort them? O! none so covetous of prayers as the ministers of Christ, and no ministers like suffering ministers. St. Paul sets all the churches at work to pray for him in prison; and great reason for it: a prison has its temptation as well as a palace; when men play the persecutors, the devil forgets not to be a tempter; sometimes he will attempt to soften them with impressions of fear; at another time he hopes to overcome them, and weaken their courage, by their friends' tears and entreaties; sometimes the devil hopes to embitter a suffering saint's spirit against his persecutors, and to sour him with the leaven of malice and wrath. Oh! it is no easy matter to receive evil, and yet wish none to him from whose hands we have received it; to reserve love for him that shows wrath and hatred to us, is a glorious, but a difficult work. But if all this fails, yet the devil hopes to blow him up with pride and a high conceit of himself, who dares suffer, when others shrink, and is ready to lay down his head, when others pull in their heads, and seek to save themselves in a whole skin. Pride is a salamander, that can live in the very flames of martyrdom; if any saint need the humility of many saints, it is he that is called to suffer for Christ. St. Paul was very sensible of this; he well knew that a suffering condition is full of temptation; that a christian's strength to carry him through it, is not in his own keeping; God must help, or the stoutest champion will fail: he also knows that prayer is the best means to fetch in that help, and accordingly St. Paul here sends Tychicus to Ephesus, to engage the auxiliary forces of the saint's prayers on earth, and the possé celi from heaven, that he might glorify God in a suffering hour.

23 Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Our apostle being now come to the close and conclusion of this excellent epistle, he shuts it up with very fervent and affectionate wishes and prayers for them. 1. He wishes the brethren, the converted christians, in and about Ephesus peace, peace with God, peace with conscience, peace especially one with another, and all manner of outward prosperity, comprehended in the word peace. 2. Mutual love among themselves. 3. The grace of faith, the fountain of the former; all which he wishes from God the Father, not excluding, but including the Son and Holy Ghost, and from Jesus Christ—the Mediator, through virtue of whose merit and intercession all saving benefits are conveyed unto believers: St. Paul's example is instructive to the ministers of Christ in all succeeding ages. Would we have our ministerial endeavours attended with manifest success? We must be much in prayer, in serious and fervent prayer to God, to work those graces in our people, faith, love, and holiness, which we have been by our ministry recommending to their care and practice; that minister who is most prayerful, is usually most successful.

24 Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Amen.

Still our apostle goes on praying; he began and closes his epistle with prayer; and the blessings prayed for, are grace and peace; peace in the former verse comprehending all temporal felicity, and grace in this, comprehending the special favor and loving-kindness of God; this he prays may be the portion of all those that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, or incorruption, as the word signifies, that is, not for time only, but for eternity, not in show and appearance only, but in reality. Sincere love to our Lord Jesus Christ is a sure character and undoubted mark of such a person as has found grace in God's sight, and is very high in the divine favor. Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ: he doth not say with a seraphim's, but with a sincere love. Quest. But when, and how, may a person know that he loves Christ in great sincerity? Ans. If Christ be enthroned in thy heart as a chief commander: if he be esteemed by thee as thy chiefest excellency, and thy choicest treasure; if he be thy chiefest refuge, unto which thou fliest in all dangers and distresses; thou mayest conclude, thy supreme love is placed upon him, that thou lovest him in sincerity; and the more thou lovest him, the more lovely wilt thou be unto him, and the more will thy heart be let out in desires after him, and in fervent longings for the full fruition and final enjoyment of him; for those whom we love, we long to be with.

*Come then, Lord! down to me,
Or take me up to thee.*

THE EPISTLE OF SAINT PAUL
TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

St. Paul being warned by the Holy Ghost to go into Macedonia and preach the gospel, as we find, Acts xvi. he plants first a church at Philippi, a principal city in Macedonia, so called from Philip king of Macedon, who beautified and enlarged it
But St. Paul's charge being to preach the gospel to all the Gentiles, he travels from place to place till he came at Rome, where he was in bonds, and consequently in necessity and straits; which the Philippians understanding, they sent Epaphroditus, their bishop or chief minister to him, with a liberal contribution to supply his wants: by whom St. Paul sends this affectionate letter to them, partly to testify his thankfulness for the relief received from them, but principally to confirm them in the faith, to prevent their being offended at his sufferings for the gospel, to encourage them to walk worthy of the gospel, to warn them against seducers and Judaizing teachers, and to quicken them to divers christian duties: and so concludes his epistle with particular salutations, and an apostolical benediction.

CHAPTER 1.

The design and scope of our apostle in this first chapter, is, to encourage the Philippians to constancy in the faith, to perseverance in holiness; not to be discouraged at his sufferings for the gospel, seeing christianity had already gained very much, and would, he was very confident, gain much more, by the sufferings he underwent for the sake of the gospel: accordingly, he exhorts them to courage and constancy, by several weighty arguments, to the end of the chapter.

PAUL and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons;

Observe here, 1. The penman of this epistle, St. Paul, joining Timotheus with him in the salutation, because his companion and fellow laborer, and one that had assisted in the instructing of the Philippians, and was a person much valued and esteemed by them. Observe, 2. The great modesty of St. Paul, in the character he gives of himself; he doth not style himself here an apostle, but the servant of Jesus Christ; in his other epistles which he wrote alone, he styles himself an apostle, Rom. i. 1. Gal. i. 1. &c. He doth not say here, Paul an apostle, and Timotheus a servant of Jesus Christ, magnifying himself above Timothy, but sets himself upon a level with him, saying, "Paul and (No. 57.)

Timotheus the servants of Jesus Christ" Learn hence, 1. That true humility teaches christians to speak sparingly of themselves, and of their own authority, and credit, except upon a just and necessary occasion, and when weighty reasons do urge and oblige them to it. Learn, 2. That the ministers and dispensers of the gospel are, in a special manner, the servants of Jesus Christ, wholly devoted to his service, and discharging themselves faithfully in the performance of it. Observe, 3. The superscription of this epistle, of the persons to whom it was directed, "To all the saints in Christ Jesus," in general, "which were at Philippi, and to the bishops and deacons; to all the saints at Philippi;" so he calls them, because they were all holy by visible profession, and many of them no doubt, by real sanctification, being inherently as well as externally holy; and the denomination is here taken from the better, though not the greater part, for whose sake the whole community are here called saints; But why saints in Christ Jesus? Because, as it is necessary to make a man internally holy, that he be in Christ Jesus by real implantation; so to denominate a man externally and federally holy, requires a visible profession, and an external union with Christ, John xv. 2. In particular, this epistle is directed to the bishops and deacons; they were both the church's overseers: the bishops to oversee and inspect the lives and manners of persons; the deacons to oversee the necessities of persons, and to serve the church in taking care of the poor. Note here, The great and special care which our holy Lord has taken of his church, in appointing stated officers to undertake the oversight of his whole family, to rule and govern, to direct and instruct it;

yes, not only has he appointed officers for the oversight of the souls of his people, but others to inspect their bodily necessities, that those who are indigent might be supplied by their care, and the charity of the church; "To the saints at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons."

2 Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Grace from God the Father, or grace from God as a Father; intimating that God bestows not his grace as a Creator, but as a Father, as a Father in Christ: and peace from our Lord Jesus Christ; he being the purchaser of our peace; he, upon whom was laid the chastisement of our peace, and in whom, and for whose sake, God becomes reconciled to us, and at peace with us. Learn hence, 1. That such as have received most grace from God, do yet stand in need of further measures, and fresh supplies of it: grace to pardon sin, and grace to subdue sin. 2. That peace, as well as grace, may and ought to be the subject of a christian's prayer and care, to obtain peace with God, peace with conscience, peace with one another, and, if it be possible, peace with all men.

3 I thank my God upon every remembrance of you.

4 Always in every prayer of mine for you all, making request with joy.

5 For your fellowship in the gospel from the first day until now;

Observe here, 1. The proper character of a gospel-minister, he is his people's constant remembrancer, and the remembrancer of all his people; I remember you all, says the apostle, "I remember you always, and in every prayer." This is a very great part of our ministerial duty, to pray for the people; not in our public offices only, but in our private addresses also, and this continually, and without ceasing; we should never rise off our knees, without bearing our people upon our hearts before the Lord. Did minister and people more strive together in their prayers one for another, there would be less strife and contention between them, one with another; ministers must be their people's remembrancers; St. Paul here remembered the Philippians, all the Philippians always, and in every prayer. Observe, 1. St. Paul could and did remember the Philippians with joy; though he was in sadness himself in a prison, yet he could think of them, as a people converted by his ministry with joy, making request with joy. When the ministers of Christ see any success of their labors in the lives of their people, it is matter of inexpressible joy to them, how sad soever the case is with them, as to their outward circumstances: when they sigh in a prison with respect to their personal sufferings, they can sing and rejoice, if they find their people's proficiency in knowledge and growth in grace; "I thank my God for you, making request with joy." Observe, 3. The ground and occasion of this his joy, ver. 5. For your fellowship in the gospel; that is, for your ready embracing of the gospel at my first preaching of it to you, for the real subjection of some, and the professed subjection of all to the faith of Christ, whereby ye were brought into fellowship with Christ and his church; and also for the continuance of you in the faith and profession of the gospel, from the first day until now. Learn hence, That when a people, upon a plain and persuasive preaching of the gospel, do readily receive and obey it, and remain constant in their profession of it, and obedience to it, it is matter of unspeakable thanksgiving and praise to the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ; "I thank God for your fellowship in the gospel, from the first day until now;" that is continuing in the faith, and persevering in your professed subjection to the gospel of Christ, I bless God for this.

6 Being confident of this very thing, that he which has begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ;

Here we have a further cause assigned of St. Paul's joy on the Philippians' behalf, namely, the firm and full assurance which he had of their perseverance in grace unto the end: God, that has begun, will perfect, that is, augment and increase it, till it arrives at perfection in glory. Note here, 1. The nature of grace described, or the proper title deservedly given to the grace of God, it is called "a good work; he that hath begun a good work, &c." Well may regenerating grace be called a good work, because it is the living foundation and vital principle, from whence all good works do proceed and flow; the grace of God in the heart is the root of all true holiness in the life; as good works are necessary to salvation, so renewing grace is necessary to good works. Note, 2. As the nature of grace described, so the author and augmentor of grace declared; and that is God, "he that hath begun a good work in you, will perform it," that is, augment it, and increase it; as the good work of grace in the heart is God's work, and he is the author of it, so he will maintain it and carry it on unto perfection, and be both the increaser and perfecter of it: God never doth his work by halves, Note, 3. The certainty of grace asserted, being confident of this very thing: but what ground had St. Paul for this confidence? Ans, Because grace is the care of the whole Trinity: all the persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, do concern themselves, both in the production, preservation and perfection of it; the Father decrees it, the Son purchases it, the Spirit infuses it, the Father begets it, the Son excites it, the Holy Spirit conducts it; and as they did all concur to its production, so do they all co-operate and work together for the preservation of it. Learn hence, that such persons, in whose souls Almighty God has begun a good work of grace, may with much assurance expect, by the influence of God's care, and the exercise of their own endeavours, that they shall hold out and persevere in a state of grace unto the end: until the day of Christ, that is, the day of judgment.

7 Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all, because I have you in my heart, inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers of my grace.

In these words, our apostle assigns a ground and reason of that confidence which he expressed himself to have of the Philippians' perseverance in grace and holiness, in the foregoing verse, namely, because they were partakers of the same grace with himself, and were ready to suffer for Christ, as he was; we may warrantably be persuaded of their perseverance in grace unto the end, in whom we see both readiness of obedience to the gospel, and also zealous and cheerful suffering for and in defence of the gospel. Thus did St. Paul here; Where observe, The apostle accounted it a grace and favor from God, that he was thought worthy to suffer for the gospel, and the Philippians with him; Ye are partakers of my grace. Learn hence, That to suffer bonds and imprisonment for the gospel's sake, is a special grace and favor of God, not considered in itself, but in the fruits and consequence of it. A second ground of his confidence was their respect to him, I have you in my heart, and I find you have me in your hearts; you partake of the misery of my bonds, you suffer with me in my sufferings, and sympathize with me in my sorrows; they relieved and refreshed him in his imprisonment, which he underwent for the sake of Christ and his gospel; and from hence he had a good confidence that they would persevere unto the end. An operative love to the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, especially when they are under persecution, is a good evidence of the sincerity of their love to Christ, and of their steadfastness and perseverance in grace unto the end.

8 For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ.

These words are expressive of that passionate degree of christian love which St. Paul bore to the Philippians; he durst appeal to God, as to the sincerity and fervency of it; God is my record. I call him to witness, and can appeal to him as the searcher of hearts, how greatly I long after you; that is, how passionately and sincerely I love you, with the most intense and hearty affection, in the bowels of Jesus Christ. The expression may denote both the efficient cause, and the exemplary cause of his love; 1. That the author of this his love unto them was Christ, he was the spring and procurer of it; and consequently, it was no carnal or selfish love, to serve his own end and designs upon them, but truly spiritual. 2. That Christ's love to him was the pattern and example, according to which he loved them, with no common love, but with an entire and intense affection, from the ground of the heart, and the most intimate bowels; no words can be more expressive of that fervent love and earnest longing, which St. Paul had for the welfare of the Philippians; a love which not only exceeds the love of all relations; he doth not say, I long after you in the bowels of a Father, or in the bowels of an husband, but in the bowels of Jesus Christ; humbly comparing his love towards them to the love of Jesus Christ; not for the degrees of it, not for the fruits and advantages of it, but for the truth and sincerity of it; "I greatly long after you all, in the bowels of Jesus Christ." Learn hence, That there is no stronger love, no more endearing affection between any relations upon earth, than between such ministers of Christ, and their beloved people, as they have been happily instrumental to convert to God; when present with them, they passionately love them; when absent from them, they affectionately long after them; imitating, as much as they can, their Lord Jesus Christ, both in the reality and sincerity, and also in the measure and degree of endearing affection: "God is my record, how greatly I long after you all, in the bowels of Jesus Christ."

9 And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment;

10 That ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ;

11 Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God.

After salutations given by St. Paul to his beloved Philippians, he next pours out his soul in fervent prayer and supplication for them; and the mercy which he prays for, is observable, first, namely, growth and proficiency in grace; "This I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment;" that their love to God, their love to him, and their love one to another, may yet more and more abound. Love is the root-grace from which most graces spring; therefore he prays for the strengthening of that grace in particular, and that there may be found with them judgment, as well as affection in the exercise of it; we ought to love judiciously, as well as affectionately; the more judicious a saint grows in his christian course, and the more understanding and judgment is found with him in the way of his duty, the stronger his grace is, and the more glory will he bring to God. The understanding and judgment being the guiding and the leading faculties in man, there can be no more acceptable holiness in the will, than there is knowledge in the understanding; I can hate sin and love God, no more than I know of the evil of sin, and of the perfections that are in God: the more judicious then a christian grows, the more his holiness grows; and accordingly, St. Paul's prayer is, that they may grow more and more in knowledge and in all judgment. Observe, 2. The great ends mentioned by the apostle, for which he did so earnestly desire their proficiency in knowledge and judgment, and their growth in love and every other grace; namely, That they might approve things that are excellent; that is, all such things as the gospel requires: implying that the things prescribed to us in the gospel, are things excellent and good for us, things worthy to be prescribed by God, and things reasonable to be practised by us; and that the approbation of these things, by a steadiness in judgment and practice, is every christian's duty, and ought to be their great endeavour. 2. That they might be sincere in their holy profession, incorrupt and pure, both in doctrine and manners. 3. That they might be without offence, unblameable in conversation, and be kept from being occasions of stumbling unto others, even unto the end of their days. 4. He prays, that they may not only be inoffensive persons, but fruitful christians, "being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God; that is, that they may abound in good works, undertaken in Christ's strength, and with an eye at God's glory. Learn hence, 1. That a negative holiness is not sufficient to salvation; it is not enough that christians be harmless and inoffensive towards others, but they must labor after an holy fruitfulness in good works; they must be "filled with all the fruits of righteousness." Learn, 2. That our works be truly good, and fruits of righteousness, it is necessary that they be done by Christ's strength and assistance, and with an eye at the glory and praise of God, in order to their acceptance: "filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God." Learn, 3. That no shorter time ought to be assigned for our inoffensive walking, and fruitfulness in conversation, than the day of our death; unto the day of Christ, says our apostle; that is, till the great reckoning-day, when Christ will render to us our complete reward; if we be faithful and fruitful to the death, we shall then receive the crown of life.

12 But I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel;

13 So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places;

14 And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear.

Our apostle's design in these words, is to prevent the Philippians stumbling, and being scandalized at his present sufferings, assuring them, that the things which happened to him, through the malice of his persecutors, have fallen out rather to the furtherance of the gospel, than any ways to the hinderance of it, as they feared. Learn hence, That the sufferings and persecutions which the messengers and ministers of Christ do undergo for the sake of the gospel, are oftentimes so over-ruled by the wisdom of God, that they rather increase than diminish the church, and rather promote than prejudice the interest of the gospel. Next, he declares the special and particular advantages which had redounded to the gospel, by those sufferings which he had patiently endured for the gospel's sake. 1. His bonds in Christ, that is, his imprisonment for the gospel of Christ, were manifest in the palace; that is, were manifestly taken notice of in Nero's court, and elsewhere in the city; so that people inquiring into the cause of his suffering, found, that it was not any misdemeanor, but that his preaching and practising the doctrine of christianity, was the only reason of his sufferings. 2. Another advantage which accrued to the church by his bonds, was this, namely, that many ministers of Christ who preached the word of God far and near, hearing of his constancy under sufferings, were both encouraged and emboldened thereby; encouraged to shake off fear, and emboldened to preach Christ with greater resolution: "Many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear." Note here, the title given by this great apostle to the inferior ministers of the gospel, he calls them brethren, and brethren in the Lord, putting himself and them in mind of their mutual and respective duties, which was to live and love as brethren; to admonish, exhort, and encourage one another, to stand up in defence of the just credit and reputation of one another, and jointly to set their shoulders to the work of Christ together. Note, 2. That the ministers of Christ, observing how God upholds some of their brethren under sufferings and persecutions, should encourage themselves to go on with resolution in the work of the Lord, not fearing their own personal sufferings, knowing, that the same assistance which supported one, stands ready to succour others: "The brethren in the Lord waxed confident by my bonds."

15 Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good will.

16 The one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, supposing to add affliction to my bonds:

17 But the other of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel.

18 What then? notwithstanding, every way, whether in pretence, or in truth, Christ is preached; and therein I do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

Our apostle had declared in the foregoing verses, that several of his brethren, in the work of the ministry, through his constancy in suffering, were emboldened to preach Jesus Christ with more resolution than before. But here he discovers, that there was a vast difference between those preachers; all did not preach Christ alike, with the same mind, from the same motives, for the same sincere ends. Some, alas! preach Christ out of envy and strife; that is, envying the success of the apostle's ministry, and endeavouring to draw people off from approving him, to applaud them, hoping to grieve and gail them thereby; but others preached the gospel of Christ of good will, with a purity of intention, and sincerity of affection, both towards Christ, and towards himself, who, for the defence of the gospel, now lay in prison. However, seeing Christ was preached and made known by both, by some in pretence, by others in truth, the apostle rejoiced at it, and took comfort in it. Learn hence, 1. That such ministers of the gospel are gladly and joyfully to be heard, who preach Christ and his pure word soundly and truly, with what mind soever, from what motive soever, and for what end soever they preach Christ and his holy gospel. The word is his which they bring, how vicious soever the person, and how bad soever the intention be of him that brings it; and, if the message be his, it is our duty to receive it without prejudice, be the principle what it will in him that delivers it. Many preach in Christ's name, who perish in his wrath; for Christ takes notice of the inward intention, as well as of the outward action, and observes not only the matter which ministers preach, but the end for which, and the motives from which they preach, whether from love and good-will, or from envy and strife. Learn, 2. That such christians who find their hearts inflamed with zeal for the glory of Christ and the salvation of souls, do and will rejoice exceedingly, that Christ is preached, whoever the person is, whatever the principle may be in him that preaches; "If Christ be preached," says St. Paul, "I therein rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."

19 For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer, and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, 20 According to my earnest expectation, and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also, Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death.

Still our apostle pursues and prosecutes his former design, namely, to prevent the Philippians, being offended at his sufferings; and accordingly he shows, that as the gospel of Christ had gained much already, it should gain yet more by his imprisonment and afflictions, which he was very confident would tend to the furtherance of his salvation, through the help of their prayers, and the supplies of grace from the Spirit of Christ; where, by salvation, is meant deliverance out of his present sufferings, which he fully expected by the help and benefit of the church's prayers. Great are the expectations of the saints, even as to temporal salvation and outward mercies, from the joint prayers and intercessions of the church of Christ: "this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer." But if, by salvation, be meant eternal happiness, then his confident persuasion was this, That all the designs of his adversaries against him should be so over-ruled and ordered by God, that through the influences and supplies of the Holy Spirit, all should work together for good, and his eternal salvation be advanced thereby, through the concurrence and assistance of their prayers. In the 20th verse he tells them, that according to his former expectation and hope, he was resolved that no terror should ever make him ashamed to own the truth of Christ. but that with a convincing boldness, he would now, as heretofore, appear in the defence of it, and that Christ should be "magnified by him, in the body, whether by life or death;" that is, whether my life be further prolonged, or be now, by martyrdom ended; Christ will be magnified, if I live; the power of Christ will be magnified in my deliverance from death: If I die, his power will be magnified in enabling me to undergo death for his name and sake; so that I am at a point, either to live or die, as the wisdom of Christ shall determine; I am, as to myself, indifferent for either, well knowing that Christ will be glorified in me, and by me, both by life and death. Learn hence, That nothing lies so near the heart of a saint, as the honor and glory of Christ; this he resolves shall be promoted by him, living and dying, by his great services, supporting his life, and by his extraordinary sufferings and martyrdom, in case of his death.

21 For to me to live is Christ, and-to die is gain.

Our apostle had declared, in the foregoing verse, his firm expectation that Christ would be magnified and glorified by him both in life and death; in this verse he discovers what reason he had to think so; for, says he To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain; that is, If I live, Christ shall be the scope of my life, and the end of my living; I resolve to live to his service; If I die, death will be a real gain and advantage to me: intimating, that both life and death are gain to a good man, and that it is Christ that makes both life and death gainful and advantageous: To me to live is Christ, to die is gain. Words both short and sweet, few in expression, but large in extension; in them we are taught both how to live and how to die. Observe, 1. The scope and end of a christian's life. To me to live is Christ. 2. The hope and fruit of a christian's death, To die is gain. Learn, That Christ is the believer's life, and death the believer's gain. The life of a real christian is resolved into Christ, and his death is resolved into gain. Note, 1. Christ is the believer's life: both his life of grace, and his life of glory is resolved into Christ. As to his life of grace, Christ is the life of this life; he is the efficient or principal cause of this life; he is the exemplar cause or pattern of it; he is the final cause or scope of it; and he is the conserving cause, or preserver and maintainer of it. So for the life of glory, which believers have in reversion, Christ is also the life of that life; thus he has purchased it for them, he has given it to them, he has taken and keeps possession of it, in their names, he has prepared it for them, and them for it, and will put them into the full and actual possession of it, in his own time. Note, 2. That death is the believer's gain; death in general, violent as well as natural death; it is not only not injurious, but advantageous; no hurt, but profit; no loss, but benefit; not only to die for Christ, but "to die in Christ is gain: blessed are the dead that die in the Lord," as well as those that die for the Lord. Death appears again to the believer, if we consider the private evils it frees and delivers him from, namely, from sin, from all temptations to sin, from all inclinations to offend, from all possibility of sinning, from all temporal afflictions, from all sufferings for God, from all sufferings from man for God's sake; especially if we consider the positive good that the believer gains by death, namely, perfection in grace, fulness of joy, the blessed vision, the society of glorified saints and angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. So then, if a state of perfect holiness and purity be better than a state of corruption and temptation, if a state of rest and peace be better than a state of labor and sorrow, if it be better to be triumphing above, than sighing and groaning below; then dead saints are better where they are, than where they were, and death to them is gain, and infinitely advantageous. Note, 3. That the gain which comes by death to the believer, is procured by Christ, namely, by his meritorious satisfaction, by his glorious ascension and possession, by his prevailing intercession; To live is Christ, to die is gain.

22 But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labor: yet what I shall choose I wot not.

23 For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better:

24 Nevertheless, to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

But if I live in the flesh, that is, If I shall continue to live longer in this mortal body, this is the fruit of my labor; that is, I foresee what will be the blessed fruit of my labor, namely, the conversion and gaining of more souls unto God and Christ: at least, as it is worth my labor, so shall it be my endeavour to glorify Christ, by my continuance in the world. Learn hence, That as it is the end of a minister's life, so he makes it the end of his living, to glorify Christ, by gaining souls unto him; and in order to the obtaining this great end, he is willing, for the present, to deny himself the advantage of being with Christ. Observe next, St. Paul's strait which he was now in, which to choose, either life, or death, if God should leave it to his choice; "I am in a strait betwixt two," that is, I am divided in my thoughts and desires, whether to wish for life, or death; his ardent love to Christ and himself inclined him to desire a dissolution, "I desire to be dissolved, and be with Christ;" but his affectionate regard to his beloved Philippians inclined him to desire a continuation of his time and talents; "nevertheless, to abide still in the flesh is more useful for you." Learn hence, 1. That the life of pious ministers is far more profitable for their people than death. 2. That their death being a departure unto Christ, is far better, and more desirable to themselves than life; their life is profitable to civilize some, to convert others, to convince the erroneous, to confirm the weak; the world wants them, the church wants them, their flocks want them, their families want them, and they want them most that think they could spare them best. But their death being a departure, an immediate departure unto Christ, is far better, and more desirable to themselves than life; "having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better:" better in point of honor; for as they here labored in the work of the ministry for him, they shall there sit down upon the throne with him, Rev. iii. 21. Better in point of profit; "He is heir, and possessor of all things," and they shall be joint heirs, and joint possessors with him: thus may the words be considered, with relation to St. Paul, as a minister of the gospel; but they may be further considered, with reference to him as a private christian; I desire to depart. Hence learn, That it is not only warrantable but highly commendable, for a christian to be not only fearless, but desirous of death. There are, 1. Unwarrantable and sinful desires of death; as when they are rash and hasty; when they are positive and peremptory, when they are directing and prescribing to God, either as to the time, or kind, or manner of our dissolution, and when our desires are purely selfish, desiring death only as a freedom from present evils, and as a prevention of future sufferings. 2. There are warrantable and justifiable desires of death and dissolution; namely, when we desire it to free us from the indwelling presence of sin, to put us into a state of perfect holiness, to bring us to the sight of Christ, to give us the possession of that happiness, which was contrived by infinite wisdom, purchased by infinite merit, prepared by infinite power, and bestowed by infinite love. 3. There are also commendable desires, or the last mentioned desires are highly commendable; they commend our faith and proclaim our certain belief of a future state; they commend our love to God, to Christ; they commend our obedience, &c. Learn, 2. That the souls of believers, at their departure from the body, are with Christ. Quest. What is it to be with Christ? Ans. It implies intuition, we shall see him, and see him as he is, not as he once was in a state of abasement; it implies fruition, we shall enjoy him, as well as see him, and enjoy him to satisfaction, Psal. xvii. ult. and it implies duration, we shall for ever be with the Lord. Quest. But how doth it appear, that the souls of good men, upon their departure from the body, are with Christ? Ans. Thus; they are immediately capable of his presence and enjoyment upon their departure, and they are fully prepared for it: if we be not fit for heaven when we die, we shall never be fit: all is done upon us that was ever intended to be done; and neither Christ's ardent desires to have his children with him, nor the vehement longings of their souls for the fruition and enjoyment of him, can or shall be delayed; such delays would make their hearts sick; no, they expect satisfaction, and God will not disappoint their expectation.

25 And, having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all, for your furtherance and joy of faith;

26 That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again.

St. Paul having in the foregoing verses, told the Philippians how needful it was for him to abide in the flesh, with respect to them, he here gives them a sort of confident assurance (which was given him by immediate revelation) that his life should at this time be preserved for the benefit of the church, and be set at liberty, and that he should come and spend a part of his time amongst them, for the furtherance of their faith, and the increase of their joy, that so they might have more abundant matter of rejoicing in Christ, having received a new proof of his power and good-will towards them, in delivering him their apostle from death, and sending him to them again. Learn hence, 1. That God always can, and sometimes will, so calm the rage of persecutors, that they cannot execute the evil by them intended and resolved against his faithful ministers and servants: Notwithstanding Nero's cruelty, St. Paul had a confident persuasion, that he should come out of prison, and once more visit the churches. Learn, 2. That Almighty God, in great mercy to his church, doth sometimes prolong the lives of his faithful ministers, and most useful servants, and keep them longer out of heaven, that his people may reap the greater advantage by their labors here on earth. Learn, 3. That the more unexpectedly the life of a laborious minister, or a pious and extraordinary christian is given him by God, the more abundant ought the church to be in their expressions of joy and thanksgiving to God for such an invaluable blessing; "That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you."

27 Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ: that, whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel;

28 And in nothing terrified by your adversaries; which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God.

Observe here, 1. The general charge given by the apostle to his beloved Philippians, that their lives should answer their light, and their practices correspond with their profession; "Let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel." A gospel-profession requires and calls for a gospel-conversation : as the gospel is a gospel of truth and faithfulness, of sincerity and plainness, so our conversation should be sincere and upright, without deceit or fraud ; as the gospel is a gospel of peace, so a christian conversation is a quiet, calm, and peaceable conversation : christians should be men of peace, peace-makers, peace-preservers, lovers of peace, and lovers in peace. The gospel is a gospel of love and mercy, of grace and goodness ; the badge and cognizance of Christ's disciples, the mark and brand of Christ's sheep, is love unfeigned ; thus a gospel conversation is an amicable, loving, and charitable conversation. Again, the gospel of Christ is a gospel of meekness and humility, and its chief lesson is humility ; " Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart," Matt. xi. 29, and " be ye clothed with humility," 1. Peter v. 5. In a word, the gospel of Christ is a gospel of holiness and purity ; a christian's conversation must be a pure and holy, and spotless conversation : saints by profession should be saints indeed ; and there is a comeliness, in a gospel-conversation, both as to the inward and outward man ; walk " as becometh the gospel of Christ," that is, answerable to the precepts and commands of the gospel, answerable to the promises and encouragements of the gospel, answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords, answerable to that grand pattern of holiness which the gospel sets before us, and answerable to that high and glorious hope which the gospel raises us up to the general expectation of ; this is to walk as " becometh the gospel of Christ." Observe, 2. The apostle, having given a general injunction to walk as becometh the gospel of Christ, next gives a particular injunction for concord and unity amongst themselves. " That ye stand fast in one spirit, with one mind." Learn hence, That all those who would walk worthy of the gospel, should endeavour after a close, holy, and lasting union amongst themselves. We can never expect to thrive in grace, if we do not live in peace : let us prize unity and peace as the beauty and strength of the body, and let us pursue peace and union with the utmost strength of our soul. Observe, 3. Another duty exhorted to, and that is, an united contention, " striving together for the faith of the gospel:" before, he exhorted them to an holy union ; now to an united contention ; unite, but strive ; yet let your striving be in communion, not in contention : strive together in all holy and united endeavours to comfort and confirm one another in the faith of the gospel. Observe, 4. He exhorts them, as to an holy union, and an united contention, so to an humble boldness, " in nothing terrified by our adversaries;" in nothing, that is, terrified at nothing they can do, and terrified in no degree at any thing they shall do. Be not afraid to be holy ; for your adversaries can never hurt you, if they do not hinder you in your duty : the less they fear God, the less you need to fear them. Observe, 5. A double argument to persuade them to the foregoing duty, " in nothing terrified by their adversaries." 1. This will be to them an evident token of perdition ; that is an united, humble, peaceable boldness in your holy course, whereby you walk in the spirit and power of the gospel, without fright or fear, will be to your persecutors an evident token of perdition. Persecution is a black mark of a son of perdition, and a very evident token to a man's own conscience that he is in the way of destruction. 2. But to you of salvation, that is, such as suffer patiently, yet resolutely, for the gospel, are in the way of salvation, and their sufferings shall promote their eternal salvation ; it is added, Salvation, and that of God ; now this implies two things ; 1. That the salvation of suffering christians shall be sure, they shall certainly be saved, for God has undertaken for it : now, if it be God that saves, who shall destroy ? satan will say, " Serve me, and I will serve you ; but he is feeble, and cannot ; false, and will not save ; the world will say, " Cast in your lot among us, and we will save you harmless ;" but there is no more trust to be given to the children, than to the father of lies : but if the God of truth and power says, I will save ; who shall say nay ? 2. That their salvation shall be great, as well as sure ; he will save them with a mighty salvation, from their mighty sufferings and mighty fears : suffer for Christ, and then fear none of those things which you shall suffer.

29 For unto you it is given, in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake :

These words came by the way of encouragement, to the practice of the forementioned duty, namely, of courageous suffering for the gospel of Christ ; he tells them, that as ability to believe on Christ, so likewise power to suffer for Christ, were both the gift of God, and as such, purchased by Christ for them, and freely bestowed upon them. Learn hence, 1. That it is the duty of the disciples and followers of Jesus, not only to believe in him, but cheerfully to suffer for him, when he calls them to it ; not only to believe, but to suffer. Learn. 2. That suffering for Christ is the gift of God, as well as faith in Christ ; " unto you it is given, not only to believe, but to suffer ;" afflictions are the donatives of the gospel ; suffering for Christ is the gift of Christ, 1. Ability to suffer is his gift ; it is the purchase of his merits, it is the fruit of his mediation. Preparation for suffering, and patience under suffering, are the gift of Christ. 2. As abilities for suffering, so the comforts of suffering, are the gift of Christ ; through him it is that the saints' glory in tribulation, and their trials are not only tolerable, but joyous. In short, to suffer for Christ is, first, a free gift ; and secondly, an honorable gift ; and thirdly, a special and peculiar gift : it is a gift peculiar to saints, yea, peculiar only to some saints ; it is only peculiar to saints ; the angels glorify Christ by doing, but not by suffering. I doubt not, but had the angels bodies of flesh, as saints have, they would be glad to lay their necks on the block for Christ, as saints do : but this is the peculiar privilege of believers, " unto you it is given, and not to them." And although a suffering disposition, a readiness and preparation of mind to glorify Christ by suffering, is given to all believers ; yet the honor of actual suffering death for Christ, is given but to a few. Learn, 3. That faith in Christ must go before suffering for Christ ; it must first be given to us to believe on him, before we can suffer for his sake : then only are sufferings truly christian, and an evidence of salvation, when the sufferer is first a believer ; without the shield of faith, we can no more resist the fury of the persecutors, than we can repel the fiery darts of the destroyer : " Unto you it is given, on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but, &c."

30 Having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me.

Here is the last argument made use of by the apostle to encourage them unto patient suffering for the gospel of Christ ; as it would render them conformable to Christ their Head, so to him their apostle, who suffered many hard things when he was at Philippi, as they had seen; and stood ready to suffer, not only bonds, but death itself, now he was at Rome, which they heard of: "Having the same conflict which you saw in me, and now hear to be in me." Here observe, 1. The title given by St. Paul to his sufferings for the gospel, he calls them a conflict. Learn, That christian courage under sufferings cannot be kept up without a mighty conflict: we must conflict with our enemies, with the rage of our persecutors; we must conflict with ourselves, and with our own spirits, to keep them from fainting under persecution; and we must even conflict with God himself, wrestle with him, by prayers, for extraordinary measures of strength to support us under sufferings, and to enable us to glorify God in and by them. Well might the apostle then call his sufferings a conflict. Observe, 2. St. Paul encourages the Philippians to conflict with sufferings, from his own example before them, "having the same conflict which you saw in me." Learn, That the prudent and patient sufferings of the ministers of Christ for the truth of the gospel are, and ought to be, a powerful encouragement to all their people to conflict with the like difficulties and trials for the testimony of Christ; the Captain goes first, leads the van, his ministers follow, and their people bring up the rear; and, having suffered together, they shall be also glorified together; a suffering head, and suffering members, shall never be separated.

CHAPTER II.

Our apostle, in the concluding part of the foregoing chapter recommended to the Philippians' care and practice, the duty of constancy in the faith of the gospel, and of christian unity amongst themselves, the professors of the gospel; but he could not satisfy himself with a simple and naked proposing of this duty, but in this chapter he urges and enforces it with a most elegant and prevalent ostentation, charging and abjuring them, as it were, by all that is dear and precious to them, and as they had any regard unto, or value for the most glorious privileges of christianity, to be like-minded, to be found in the exercise and practice of unity and humility; and accordingly he begins this chapter with a most pathetic insinuation, which has also the force of a most rational argumentation: saying, in the first verse unto them,

I*f there be, therefore, any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies:*

2 Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, and of one mind.

Here we have observable, 1. The important duty which the apostle exhorts the Philippians to, and that is love and unity; unity in judgment and opinion, unity in heart and affection, unity in design and endeavours; so necessary and advantageous is the duty of unity and concord among all the professors of christianity, that all the cautions and warnings, all the advice and counsel, all the melting entreaties and passionate importunities of the ministers of Christ are little enough to excite persons to it, and direct them in the practice of it. Observe, 2. What an heap of arguments the apostle makes use of to excite and quicken the Philippians to the love and practice of this duty: "If there be any consolation in Christ, any comfort of love, and fellowship of the Spirit, any bowels and mercies." As if he had said, If ever you have tasted, by means of my ministry, any sweetness and consolation in Christ and his holy religion, if ever you have found any comfort in his love, if ever you have enjoyed any communion with the Spirit, if ye be men, and have any bowels of mercy for yourselves, if ye be christians, and have any pity for me in my bonds, "fulfil ye my joy in this, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, and of one mind." O, the tenderness, the gentleness and meekness of soul which was in St. Paul, and ought to be in every spiritual pastor towards his people, to win them, and prevail upon them to love the truth and peace! Fulfil ye my joy, says the apostle; as if he had said, Sufferings, I have enough already; O do not you, by your divisions and dissensions add more: I am already a prisoner, expecting the sentence of death, preparing for the sword of persecution, but none of these things move me: I can rejoice in a dungeon, sing in the stocks, triumph in death, if I can but hear you stand fast in one spirit, striving together for the faith of the gospel: but, if I hear that you are broken by divisions my heart is broke; the news of differences and dissensions among you will be heavier to me than my chain, darker than my dungeon, sharper than Nero's sword. Do not thus add to my sorrow and sufferings; but as you have begun and occasioned joy in me. I beseech you fulfil and complete my joy, by your being of one heart, of one mind, entirely one.

3 Let nothing be done through strife or vain-glory.—

Here our apostle dissuadeth the Philippians from a double vice, destructive to unity, namely, contention and vain-glory, which are the very bane of unity and unanimity; let nothing be done amongst you through emulation and envy, through contention and vain-glory: pride and ambition are usually attended with strife and contention: a vain-glorious person over-rates himself, undervalues others, and breaks the peace with all.

—But in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves.

Here our apostle directs to humility, in order to peace and unity; which humility he styles lowliness of mind, a grace whereby a man thinks meanly of himself, and highly of others, having a better opinion of others' wisdom and piety than his own; now this a man may do, and not sin though he be mistaken; the publican judged the pharisee better than himself: and though it was not so God did not disapprove him for it, but he went away justified. It is no crime to judge another better than ourselves, though he be not so; but it is pride to judge another worse than ourselves, though he be really so. Learn hence, That true humility doth not consist in lowliness of expression, but in lowliness of mind and opinion; not the man who speaks meanly of himself, but he that thinks so, is the humble man. Learn, 2. That the humble or lowly-minded man is so conscious to himself of his own infirmities; so modest in the estimating of his own graces and virtues, and so forward to hope and believe the best of others, that not only in outward expression, but in real estimation, doth he give others a preference before himself: In lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than themselves.

4 Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others.

The apostle here dissuadeth from another sin, which is very destructive of unity and peace, of concord and love, and that is the sin of inordinate self-love, whereby we regard only our own honor and profit, wholly neglecting the concerns of others; look not every man on his own things, that is, his own private advantage only or chiefly, but take care of the things which tend to the advantage of others; not but that a christian may and ought to look at his own things, but not wholly: our regard must extend further than ourselves, and our own things; we must look on the things of others also; we must be as just and true to another's reputation as to our own, and regard both the honor and profit of our neighbour as well as our own: and where christians are of this public spirit and temper, it contributes much, very much, towards the preserving and maintaining of unity and peace among them.

5 Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus:

That is, this humble mind. Here the apostle presses the duty of humility, from Christ's example; he was a perfect pattern of humility when here on earth; example therefore should recommend this grace and virtue to us, which was so orient in the life of Christ, whose humility was as conspicuous as his innocency; and accordingly the apostle descends in the next verse, to give particular instances of the humility and humiliation of the Son of God.

6 Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God:

7 But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men:

8 And, being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

Behold here the greatest example of humility, of lowliness and abasement, that ever the world was acquainted with; the mighty God becomes less than man! To make a due estimate hereof, we must first observe, what Christ was before his incarnation and humiliation, namely, the great and mighty God: for, says the apostle, he was in the form of God, and equal with God; that is, being the substantial form, and essential image of the Father, enjoying the divine nature, with all its glory, and all the ensigns of majesty which God himself had eternally and invariably. As to be in the form of a servant, signifies that he was a servant; so to be in the form of God, signifies that he was God: and observe, 2. He was in the form of God, before he was in the form of a servant: And being in the form of God, he thought it no robbery to be equal with God: now if he thought it no robbery, it could be no robbery: and if no robbery, he must be equal; and if equal, he must be God by nature, as the Father is. Learn hence, That our Saviour possessed that glory which is truly divine, before he assumed our nature as man; he had a peerage or equality with his Father in glory; the angels adored him in heaven before his incarnation on earth, Isaiah vi. 1, 2. Observe, 3. What mighty abasement the holy Jesus, God, blessed for evermore, underwent, when he humbled himself; He was found in fashion as a man; he took upon him the form of a servant, and became obedient to death, even the death of the cross. Behold here, the Sun of Righteousness under an (almost total) eclipse: He that was eternally beautiful and glorious, being the brightness of his Father's glory, was so veiled, clouded, and debased in the day of his humiliation, that he appears not like a God, scarce like a man. Note, 1. He took upon him the form of a servant; now this was a lower degree of condescension, than the assuming the naked human nature; for a servant is not simply a man, but a mean man, a man in a low estate. Lord, what abasement was here, that Christ, who was in the form of God should degrade himself into the form of a servant, and take the human nature, without honor, after it had lost its primitive innocency, after sin had blotted the original glory of it, and withered the beauty and excellency thereof! O inconceivable condescension! Note, 2. He emptied himself, or made himself of no reputation, that is, in the day of his incarnation he laid aside the robes of his glory, he emptied himself of that divine splendor and majesty which before he had; not by ceasing to be what he was, but by assuming something to himself which before he was not, the Son of God descended from his throne, and put on our vile mortality; he parted with his glory, that he might part with his life for our salvation. Note, 3. He was made in the likeness of man, and found in fashion as a man; that is, he was truly and really a man, made in the likeness of other men, without any visible outward difference; he was in all things like unto us, sin only excepted. Rom. viii. 3. He is said to appear in the likeness of sinful flesh, that is, in flesh that had the marks, and miserable effects of sin upon it: not that Christ assumed sinful flesh, or flesh really defiled by sin, but he assumed the human nature, attended with a whole troop of human infirmities, which sin first let into that nature, as hunger and thirst, weariness and pain, mortality and death: by reason of which, though he was not a sinner, yet he looked like one, and they that conversed with him took him for one, seeing all these effects of sin upon him. Lord, what a stoop was this! To be made in the likeness of innocent flesh, had been much; but to be made in the likeness of sinful flesh, rebellious flesh, flesh though not defiled, yet miserably defaced by sin! O, what is this! and who can declare his humiliation? Note, 4. The nature of this humiliation; he humbled himself: the word imports both a real and a voluntary abasement: real; Christ did not personate an humble man, nor act the part of one in a debased state, but was really and in very deed humbled, both in the sight of God and man. And, as it was real, so also was his humiliation voluntary: it is not said, he was humbled, but that he humbled himself; he was willing to stoop to this low, and abject state for us: and it was the voluntariness of his humiliation that made it so acceptable to God, and so beneficial and serviceable to us. Note, 5. The degrees of our holy Lord's humiliation: he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Here we have the depth of Christ's humiliation specified: it was unto death, and also aggravated, even unto the death of the cross; he humbled himself, not only to become a mortal man, but a dead corpse; and that too hanging on a tree, dying the death of a malefactor: there was pain, shame, and a curse, in the death of the cross; Christ underwent the pain patiently, the shame meekly, the curse obediently, all of them willingly and cheerfully, that the justice of God might be satisfied, his wrath pacified, his majesty reconciled, death and hell vanquished and destroyed. Behold the transcendancy of Christ's love to the children of men! Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend: but greater love had the Son of God than this, that he laid down his life for his inveterate enemies; he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

9 Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name;

10 That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth:

11 And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

The former verse spake of the depth of Christ's humiliation: these, of the height of his exaltation. Where observe, 1. The dignity itself, conferred by God upon Christ; God exalted him, highly exalted him, exalted him above all exaltation, as the word signifies. Christ, in his resurrection, was exalted; in his ascension, he was very highly exalted; in his sitting at God's right hand, he was very highly exalted, above all exaltation. Observe, 2. How the steps of Christ's exaltation did punctually answer the steps of his humiliation; the first step of his humiliation was his incarnation, by which he was made man, and as our Surety, was made sin. The first step of his exaltation, was his resurrection, by which he was declared to be the Son of God with power; and, as our Surety, having paid our debt, was released from the prison of the grave. The second step of his humiliation was his poor and contemptible life, and his painful, shameful, and accursed death; answerable thereunto is Christ's ascension into heaven, and sitting there at God's right hand, advancing him above all principalities and power, that is, above all the angels, and placing him next to himself in dignity and honor. Observe, 3. The connexion between Christ's humiliation and exaltation, he humbled himself and became obedient unto the death; wherefore God hath highly exalted him. Where note, That some make the humiliation of Christ the meritorious cause of his exaltation; and his exaltation the reward of his humiliation; others make the humiliation of Christ only the antecedent of his exaltation; he humbled himself, and God has exalted him to a dignity above all dignities and pre-eminency whatsoever, making him king and head of his church, and giving him all power, both in heaven and earth, requiring, that the divine honor due to God, should be given to him also. Observe, 4. The particulars of our Lord's exaltation declared, and they are three. 1. God hath given him a name above every name: that is, dignity and power, majesty and authority, over all creatures both in heaven and earth. 2. That every knee, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, should bow to the name of Jesus: every knee, that is, every creature, in heaven, earth, and hell shall bow, that is, yield subjection to Christ, some voluntarily, others unwillingly; the good angels and good men paying a cheerful homage, the evil angels and bad men yielding a forced and constrained subjection to him. 3. That every tongue must confess that Jesus Christ is Lord: every tongue, that is, every person, men of all nations and languages, shall confess Christ crucified, to be the Lord and judge of the world, acknowledging his royal sovereignty and dominion. Observe, 4. The end of Christ's glorious exaltation, it was to the glory of God the Father; that is, it pleased God the Father, for his own glory, that the Lord Jesus Christ, after he had been deeply humbled, should be highly exalted. Observe lastly, The apostle's great design and scope in setting before the Philippians the humiliation and exaltation of Jesus Christ, and that was to excite them to the grace and duty of humility, that the same humble mind should be in them which was also in Christ Jesus: as if he had said, our Lord Jesus Christ humbled himself greatly for us, and afterwards was highly exalted by God, above us; so in proportion may you expect to be exalted by God, if you humble yourselves, in order to maintain and preserve the church's peace and unity; for before honor is humility.

12 Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling:

13 For it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to do, of his good pleasure.

Observe here, 1. The commendation given by St. Paul of his beloved Philippians, for their cheerful obedience to the precepts of the gospel; they always obey, that is, ever since their first conversion to christianity, not only while the apostle was upon the spot with them, but since the providence of God necessitated his absence from them, not in my presence only, but now much more in my absence. But how came it to pass, that their obedience was greater, when they wanted the apostle for their instructor? Ans. In the absence of one teacher, they had another, and him a better than the inspired apostle, even the inspiring Spirit of God, who in the apostle's absence, was more immediately present with them by his inward motions, to excite and enable them, both to will and to do what is well pleasing to him. O how good is God, at the supplying the wants, and making up the losses of his people! If persecution drives his church's ministers into dungeons, and they cannot hear a voice behind them, they shall have the presence of his Holy Spirit, and hear a voice within them, saying, This is the way, walk in it. Observe, 2. A special duty which St. Paul exhorts the Philippians to be found in the practice of, namely, To work out their own salvation with fear and trembling; implying, that it should be every christian's great work, to be daily working out his own salvation, that is, diligently making use of all means and faithfulness, practising all duties in order thereunto. Note here, 1. The excellency of the object proposed, and that is, salvation; there is salvation held forth and tendered by God, to lost sinners, in the gospel. Note, 2. The difficulty of salvation, supposed and implied in the word work, which signifies an exerting our utmost endeavours, in order to the attaining of it. The work of salvation is no lazy man's business, but a work of labor and difficulty, though the difficulties may be overcome by an industrious diligence. Note, 3. The necessity of perseverance, in order to our attaining of salvation: Work out your own salvation; that is, perfect and consummate the work which you have happily begun. Note, 4. The manner how we should work out our own salvation, namely, with fear and trembling; intimating, that an holy fear of God, and an humble fear of ourselves, will be of singular use and advantage to us in the working out of our salvation. Observe, 3. The argument or motive to excite unto this labor and diligence in and about the work of salvation; and this is very encouraging, because God works with us, and in us, ver. 13. For it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do: That God works with us is great encouragement to us to work; but we must remember God works arbitrarily, and not necessarily, he worketh but of his own good pleasure, as a free agent, who can cease when he pleases; therefore work with fear and trembling. Learn from the whole, 1. That we can do nothing without God. 2. That he will do nothing without us: we can do nothing without his assistance, he will do nothing without the concurrence of our endeavours, he worketh in us both to will and to do, and we must work with him, in order to the working out of our own salvation.

14 Do all things without murmurings, and disputings:

15 That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world.

16 Holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither labored in vain.

Here our apostle seems to resume the exhortation, which he began to press before, namely, to love and concord, to unity and peace among themselves; he exhorts them, as to do all things without contention, so without murmurings, and not disputings, in which, usually, the laws of charity are violated, and the peace of the church, and quietness among christians interrupted: and, to provoke them thereunto, he discovers to them the many great and blessed advantages which would redound unto him by their unity and concord. 1. Hereby they should be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke, that is, very inoffensive persons, or as the Greek word renders it, that ye may be the spotless sons of God; not absolutely spotless, pure and perfect, but without such spots as are inconsistent with your sonship; there is a spot which is, and a spot which is not, the spot of God's children. Deut. xxxii. 4. Sins of infirmity, are spots found upon the best of his children; sins of presumption, if at any time found upon you, they are not the spots of his children. 2. Hereby they should shine as lights in the world, that is, in the pagan world, and in the christian church: this imports both the high dignity and special duty of christians, to be as so many suns, to arise and shine like mighty luminaries in the firmament of the world, casting out their rays and beams in a holy and heavenly conversation. 3. Hereby they would hold forth the word of life; not only hold it fast for their own comfort, but hold it forth for others' benefit, that is, in their christian practice and profession; the lives of christians should publish the word of life, to the intent, that the enemies of it may fall in love with it. Perhaps as many have been converted to christianity, by holding forth the word of life in practice, as by holding it forth from the pulpit; an holy life is the loudest proclamation, and the best way of holding forth the word of life. 4. Hereby he should have joy and rejoicing, as well as they reap benefit and advantage: "That I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, nor labored in vain;" that is, that I have not preached the gospel unprofitably amongst you. Here note, That the work of the ministry is a laborious work, a spending work; the apostle here sets it forth by running a race, which is a wasting and strength-consuming exercise; I have run, I have labored. Note, 2. That the labor and pains of the most faithful and indefatigable ministers of Christ may be, and too often are lost upon, and in vain, unto the people that are constantly made partakers of them: they may run in vain, and labor in vain, as to their people; but blessed be God, it shall not be in vain as to themselves, Isa. xlix. 4. Though Israel be not gathered, yet they shall be glorious." Note, 3. That the glory which shall be put upon our people in the day of judgment, who were converted to God by our ministerial endeavours, will add to our joy as ministers, and be our crown of rejoicing in that day: "That I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, nor labored in vain."

17 Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all.

18 For the same cause also do ye joy and rejoice with me.

Behold here, how St. Paul, the under shepherd, imitates Christ, that great and good Shepherd, in his readiness to lay down his life for his sheep: not for their reconciliation, but for their confirmation; If, says he, it shall please God that I be, by martyrdom, offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith; that is, to establish you in the faith which I have taught you, and to confirm and seal the truth of it with my blood, I will rejoice therein for your sakes, and I desire you to rejoice with me, and to bless God for me in so doing. Note here, the emphasis and elegance of the apostle's words. If I be offered up; a manifest allusion to the Jewish sacrifices, in which there was wine poured out as a libation upon the sacrifice, and then offered up to God. Thus, says he, if my blood, like wine, be poured forth, whilst I am employed by the preaching of the gospel, to render you Gentiles an acceptable sacrifice, and a sweet-smelling savour unto God, I should rejoice even thus to die in your service, and for the confirmation of your faith, Hence learn, That life itself is not, and will not be thought too dear, or accounted by the ministers of Christ too much to lay down in the service of their people's souls, and for the confirmation of their faith; "If I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice." Learn, 2. That the ministers of Christ should not preach any thing to their people, but what they dare seal and confirm the truth of with their very blood, if God calls them thereunto; St. Paul had before preached the doctrine of the gospel to the Philippians, and now he stood ready to seal it with his blood.

19 But I trust in the Lord Jesus to send Timotheus shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort when I know your state.

20 For I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your state.

21 For all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's.

22 But ye know the proof of him, that, as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the gospel.

23 Him, therefore, I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me.

Our apostle having finished the first part of the chapter, which contained exhortations to duty, comes now to the second part of it, containing arguments of comfort; and here, first, he comforts the Philippians, by promising to send Timothy unto them shortly. Observe, here, 1. The greatness of St. Paul's soul, widened with desires to advance the kingdom of Jesus Christ; his pious zeal put him upon contriving some way of making a supply of his necessitated absence from the Philippians; what he could not do by himself, he desires and endeavours to do by another, even Timothy; him he promises to send as a living epistle, to instruct and exhort, to quicken and comfort the church at Philippi, in his constrained absence from her, "Blessed apostle! So that Christ might be advanced, thou caredst not by whom it were, whether by thyself, or by another; thou wert willing to stand in the crowd, and be hidden, so that Christ might stand upon another's shoulders, and be seen!" I trust in the Lord to send Timotheus to you shortly. Observe, 2. St. Paul, being about to send Timothy to Philippi, sends first a commendation of him: and that which he particularly commends Timothy for, was his affectionate love unto the Philippians, and his tender care and concern for them; I have no man like minded, who will care for your state; now, this care in Timothy for and towards the Philippians, is here commended by St. Paul in several observable instances of it. 1. It was a spiritual care chiefly, he careth for your state, that is, for your spiritual state; not that he was without concern for their temporal happiness, but the prosperity of their souls was the prime object of his care. 2. It was a solicitous care, the Greek word signifies an anxious care, a soul-cutting, a soul-rending care; his care was not to cut and wound the souls, to vex and grieve the spirits of his people, but he cuts his own soul with caring for his people: 3. It was a sincere care, a natural genuine care, he naturally careth for your state; naturally, that is, heartily, sincerely, not artificially, and in appearance only; some can artificially act the part of a zealot, when their own interest or applause makes it necessary; but Timothy was unskilful in such arts, he did naturally, cheerfully, and constantly care for their state; there was a reality, yea, a large quantity of love, a hearty affection toward the Philippians, found with him. 4. St. Paul commends this care in Timothy towards them, for the rarity of it; I find none like minded, that is few, very few, like-minded with him, and equal-hearted to him in the cause of Christ: St. Paul had divers ministers now with him, but one Timothy; others sought their own things, but he the things of Jesus Christ: yet, I conceive this is not to be understood universally, but synecdochically; not as if all ministers, except Timothy only sought themselves, and regarded their own private interest, but the most and far greatest part did so, refusing to undertake such a tedious journey from Rome to Philippi, as Timothy stood ready to undertake. Learn hence, That it is a great sin in all, but especially in the ministers of Jesus Christ, to be of a self-seeking spirit. Observe, 5. He commends this care of Timothy's towards them by their experimental knowledge of it, and acquaintance with it; for, when old Paul was at Philippi, young Timothy was an assistant to him, as a son to a father, obeying his counsels, following his directions, imitating his example, in all things tending to the edification of the church, Now from the whole, that is, from St. Paul's care to send Timothy thus qualified, to labor in the gospel at the church in Philippi, we note, That such as have power to send forth ministers to flocks, and pastors to take care of the souls of the people, should send such as are both able and willing to spend and be spent for the good of souls, and, if it may be, such as are well known unto, and approved of by the flock, for their zeal and diligence in the work of Christ. St. Paul here is a pattern for all patrons, laying before them the qualifications of the persons whom they should recommend to the cure of souls, such as with Timothy have a compassion for souls, a truly solicitous care and concern for the happiness and welfare of souls, such as the people have had some knowledge of, or at least a liberty to inquire after; the man of good ministerial abilities, not of great simoniacal gifts: for if patrons in the execution of that vast trust (but little considered,) do seek only their own things, no wonder that their clerks seek not the things of Jesus.

24 But I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly.

25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother, and companion in labor, and fellow-soldier, but your messenger, and he that ministered to my wants.

26 For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick.

27 For indeed he was sick nigh unto death; But God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, declared his resolutions to send Timothy to the Philippians as soon as he should see how it would go with himself at Rome, and what would be the issue of his bonds; and having also discovered his own purpose to come himself to them, as soon as the providence of God should set him at liberty; in the mean time, he assures them, he would no longer detain their own special minister Epaphroditus from them, whom they had so kindly sent with a liberal supply unto him, in the prison at Rome; "I suppose it necessary to send unto you Epaphroditus, my brother, my companion in labor, my fellow soldier, your messenger, and he that ministered to my wants." Here, note, 1. How copious St. Paul is in the recommendation of Epaphroditus; he calls him his brother, his brother in Christ, his brother in the ministry, his companion in labor, his fellow-laborer in Christ's vineyard, travelling from one part of it to another, to plant and propagate the gospel of Christ: his fellow soldier, also, a faithful and constant associate with him in the christian warfare: their apostle or messenger, the bishop of Philippi, say the ancient fathers; their messenger, to carry the church's alms to St. Paul, say others: behold here, in St. Paul's sending away Epaphroditus laden thus with commendation, the great modesty, sincerity, and humility, of this chief apostle. St. Paul had many prerogatives above Epaphroditus, he was immediately called by Christ, extraordinarily fitted, and furnished for his calling; he labored more abundantly; and suffered more abundantly than all the rest; yet he almost equalizes and levels Epaphroditus with himself, calling him brother, fellow-laborer, fellow soldier, and highly magnifies the gifts and graces of God's Spirit in him, without the least diminution, teaching such as are dignified in the church, and exalted by their merits above others, not to despise the persons, nor to extenuate and lessen the gifts, and graces, and usefulness of their inferior brethren. Pride in any person is odious, but in a minister, it is monstrous; they that have received more than others, and know better than others, ought to be patterns of humility unto others. Note, 2. The reasons here assigned, why St. Paul judged it necessary to send Epaphroditus back to his charge at Philippi. 1. He longed after his flock, ver. 26. He longed after you all, even unto heaviness; we do not read of his longing after his family, or his friends, or the fleece, but his flock, his church and charge at Philippi; this lay near his heart, this he longed to be with. 2. This longing and heaviness was mutual, the Philippians longed for him, and were full of heaviness because of his sickness. When the head of a faithful minister of Jesus Christ makes his people's hearts ache; mutual longings between minister and people in case of absence, and mutual heaviness and mourning in case of sickness, is a certain argument and evidence of mutual love one towards another. Note, 3. How our apostle confirms the report of Epaphroditus' sickness, and celebrates the mercy and goodness of God in his unexpected recovery; "indeed he was sick nigh unto death, but God had mercy on him." &c. Here observe, 1. The eminency of the person who was sick, Epaphroditus, a great man, a good man, a man of God. St. Paul's brother, companion, fellow-soldier, falls sick, when engaged in Christ's and the church's special service; saints as well as sinners, ministers as well as people (No. 58.)

ple are subject to sickness, diseases, nay, death itself may meet them in the work of Christ. Observe, 2. As the eminency of the person, so the extremity of the disease, he was nigh unto death. But why did not St. Paul, who had the gift of healing, help Epaphroditus now sick, as well as raise Eutychus when dead? Acts xx. 9. Ans. The apostles had not the gift of healing to make use of at their pleasure, but as God was pleased by a special instinct and a strong faith to excite them to it, when it was his pleasure to have them use it: these gifts were given for the sake of unbelievers, to convince them of the truth of christianity, but God did not think fit to have them ordinarily exercised upon believers. Observe, 3. The recovery of Epaphroditus, and the author of it, God had mercy on him; he who is Lord of life and death, said in mercy to him, "Return, and live." When God preserves the lives, and restores the health of his faithful ministers, it is an act of no small mercy both to their people and themselves: to their people, as they become the greater instruments of their good: to themselves, as it increases their own reward; the longer a minister lives, the more glory he brings to God; and the more glory he brings to God on earth, the more glory shall he partake of with God in heaven; in short, the longer he lives the more souls he converts, and every soul is a new gem added to that crown, which shall one day be put upon his head. Dan xii. 3. "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever." Observe, lastly, The share which St. Paul had in the mercy of Epaphroditus' recovery, "God had mercy, not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow." Paul had much sorrow, a great load of sorrow upon him at that time; he was now among strangers, yea, among prisoners, in the midst of persecutors, and his mind oppressed with sorrow, partly for the Philippians, partly for Epaphroditus; therefore, the Lord, in tender pity to him, did not take away by death his dear and useful companion, lest he should have sorrow upon sorrow, and cause his wounds to bleed afresh. Learn hence, so compassionate is God towards his dear children, that, though he often causes them grief and sorrow, yet he will not overcharge them therewith, nor add affliction to the afflicted, nor suffer them to be exercised and tried above what they are able; "God had mercy on me, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow."

28 I sent him, therefore, the more carefully, that when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less sorrowful.

29 Receive him, therefore, in the Lord, with all gladness, and hold such in reputation;

30 Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life to supply your lack of service toward me.

Here first St. Paul assigns the reason why he was so careful to send back Epaphroditus to the Philippians, namely, to assuage his own grief, and to increase their joy, "that when ye see him ye might rejoice, and I be the less sorrowful."

Next the apostle exhorts them to receive him with all joy and gladness, and to give him, and all such as he was, due honor, and deserved respect; and, doubtless, the Philippians received him with inexpressible joy, as the minister of Christ risen from the dead, recovered from the grave; received to life and service, when all hopes of enjoying him were cut off. O the folly and frailty of human nature! We prize our mercies more by the want, than by the worth of them. Lastly, He assigns a special reason why he would have them receive him with such demonstrations of joy, namely, because it was in their and his service that he was brought to the very brink of the grave, for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death; the work here meant is properly his journey to Rome, which was long and tedious; his watchings and pains-taking with and for the apostle there were very spending, he endeavoured to supply the absence and want of the whole church to St. Paul; his zeal for God, and his affection to St. Paul, carried him out beyond himself, beyond his strength, to the apparent prejudice both of his health and life. Learn hence, 1. That to relieve the members, but especially the ministers of Christ, in their necessities and wants, is the work of Christ; for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death; ministers are not only engaged in the work of Christ when they preach, &c. but when they visit their flock, inquire into the wants of the poor, and administer to the necessities of the distressed, this is the work of Christ. Learn, 2. That sickness may overtake, yea, death itself may meet the faithful servants and ministers of Christ, when they are engaged in his own work: it was in the work of the Lord that Epaphroditus met with his sickness; and had he met with death itself he had been happy; for, "Blessed are they that die in the work of the Lord, they shall rest from their labors, and their works shall follow them."

CHAPTER III.

The design and scope of our apostle, in this chapter, is to arm the church of the Philippians against those false judaizing teachers, who confounded Christ and Moses, circumcision and the gospel together; this he doth by several arguments, namely, first, from the disposition, quality, and end of those false teachers; they are dogs, unclean beasts, that bark only for the belly, and do not only bark, but watch their times to bite too. Our apostle therefore wisely warns the Philippians, in the chapter before us.

FINALLY, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord.—

There is no duty which believers do more willingly hear or more difficultly observe, than the duty of spiritual rejoicing; had our apostle called upon the blessed angels to rejoice, who have neither sin, nor sorrow, nor fear, nor sufferings, nor enemies to annoy them, that might have seemed agreeable: but is it at all congruous to persuade sinners, loaded with guilt, and defiled with corruption, clothed with infirmities, assaulted with temptations, persecuted by the world? To bid them rejoice, may seem strange: but the wonder will cease, if we consider the object which he directs them to rejoice in, and that is the Lord; not in themselves, but the Lord Jesus Christ: My brethren, rejoice in the Lord. Learn hence, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ is the great, sure, and perpetual joy of his own people; the object of joy is a present good, a precious good, a proportionable good, a perpetual good, such is our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn, 2. That it is the duty of all sincere and serious christians to joy and rejoice in him. Finally, brethren, rejoice in the Lord; rejoice in his person, in the treasures of wisdom and knowledge that are found in him, which render him an object worthy of angelical adoration; rejoice in his mediation, in the great things he has done and suffered for you, in the graces of his Spirit conferred upon you, and in the hopes of that glory to which he has intitled you.

—To write the same things to you, to me, indeed, is not grievous, but for you it is safe.

To write the same things, that is, not the same things which I wrote before, but the same things which I preached to you before, and which you often heard by word of mouth from me before; though I inculcate and press the same truths upon you by my writing, which I have done by my preaching, it is neither grievous nor burdensome to me, nor unnecessary or unprofitable for you. Learn hence, That the often repeating, and frequent inculcating of such truths as are most useful and necessary for the instruction and edification of the hearers, ought to be esteemed neither burdensome by the minister, nor wearisome by the people. Learn farther, That we have here St. Paul's judgment against oral tradition, which the church of Rome prefers before the written word; so did not St. Paul, knowing that what is delivered by word of mouth might soon slip out of the memory, but what is written, is remaining: Blessed be God for his written word.

2 Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the concision.

Observe here, 1. The cautionary direction given the Philippians to beware of false teachers, who adulterated and corrupted the doctrine of Christ, by joining the works and observances of the law with the doctrine of the gospel, in point of justification, making them at least the partial ground of their confidence and rejoicing; beware of such, says our apostle. Observe, 2. The cutting reproof given to these judaizing teachers, in that odious character he gives of them, and in that brand of infamy which he claps upon them. 1. He calls them dogs; a term not of diminution only, but of utmost disgrace; Is thy servant a dog? 2 Kings viii. 13. supposing that nothing could be thought more vile and base. The Jews called all the Gentiles dogs, because unclean; St. Paul here calls the false teachers dogs fitly, because, as dogs, they did rend and tear the simplicity of the gospel, and divide the glory of man's salvation betwixt faith and works; because, as dogs, they did bark out reproaches against the apostles and their doctrine, delivered in its native purity and simplicity; because, as dogs, they did take a great deal of pains to compass abundance of ground to gain their game; or in our Saviour's words, They compass sea and land to make proselytes. 2. Evil workers, because pretending to labor in the gospel, they did subvert and overthrow the great design of the gospel, pretending to be fellow-workers with the apostles, but pulling down what they built up. 3. The concision: so in contempt he calls circumcision, which these judaizing teachers pleaded the necessity of; as Hezekiah called the brazen serpent Nebush-tan; because circumcision, being no longer an ordinance of God, was no better than a cutting off the flesh; and they that made it necessary to justification, cut themselves off from Christ, and from the church of Christ; by urging the necessity of circumcision, they cut and rent asunder the church of God. Note here, 1. How different the temper of this apostle was in different cases; in things of an indifferent nature, and less necessary, who more mild, indulgent, and complying, breathing forth the spirit of the meek Jesus? But when opinions were broached, which tend to pervert souls, and to subvert the gospel, then he speaks fire and thunder, and no terms are bad enough for such seducers: let us follow St. Paul, as he followed Christ, and learn when to be mild, and when to be zealous. Note, 2. With what an excess of care he cautions the Philippians against these false teachers, saying, Beware, beware, beware; three times together in one short verse, thereby instructing the ministers of Christ, that their utmost zeal and diligence is necessary in warning their people to guard against seducers.

3 For we are the circumcision, which worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh.

That is, we Christians are alone the true and spiritual circumcision, and accounted circumcised by God, because we have that which the outward circumcision signified, namely, the circumcision of the heart, and the mortification of all carnal lusts and desires: we have the substance of that ordinance, which is infinitely more pleasing to God than the ceremony and shadow: though you have the sign, we have the thing signified. But how doth that appear? Three ways: we worship God in the Spirit, we rejoice in Christ Jesus, we have no confidence in the flesh. 1. We worship God in the Spirit, that is, 1. We give him the worship of our souls and spirits, and do not put him off with mere bodily worship, or with the old antiquated Jewish worship. 2. We worship God in the spirit, that is, through the assistance of the Holy Spirit; he excites and quickens to the duty, he assists and enables in the duty, and he encourages and emboldens the soul to expect audience and acceptance after the duty. Again, 2. We rejoice in Christ Jesus; this was a second evidence of their being the true circumcision. Let them glory in their carnal ordinance of outward circumcision, we will rejoice in Christ Jesus, who hath freed us from the slavery of that ordinance. 3. We have no confidence in the flesh, not in circumcision, or any fleshly privileges, or carnal prerogatives; we confide only in Christ, and in nothing but Christ. Note, That by flesh here, is meant particularly, the circumcision of the flesh; but more generally, by flesh, may be understood, all the externals of religion, which men place their trust and confidence in, all outward privileges and ordinances are flesh, in the apostle's sense here; prayer is flesh, ordinances are flesh, the righteousness of the law is flesh; nay, grace itself, trusted to and confided in, is flesh: the sincere and serious Christian rejoices in Christ Jesus, confides in him, but dares not place any confidence in the flesh: "We are the circumcision, who worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh."

4 Though I might also have confidence in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more:

5 Circumcised the eighth day, of the stock of Israel; of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee:

6 Concerning zeal, persecuting the church; touching the righteousness which is in the law blameless.

As if our apostle had said, "Let no man think that I undervalue the Jewish privileges, because I want them; show me ever a judaizing teacher of them all that can pretend to more, or so many of them as myself; so that, were this a ground of confidence, I can vie with any one of them in carnal privileges, Jewish prerogatives, and outward performances: yea, I can boast of as much self-righteousness as the best of them, and beyond them all, for I was circumcised, and had the seal of the covenant applied to me, yea, I was circumcised the eighth day, the very day prescribed by the law; the Jews maintaining, that circumcision before the eighth day was of less value? Of the stock of Israel, one of that nation which God set apart for himself, when he rejected all the nations of the earth beside: Of the tribe of Benjamin, of a noble tribe, as well as descended of an honorable people; a tribe, which kept close to God, when other tribes revolted to the worship of Jeroboam's calves: a tribe honored with the first of Israel's kings, king Saul: An Hebrew of the Hebrews, that is, born a Jew both by father's side and mother's side: As touching the law, a Pharisee; that is, as touching the interpretation and observation of the law, a Pharisee; or one of the strictest sects among the Jews for the profession of religion: Concerning zeal, persecuting the church; that is, as touching zeal for the Jewish religion, I have showed that above others in my fiery and furious persecution of the church of Christ; I was active according as my judgment and conscience directed me: "And as touching the righteousness which is in and by the law, that is, as to my personal obedience unto the law, I was blameless, without spot, as the original word signifies, that is, in my account, and in man's esteem, my conversation not stained with any gross sin, but very exact in my deportment and behaviour, living up to my knowledge, my practice corresponding with my profession." Behold here a man that had a large stock of Jewish privileges and prerogatives: all these grounds of confidence the apostle had before his conversion; and he might have rested there, and have gloried, and confided therein, as well as the Judaizing doctors did, who gloried in their external privileges: but how far St. Paul was from this spirit and temper, the next verses inform us.

7 But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ.

8 Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Christ.

That is, the forementioned privileges, which heretofore he accounted gain, and thought to gain justification and salvation by, now, since his illumination, he counted them all lost; he saw he had lost his soul for ever, had he trusted to these; but Christ being made known to him as the only way to gain pardon of sin and acceptance with God, he renounced all his former privileges, his former legal righteousness, he durst not lean upon these broken reeds, he would have no more confidence in the flesh, but in Christ only; "what things were reputed gain to me, those I accounted loss for Christ's sake." And he repeats the words over again with confidence and assurance, that he might not be thought to speak unadvisedly, and in a heat; yea doubtless and I count all things but loss: he did not only count them loss, but he had actually renounced them as such: an allusion to a merchant, who is content to suffer the loss of all his goods to save his life. But how did St. Paul suffer the loss of them? Ans. He did not make shipwreck of holy duties and cast off the performance of them, but he cast off all dependency upon them, and cast away all expectation of happiness and salvation from them, which he had before. Observe further, He did not only count them loss, but cast them away as dung, as filthy carrion, as garbage cast to dogs, as the word signifies. Such things as these, false teachers (whom he called dogs) might delight in, but as for himself, he could relish and savor nothing in them, in comparison of Jesus Christ. In the words, observe, 1. The low esteem and mean account which St. Paul had, and every enlightened christian has, of the greatest advantages which this world doth or can afford; "in comparison of Jesus Christ, and him crucified, I count all things but loss;" all my spiritual privileges, with all my worldly advantages, I do, upon the greatest deliberation and thought, undervalue them all for the sake of Christ and his grace. Observe, 2. The high and honorable esteem which he had of the knowledge of Jesus Christ; he declares there was a transcendent excellency in it; for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord." The knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the way and method of salvation by and through him, is an excellent knowledge; every thing of Jesus Christ is excellent and worthy to be known; the dignity of his person, as God, as man, as God-man, or Mediator between God and man; the dignity of his offices, as the great King, Priest, and Prophet of his church; the eminency of his example, the depth of his humiliation, the height of his exaltation, the transcendency of his love in all his undertakings for us, and the way and method of his justification of us by faith in his blood. We may conclude of the act by the object; Christ is the most excellent object, therefore the knowledge of Christ is, and must be, the most excellent knowledge; not only all the excellencies of the creatures are found in him in the most excellent manner, but all the excellencies of the God-head, the fulness of the God-head, dwells in him bodily, that is, personally and substantially. Observe, 3. The effect which this knowledge of Christ had upon our apostle; it enabled him to suffer the loss of all things: those that have attained the excellent knowledge of Jesus Christ, will not think much, for to suffer the loss of any thing, yea, of all things, for the obtaining of him, and salvation by him. Observe, 4. The end and design of St. Paul, in parting with all for Christ, or the motive and encouragement which induced him thereunto, namely, that he might win Christ; that is, that he might obtain an interest in him and the blessings purchased by him; for this was he willing to part with all his privileges, all his accomplishments, all his enjoyments, all his own righteousness, his exactness in the outward observation of the law; he renounced it all, not in point of performance, but in point of dependance; he renounced all confidence in it for his justification before God; yea, doubtless, I count all things but loss, &c.

9 And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith:

Observe here, 1. The subject matter of St. Paul's desire was to be found in Christ. Beza, upon the place, brings in the justice of God pursuing Paul as a malefactor; and Christ as the city of refuge which he desires to flee unto, and be found in. By being found in Christ, then, understood ingrafting, and incorporating into him by faith, to find acceptance with God, through him, as our surety and representative, and to persevere in our obedience to him to the end of our lives. Learn, That such as desire, above all things, to be found in Christ, are willing to do, to suffer any thing, yea, all things; and care not in what condition they be found, how poor and low, how afflicted and despised soever, so they may be found in Christ. Observe, 2. The manner how St. Paul desires to be found in Christ; this is expressed both negatively and positively. 1. Negatively, not having mine own righteousness which is of the law: that is, not depending upon any thing he could call his own, neither upon his spiritual privileges, nor natural accomplishments, no religious performances, nor upon his most perfect righteousness, and best obedience, for his justification before God, knowing it to be both unwarrantable and unsafe so to do; unwarrantable, because our good works never had the impress of God's ordination for that end; they were never designed to justify our persons, but to justify our faith; and unsafe it is to trust to our own righteousness and best services, because of the many sinful imperfections cleaving to them; alas! they cannot justify themselves; how then should they justify us? Our best duties deserve to be thrown as so much dung upon our faces: surely we may plead the excellency, and preach the necessity of good works, though we do not set them in Christ's chair: such then as would be found in Christ, though they are ever so careful to maintain good works, (which it is their duty and interest, their daily care and endeavour to do) yet they dare not rest in them, nor rely upon them for justification, or make any thing in themselves, or done by themselves, the ground of their confidence. Christ's perfect obedience, entitles us to heaven; our own imperfect (if sincere) obedience, will evidence that title. Some rely upon a natural righteousness, that which they call good nature; others rely upon a negative righteousness, because they are not so righteous as some; others rely upon a positive righteousness, a moral righteousness, in observing the duties of the second table, a religious righteousness, in performing the outward duties of prayer, hearing the word, receiving the sacraments. But though St. Paul was one of the most religious men that the Jewish religion ever had, yet he durst not be found with this righteousness alone, but desired to be found "in Christ, not having his own righteousness, which is of the law." Observe, farther, The way how the apostle desired to be found in Christ, is not only, 1. Negatively; but 2. Positively declared, "that which is through the faith of Christ, that righteousness which is of God by faith." Here note, 1. The righteousness which secures a guilty sinner from the dint of God's wrath is Christ's righteousness; he is made unto us of God righteousness, 1. Cor. i. 30. Now, this righteousness is here called, 1. The righteousness of God, because of his appointing, ordaining, and accepting it. 2. The righteousness of faith, because this righteousness is made ours by faith; faith apprehending and applying the death and sufferings of Jesus Christ, the fruit and benefit of his undertaking, becomes the believing sinner's, and God is at peace with him: such as will be found in Christ must have a righteousness, the meritorious righteousness of Christ, to answer the demands of the law, and a personal righteousness of their own, to answer the commands of the gospel. St. Paul here, though a transcendent saint, though an eminent apostle, yet divests himself of his own righteousness, that he might be clothed upon with the righteousness of the Mediator, be found in him as his Surety in the day of account, and obtain pardon for the sake of his satisfaction. Note, 2. That there is no gain to be had from this righteousness by a lost sinner, except it be apprehended by faith; it was not a righteousness of his own that St. Paul desired to be found in, but faith was his own, inherent in him, and acted by him, which did entitle him to that righteousness, called therefore here, "the righteousness which is of God by faith."

10 That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death;

Our apostle had, in the foregoing verse, expressed his earnest desires to be found in Christ, with respect to his justification; in this verse, with respect to his sanctification, he desires to know Christ, as the Messiah and Mediator, that he might experience the power of his resurrection, raising him from the death of sin, to a life of grace and holiness, and taste something of that comfort and joy which is found in suffering with him and for him; and to be made conformable to his death, by a daily dying unto sin: knowing, that if he were conformed to him in the likeness of his death, he should be also in the likeness of his resurrection. Here note, 1. What it is that a person justified by the righteousness of Christ doth most desire, namely, a spirit of holiness, and sanctification, flowing from Christ, to enable him to live unto him, "that I may know the power of his resurrection," that is, experience that divine power in my soul, quickening me to a life of grace, which Christ experienced in quickening his dead body when it lay in the grave. "It is as great a work of the Spirit to form Christ in the heart of a sinner, as it was to fashion him in the womb, or to raise him in the grave," (says the pious bishop Reynolds upon the place.) Note, 2. That such as are justified and sanctified by the Spirit of Christ, are willing to have fellowship with him in his sufferings, not ambitious to share with him in the merit of his sufferings, but desirous to participate with him in the benefit of his sufferings; and also, to be conformed to him in their own sufferings; the members think it an honor to be like their head, their suffering head, as well as their glorified head; and well they may; for in and under all their sufferings, especially for him, they have his presence with them, his compassion to moderate them, his strength to bear them, his intercession to preserve from falling away in them; and his crown, after they have suffered a while, to reward them for them.

11 If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead:

By the resurrection of the dead here, is not to be understood the general resurrection, for all men shall attain that, whether they strive for it or no; but he intends, that complete holiness, and absolute perfection in grace, which shall attend the state of the resurrection; so he explains it himself in the next verse, "Not that I have already attained, &c. or am already perfect;" and he shows how diligent he was in endeavouring, in the use of all possible means, to arrive at it, and attain unto it. Learn, That the glorious resurrection of the just, or grace consummated in glory, is attainable, and deserves and requires the uttermost care and diligence of the most holy and zealous christians, to be exerted and put forth, in order to the attaining of it; "If by any means I may attain to the resurrection of the dead."

12 Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after, If that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus.

13 Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before.

14 I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Our apostle here compares himself to a person running in a race; the prize which he did contend and run for, was perfection in grace. The highest degree of which, in this life, consists in a desire and endeavour to obtain the largest measures and fullest degrees of holiness that are here attainable; the manner how he ran for this prize, he tells us, was by looking forward not backward; he did not look back to the things which he had left behind, namely, to the privileges of judaism, nor to his past performances; but like a racer kept himself continually upon the stretch, with his eyes fixed firmly upon the prize at the end of the goal, that he might lay hold upon it, and be crowned with it. Note here, christianity is a race; every christian in this life must run this race: in his running, he must look forward, and not backward, not reckon how much of the way is past, but make the best of the way to come: he must keep heaven, as the mark and prize he runs for continually in his eye, to hearten him on against all hardships and discouragements whatsoever; and, in a word must be apprehended before he can apprehend: St. Paul was apprehended by Christ, and caught hold of by him, when he fled from him, otherwise he had never apprehended; Christ takes hold on us, before we have any desire to lay hold on him; we move as moved of him, and assisted by him.

15 Let us, therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you.

16 Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing.

Let as many as be perfect, that is, grown christians, instructed thoroughly in their christian duty, who, compared with others, may be called perfect, be thus minded, as I am, namely, to believe the circumcision of the flesh abolished, and that no confidence is to be placed in any righteousness of our own, but in the righteousness which is of God by faith only; and if any, seduced by the judaizing teachers, be otherwise minded, and think that the ceremonial law is not abrogated, nor the practice of circumcision abolished, God, in his due time, will show them their error, and convince them that none of those things are now necessary for the obtaining of his favor. Nevertheless, in the mean time, he exhorts all persons, according to the measures of light and knowledge which they had received, to walk according to the rule of the scriptures, preserving mutual love, and avoiding further rents and divisions. Observe, here, That in the first and best age of the christian church, there was, and we cannot expect but there ever will be, a variety of opinions, and differences in judgment, amongst the members thereof. Observe, 2. That in this case of unavoidable differences amongst good men, there ought to be mutual charity and meekness, moderation and forbearance, no censorious judging of each other, but, look first at what is wanting in ourselves, and next, at what is useful in others; the one will make us humble, the other charitable, and both peaceable.

17 Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so, as ye have us for an ensample.

18 (For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ;

19 Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly; and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.)

Here our apostle propounds his own example to their imitation; follow me, who have renounced all my Jewish privileges, all confidence in any thing of my own; and mark them for your patterns, who walk so as to have us for an example. O! how happy it is when the ministers of Christ go before their people, and tread out the steps which they are to take towards heaven, when they can say to their people, (without any upbraiding from their own consciences) be followers of us, and of all such as have us for an example. Next, he warns them against following the doctrines and practices of the false teachers, the judaizing doctors, those great zealots for the observation of the ceremonial law, and the rite of circumcision; these he paints out in their proper colors: 1. He calls them the enemies of the cross of Christ, because they preached up the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law; and so, in effect, denied Christ to be come in the flesh, or affirming, that he died in vain: We whose end is destruction; if they persist in their wicked doctrines and practices, their end will be everlasting destruction: Whose God is their belly, who chiefly mind the gratification and pleasing of a sensual appetite: they who serve their belly before God, or as they should serve God, do make a God of their belly; we may provide for the belly, but not serve it, that is, to serve us, by fitting us to serve God, our neighbour, and ourselves, Whose glory is in their shame; that is, they glorified in their wicked practices in general, whereof they ought to be ashamed, and in the circumcision of the shameful member in particular; they are puffed up with that which should rather make them blush; They mind earthly things; the riches, honors, pleasures, applause of the world, are things wholly upon their hearts, counting gain godliness, not regarding Christ's interest, but only promoting their own designs. Lord! what a dismal character is this of those men that undertake to be teachers of others? With what a black coal doth the apostle draw their picture, and yet his hand was guided by the Spirit of God, whose judgment of them was according to truth.

20 For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ.

As if our apostle had said, "As you love your souls, follow not these false teachers afore described, for they are citizens of this world; but imitate and follow us who are citizens of heaven, where our Head is, where our heart is, where our happiness is: it is true, we live here below, but we belong to the corporation and society above, our citizenship is in heaven; for we have an high esteem of that happiness, and our chief concern, is to make sure of it, and we please and delight ourselves with the joyful expectation of it, and we live answerable to our expectation; as we hope hereafter to live like the angels in glory, so we now endeavour to live like the angels in holiness." Learn hence, All the faithful, both ministers and people, have a right to heaven, as to their city; they are therefore with their hearts and affections to be daily aspiring after it, and live in hopes of getting, ere long, the full possession of it.

21 Whoso shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

Observe here, 1. All the faithful who have their conversation in heaven, do expect and look for Christ coming from thence, not as a terrible judge, but as a gracious and powerful Saviour, Observe, 2. What they do expect at the coming of this Saviour, namely, the changing "of their vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Note here, 1. The present condition of the body of man, it is a vile condition, vile in the original; our body is made of vile dust; vile in regard of its moral vileness, and sinful vileness; vile in regard of its accidental vileness, as their body is the seat of their vile diseases, and subject to vile abuses; vile, considered with respect to its ultimate vileness at death; how does a body, as beautiful as ever was Absalom's, when death comes, run into rottenness and putrefaction! our sin made us vile in the sight of God whilst we lived, and renders our bodies viler in the sight of men when we die. Note, 2. The future condition which the bodies of good men shall be in, at the appearance of Christ; this vile body shall be a beautiful and a blessed body, the body we lay down shall be rebuilt, formed and fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body; resembling his incorruptibility and immortality, in purity and spirituality, in power and activity, and in happiness and felicity. Note, 3. The efficient cause of this great and glorious change, with reference to the body, and that is Christ, he shall change our vile bodies; together with the means by which all this is to be effected and accomplished, namely, the wonderful power of Christ, "according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself." Surely, it is as easy for Christ to give a body to a soul at the resurrection, as to breathe a soul into a body every day in the work of creation. But the power of Christ is but a weak argument to build our hopes of the body's resurrection upon, without a revelation of his will; he can quench all the fire in hell in a moment; but where has he said he will do it? But now in the case before us, Christ is not only able to raise, but has declared he will raise and change our vile bodies; so that faith is enabled to make a sufficient reply to all the astonishing difficulties that reason can muster up; and those christians that can now say, Our conversation is in heaven, may add, "from thence we look for a Saviour, The Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself."

CHAPTER IV.

Our apostle, coming now to the close and conclusion of this excellent epistle, exhorts the Philippians to the practice and performance of several duties which were of great importance to the honor of God, the credit of religion, and their own benefit and comfort; the first of which is constancy in the faith, and steadfastness in the true religion, ver. 1.

THEREFORE, my brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

Observe here, The loving, affectionate, and endearing compellations, which St. Paul bestows upon his beloved Philippians; he calls them his brethren twice in one verse, his dearly beloved and longed for, his joy and crown; thereby testifying his fervent affection towards them, his passionate longing for their spiritual welfare, and that their conversion, by his preaching, was matter of great joy and comfort to him, yea, the crown and honor of his ministry, my joy and crown; that is, my chief joy, and crown of rejoicing, that which he rejoiced in more than he could in any earthly crown. Behold in this glass the heart of every faithful ambassador of Jesus Christ: It would not please them so much to have an imperial crown set upon their heads, and to be made the emperors of the world, as to see souls brought off from the world, by their ministry, to the obedience of the word. This made the Philippians St. Paul's joy and crown at present, and gave him hopes that they would be his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ: may the same mind be in us, which was in this great apostle. Observe, 2. The great and important duty which St. Paul here exhorts the Philippians to, and that is, steadfastness in the faith and doctrine of the gospel in general; and in particular, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free, without obliging themselves to observe circumcision, or any part of the ceremonial law: "Stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved, my joy and crown." Learn hence, 1. That steadfastness in the true religion, and perseverance in the faith of Christ, is the great and indispensable duty of every christian that has a due regard to his salvation. 2. That such a steadfastness in the faith of Christ, and his holy religion, is a present joy, and will be an eternal crown of rejoicing to the ministers of God.

2 I beseech Euodias, and I beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same mind in the Lord.

3 And I intreat thee also, true yoke-fellow, help those women, which labored with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellow-laborers, whose names are in the book of life.

The former verse was an exhortation to constancy; this, to concord. Here observe, 1. The persons exhorted to the duty, two women of eminent note in the church, Euodias, and Syntyche, who labored with him in the gospel, that is, in offices proper to their sex, not in public preaching, but in private teaching of youth, and instructing other women in the principles of religion: between these two good women, it seems, there was some difference, a want of love and unanimity; it is but too frequent for persons truly pious and painful in the work of the Lord to be at odds amongst themselves; and such are the fatal consequences of such differences, though between two persons only, that they are looked upon as worthy to be taken notice of by a great apostle. Observe, 2. The great care and pains which St. Paul takes timely to compose this petty difference between these two persons; he writes to an eminent minister in the church at Philippi, whom he calls his true yoke-fellow, (because they had faithfully labored together in planting a christian church in that city,) to exert his utmost endeavours in reconciling these two disagreeing parties. Such as are sensible of the dangerous mischiefs of strife and contention, of discord and division, will account it their duty to look to breaches betimes, to quench such fires at their first kindling, and will call in all the help they can, by engaging the prayers and tears of God's ministers, and the endeavours of all faithful christians, in order thereunto: and all this care, God knows, is little enough in order thereunto. Observe, 3. The charitable thought and good opinion which St. Paul had of his fellow-laborers at Philippi, he believed their names were in the book of life; that is, he adjudged them truly gracious persons, and in a state of salvation; though none can pass a certain and infallible judgment upon others, yet such as are holy in conversation in themselves, and contribute their utmost endeavours to promote holiness in others, may in the judgment of charity, be pronounced persons whose names are in the book of life.

4 Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice.

Observe here, 1. The duty exhorted to, christian cheerfulness and joy, a duty which glorifies God, adorns religion, is beneficial to ourselves, by enabling us to bear afflictions, to glory in them, and to triumph over them, Observe, 2. The object of this duty, a glorious and replenishing object, Christ the Lord; Rejoice in the Lord. 3. The perpetuity and constancy of the duty; Rejoice always: that is, at all times, and in all conditions. 4. The difficulty of the duty, implied in the repetition of the command: Again, I say, Rejoice. From the whole, note, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ is the great, sure, and perpetual joy of his children and people. 2. That it is their duty to be joying in him always, and always rejoicing for him, and to rejoice in their knowledge of him, in his undertaking for them, in their interest in him, in their influences of grace and comfort derived from him, in their hopes of glory, to be eternally enjoyed with him. 3. That to get the heart up to this duty, at all times, and in all conditions is no easy work, therefore the exhortation is doubled, Rejoice always; and again I say Rejoice: pointing out how averse we are to this spiritual and very beneficial duty.

5 Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand.

This is, Let your mildness and gentleness towards others, your meekness and patience under your own trials, be very conspicuous, because the Lord is at hand to execute judgment on his own crucifiers, and on the persecutors of his own people. Learn, That the consideration of the certainty and suddenness of Christ's coming to judgment, ought to be improved by us as an argument to all mildness and gentleness towards others, and to all meekness and patience under our present sufferings: Let your moderation be known unto all men, &c.

6 Be careful for nothing: But in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.

7 And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds, through Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. The duty exhorted to, namely, to be anxiously and solicitously careful for nothing; it is not care, but carefulness, that is, inordinate care, heart-cutting, distracting, soul rending care and solicitude, which is here forbidden; there is a prudent provident care for the things of this life, which is an unquestionable duty. Observe, 2. The remedy prescribed for the prevention of solicitous care, and that is fervent prayer; "in every thing, by prayer and supplication, let your requests be made known." The people of God may and ought to have recourse to him in every thing. Observe, 3. The apostle directs to thanksgiving in every thing, as well as to prayer, "In every thing by prayer and thanksgiving, let your requests be made known: when afflicted, we are to be thankful for the expected benefit of afflictions; when tempted, to be thankful that God will not leave us to be tempted above, what we are able; when we fall into sin, there is cause of thankfulness that we are not left to run into all sin, that we were not cut off in the very act of sin, and did not die in our sins; thus are we in every thing to give thanks. Observe, 4. The benefit and advantage which St. Paul assures them would redound unto them by the practice of the forementioned duties, namely, sweet peace which passeth all understanding; that is, which none can conceive that have not felt it, and none can express that have experienced it. This peace, he tells them, will keep and guard their hearts and minds; a sound peace is the soul's guard against all inward terrors and outward troubles; as the persons of princes are secured by guards of armed and valiant men, who watch while they sleep; so are christians guarded and secured by the peace of God, better than any prince ever was by a guard of forty thousand men. "The peace of God shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus;" that is, through the assistance of Christ Jesus.

8 Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

Here we have a very comprehensive precept, describing the duties of all christians; whatsoever things are true; truth is the principal character of our profession, and is to be expressed in our words and actions; whatsoever things are honest, venerable or grave; that is, answer the dignity of our high calling, and agree with the gravity and comeliness of the christian profession; whatsoever things are just, according to divine and human laws; whatsoever things are pure and chaste; intimating, that we must preserve the heart, the hand, the tongue, the eye, from all impurity; whatsoever things are lovely and of good report; as easiness to pardon, readiness to oblige, compassion to the afflicted, liberality to the distressed, sweetness of conversation, without gall and bitterness; these are of universal esteem with mankind, and soften the most savage tempers and dispositions. Note here, 1. That there are things naturally honest, just, and lovely in their own nature, and praiseworthy in themselves, which do raise and refine the human nature; and, without a command, their goodness is a strong obligation to observe them. Note, 2. That christianity doth adopt morality, or precepts of good life and manners, into its frame and constitution, and it is indeed an integral part of the christian religion; not that any moral precepts though never so good, can raise a soul from the death of sin to a life of holiness, without faith in Christ, and assistance from his Spirit! but the morality which the scriptures teach us, is founded not barely upon principles of reason, but divine revelation, and obliges us to the practice of moral duties, in obedience to Christ's command, in conformity to his example, in the strength of his assistance, and with an eye to his glory.

9 Those things, which ye have both learned and received, and heard and seen in me, do; And the God of peace shall be with you.

Observe, 1. With what great confidence and good assurance St. Paul here recommended his own practice and example to his people's imitation; all those things which he had by his doctrine and life commanded to them, were to be carefully observed and imitated by them; it is a blessed thing, when people's eyes are taught by their minister's holiness of life, and their ears by the soundness of his doctrine. Our people have eyes to see how we walk, as well as ears to hear what we preach; therefore it is a minister's great duty, by strictness and gravity of deportment, to maintain his esteem in the consciences of his people, yet always tempering gravity with a condescending affability: that minister only can go off the stage with honor and comfort, who has left behind him the good seed of sound doctrine, and the good savor of an holy example; that can say with our apostle, "The things which you have both heard and seen in me, do;" Observe, 2. The promise annexed to the foregoing precept, these things do, and the God of peace shall be with you. Where note, 1. Who will be with us, the God of peace; now he that is the God of peace, is the God of power; he that is the God of peace, is the God of patience, who, though he can punish, yet will pardon the infirmities of his people. Note, 2. How he will be with us; the heart of God will be with us, the help of God will be with us, and the presence of God will be with us, to guide and direct us, to lead and conduct us, to cover and protect us; and, if God be with us, we shall shortly be with him. Learn hence, That those which obey the gospel, whatsoever or whomsoever they want, shall ever abide in a peaceful and blessed condition: "These things do, and the God of peace shall be with you."

10 But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity:

11 Not that I speak in respect of want: For I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.

12 I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: Every where, and in all things, I am instructed, both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need.

(No. 58.)

13 I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.

Our apostle being now come to the conclusion of his epistle, acquaints the Philippians with what great joy he had received their charity sent unto him; and that it came no sooner, he believed did not proceed from any disrespect towards him, but only for want either of ability or opportunity of sending to him; yet withal gives them to understand, that he could bear want, or a strait condition, very well; for having Christ for his teacher, "he had learned in whatsoever state he was, therein to be content;" he could bear either plenty or scarcity, fulness or want; yea, "could do all things through Christ that strengthened him." Observe here, 1. The vicissitudes and great uncertainty of St. Paul's outward condition; at one time he abounds, at another time he is abased; at one time he is full, at another in want; teaching us, that the dearest of God's children, in regard of their outward condition, are subject to variety of changes. Observe, 2. The general lesson which they have learnt, with reference to this variety of conditions, and that is the lesson of contentment; "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." Observe, 3. The particular lessons learnt by him, "Both how to abound, and how to be abased:" they are both hard lessons, but, of the two, perhaps it is harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased.

Quest. 1. When may a man be said to know how to abound? Ans. When he sets a due value and a right esteem upon the things of the world, and neither prizes them too high nor too low; when a man so uses his abundance, as to avoid the temptations which do attend and accompany that abundance; when he is willing to part with his abundance, at the call and command of God, and, in a word, when he attends more to the duties of his prosperous state, than to the sensual pleasures and satisfaction of it. Quest. 2. What is it to know how to be abased? Ans. Not to be discouraged, or suffer the spirit to sink or faint in the day of adversity; to be not only humbled by affliction, but humble under it; to suffer what God inflicts, without impatience or complaint, without sourness of spirit or discontent; to believe firmly that whatever we meet with, is from the hand of a father; that whatever we part with, is but a perishing creature; that God is able to restore all our lost comfort with advantage to us, and will do it, if it be good for us, either in kind or in equivalency; this is to know how to be abased. Quest. 3. How doth it appear harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased? Thus; there are more duties, and harder duties, required of those that abound, than of them that want. There are more temptations, and stronger temptations which attend those in abundance than them that want. Hence it is that God gives so many solemn charges and commands to those that abound to take heed to themselves, more than to those that are in want. See Deut. vi. 12. "When thou art full, then beware lest thou forget the Lord thy God, and thy heart be lifted up." In a word, I do not remember one instance in all the scripture, of a full or prosperous condition, which was ever so much as the remote occasion of a sinner's conversion unto God; but I find in scripture, that an afflicted condition has been blessed to many for this end, 2. Chron. xxxiii. 12. Hos. v. 15. Job xxiii. 14. Observe, 4. The school which St. Paul learnt this great lesson in, to know how to be abased, and how to abound, and to be thoroughly content in every condition: it was not at Gamaliel's feet, but Christ's feet; "I can do all things through Christ strengthening me." Christ was both his tutor and his strengthener, he taught him his lesson and enabled him to practise it. See here, 1. That a real christian is able to do all things, all things that concern a christian, all things that belong to the glory of God, and his soul's salvation; all things, not in a legal, but evangelical sense; not all things, nor indeed any thing with a sinless perfection, but all things in respect of his love to the whole law, in respect of his purpose and resolution, in respect of his desire and endeavours. Again, I can do all things; understand it in an active sense, I can deny myself, believe in a withdrawing God, conquer the world, subdue unmortified corruption, and live a life of evangelical perfection, Take it also in a passive sense, I can suffer all things, I can bear Christ's cross, wear his yoke, endure any thing for him, or from him, when called forth to suffer. Note, 2. That as a christian can do all things, so his ability to do all things, lies not in himself, but in Christ. A believer receives an active power from Christ, to enable him to do whatever he requires him to do; ability to subdue corruption, to conquer temptation; to bear affliction, and to glorify God in every condition; all this is from Christ: and the sincere christian may say with this eminent saint, "I can do all things through Christ that strengthens me."

14 Notwithstanding, ye have well done that ye did communicate with my affliction.

15 Now, ye Philippians, know also that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me, as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only.

16 For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity.

Although our apostle had declared, in the foregoing verses that he had fully learnt the lesson of contentment in all conditions, and could bear poverty and want without complaining; yet withal he assures them here, that they did well in sending such supplies to him in prison by Epaphroditus, as they had done; and thereby testifying, by their christian commiseration, that they shared with him in his afflictions and sufferings for Christ. Where note, 1. The apostle's thankful acknowledgment of the Philippians' present liberality towards him, now in bonds, for preaching the gospel to them; and how he takes occasion from thence to make an honorable mention of their former bounty towards him, even from his first preaching of the gospel to them; nay, when he was gone from them at Philippi, and preached to those at Thessalonica, yet did the Philippians send their bounty after him more than once, which no other church had then done besides themselves. Learn hence, 1. That there is a rule of equity to be observed, as between other relations, so between ministers and people, that as they bestow labor and pains, so they should receive encouragement and maintenance, and this not barely as a gratuity, but as a due debt. 2. That the faithful ministers of Christ, though they may challenge a supply of temporal things from their people, for their spiritual things, as a due debt, yet do they fully receive it, and gratefully acknowledge it, to the honor and commendation of their people, with fervent prayer to God, that it may be fruit redounding to their account in the great day of account. "O ye Philippians, know, that when no church communicated with me, ye sent once and again to my necessities."

17 Not because I desire a gift. but I desire fruit that may abound to your account.

18 But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God.

19 But my God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory, by Christ Jesus.

Here remark, 1. The modesty and great ingenuity of the apostle, in assuring them, that his praising their liberality so much was not upon design to get more; not because I desire a gift; that is, any further gift for my own private advantage; I am far from the thought of spunging upon you: but I aim at your advantage in this, that your liberality may afford you the fruits of a plentiful reward in the day of Christ, who will not forget your work and labor of love in ministering to the saints." Having thus guarded against all suspicion of greediness in himself, and evidenced that his commending their liberality was not upon design, he proceeds again to praise their liberality yet farther, and extols it in such words as may cause admiration. Note, 1. How abundantly satisfied the apostle was with what he had received, I have all and abound, I am full; as if he had had the treasure of the Indies in his coffers: grace is content with a little, and thinks that little an abundance; the contented man is only rich. 2. How St. Paul gives an acknowledgment, under his hand, that Epaphroditus had faithfully delivered to him the whole of their charity sent by him; "I have received of Epaphroditus all the things which were sent from you:" Epaphroditus was their chief minister, or bishop, a person of great reputation, whose fidelity none could suspect: yet St. Paul gives it under his hand that he had executed his trust faithfully. Though a man be never so trust-worthy in himself, and be never so much intrusted by others, yet he ought, in wisdom, to guard against any suspicion which may be taken up against his honesty and faithfulness. Note, 3. The high expressions which St. Paul makes use of, in setting forth the Philippians' charity toward him; he calls it, "an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable and well pleasing to God;" the very same words here which he makes use of, Ephes. v. 2. where he calls the death of Christ a sacrifice, and sweet smelling savor. The expression is borrowed from the Levitical sacrifices, which were of God's appointing and approving; and it imports, that our charity expressed towards the members, but especially the ministers of Jesus Christ, now under the gospel, is as acceptable and well-pleasing unto God, as the sweetest incense and the fattest sacrifices were under the law. Here observe, That the Socinians, to lessen the meritoriousness of Christ's sacrifice, do parallel this text with that other, Eph. v. 2. "Is the death of Christ, say they, called a sacrifice and sweet-smelling savor? so is the Philippians' charity here called a sacrifice, both in a figurative and metaphorical sense only." But mark the difference; St. Paul, Eph. v. 2. says, Christ gave himself a sacrifice, which being once offered, was sufficient to take away sin, Heb. x. 10. but the Philippians are not said to give themselves a sacrifice, but their alms were as grateful to God as incense: if it be said, from Rom. xii. 1. That believers are required to present themselves living sacrifices unto God, and acceptable; I answer, so they are, and so they do present themselves gratulatory, but not expiatory sacrifices unto God, 2. Pet. ii. 5. "Ye are a royal priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable unto God, through Jesus Christ." Christ's oblation and sacrifice was acceptable for itself: believers, and their eucharistical sacrifices, are acceptable to God only in, by, and through our Lord Jesus Christ, Heb. xiii. "By him let us offer the sacrifice of praise continually." Note, lastly, The assurance which St. Paul gives the Philippians, that God would abundantly recompense their charity into their own bosoms, ver. 19. "My God will supply all your need, &c." As if he had said, "Do not think you shall want, because you have liberally supplied my wants; no, my God will supply you, for your supplying me: According to his riches in glory, that is, according to his rich mercy and glorious grace:" there is no need to be supplied in the glory of the next life, but there is a glory in rich grace, which readily and plentifully supplies all our needs in this life. Note here, 1. That such as administer now to the wants of others, may fall into want, and be driven to straits themselves, 2. That the more forward they have been to supply the wants, and administer to the necessities of others, in the time of their abundance, the more may they expect from the bountiful hand of God, in the day of their necessity and distress; "My God shall supply all your need." &c.

20 Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Note here, 1. The endearing title given to Almighty God, God our Father; the word father is a title of great honor; the word our is a word of singular comfort. The appropriating, positive terms, mine, thine, ours, have a great sweetness in them, and breathe abundance of affection. As Luther used to say, "The comfort of the gospel lay in pronouns possessive, when we can say with believing Thomas, My Lord, and my God; with blessed Paul, who loved me, and gave himself for me." Learn, That God is a Father in a more peculiar and special manner to all interested in his Son Jesus Christ. The word father implies spiritual generation, that we are begotten by him, and like unto him; it implies vehemency of affection, no bowels comparable unto a father's; it implies designed benefit by correction that he exercises unto profit. And in the word our is implied, that God is the Father of every believer, the weakest as well as the strongest: we are all the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus: and it points out our duty also, that as there is one God and Father of all, so all believers should be of one heart and one mind amongst themselves. Note, 2. What it is which our apostle attributes and ascribeth unto God, namely, glory, and that for ever and ever: Glory, that is, the manifestation of all his glorious excellencies and perfections. Learn hence, That it is the fervent desire of all believers to have the worth and excellencies of God everlastingly acknowledged, and in a boundless manner displayed; Unto God be glory for ever and ever: This word for ever and ever, is upon different accounts, the saddest and sweetest word in all the Bible; when applied to the excellencies of God, and our interest in them, no word like this for comfort, This God is our God for ever and ever. O ravishing consolation! But when applied to sinners, and what they suffer from God as the desert, the due desert of their sins, then it is a word of the saddest weight, Rev. xiv. 11. The smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever, 2. Thes. i. 9. "They shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord." It is the word for ever and ever that sets all hell a roaring, and it is the same word that fills heaven with joy and rejoicing. "To God and our Father be glory for ever and ever." Amen.

21 Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me greet you.

22 All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cesar's household.

Our apostle closes his letter with respectful salutations; he salutes in his own name all and every saint in Christ Jesus; the soul of the poorest and meanest saint was not neglected by this great apostle: he loved the brotherhood, the whole fraternity of believers, the whole society of saints: all church members are saints by external and visible profession, and ought to be so by internal renovation and spiritual regeneration, and one as well as the other are here saluted by the apostle; Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. Next, he sends the salutations of all the brethren that were with him, and of all the saints that were at Rome, all those whom he had there converted to christianity, and particularly some of those that were in Nero's family, and called here Cesar's household. Where note, 1. That such a mighty efficacy had the preaching of the gospel, accompanied with the influences of the Holy Spirit, that it entered the houses of the greatest persecutors, and changed the hearts of some who were most unlikely to receive and entertain it. Behold, here are some in bloody Nero's family converted to Christ, by the preaching of the gospel, those of Cesar's household. Note, 2. That sometimes God endues the professors of the gospel in general, and young converts in particular, with such a spirit of zeal and courage, magnanimity and holy solutions, that they dare lift up a banner for truth, and publicly own the despised members of Christ without either shame or fear; "those of Cesar's household do greet and salute you."

23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

He shuts up all with his usual apostolical valediction: by grace, we are to understand the free favor of God, as the fountain: and all good things, as so many streams flowing from that fountain: this is called the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, because preached by his merit, and applied by his intercession. This grace he prays may be with them in the sweet effects of it, and in the sensible apprehensions of it, to enlighten, sanctify, comfort, and quicken them more and more. Knowing then the exceeding riches of grace which we have in Christ Jesus our Lord, let us glorify him, eminently, abundantly; and as we have all things by him, let us do all things for him, and to his glory.

THE

EPISTLE OF SAINT PAUL

COLOSSIANS.

This epistle was written by St. Paul when he was a prisoner at Rome, about the same time in which he wrote the foregoing epistle to the Philippians. It is directed to the Colossians, that is, the church of christians newly gathered in and about the city of Colosse, in Phrygia, by the preaching of Epaphras; St. Paul not having seen their face in the flesh, Chap. ii. 1.

Epaphras having founded a church here, and instructed the Colossians in the great and fundamental principles of the Christian religion, he left them for a time, and went to Rome, and was fellow-prisoner with St. Paul there. In his absence from them, the Colossians were infested with false teachers of two sorts; some were the judaizing doctors, that is, persons converted from judaism to christianity, who sought to impose upon them circumcision and the observation of the ceremonial law, long since abolished by the death of Christ; against these false teachers, most of the foregoing epistles were written and directed. The other sort of false teachers against whom this epistle is written, were such persons as were converted from gentilism to christianity, who obtruded upon the Colossians their Philosophical speculations, and some of their heathenish practices, particularly, their worshipping of angels; under this notion then, (as the church of Rome now,) that Almighty GOD is such an infinite glorious Being, that man, sinful man, must not dare to approach him without the interposure of the angels, as Mediators, between God and them. Now, in opposition to both these sorts of false teachers, St. Paul writes this epistle, showing the former, that christians, since the death of Christ lay under no obligation to observe circumcision, or any part of the ceremonial law; and convincing the latter, that Christ, and not angels, was the appointed Mediator between God and man; and that we, being reconciled to God by him, have access through him unto God in all our necessities.

CHAPTER I.

The former part of this chapter discovers the great affection which St. Paul bore to the Colossians both in his thanksgivings and prayers for them: he gives thanks to God for the spiritual graces conferred upon them, particularly for their faith in Christ, and love to all christians, and for their holy fruitfulness in good works: and prays fervently for their increase in knowledge, growth in holiness, courage under sufferings; and that they might be made every day more and more meet for the glory of heaven, styled by him, The inheritance of the saints in light.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

2 To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse: Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. That this epistle to the Colossians contains many of the same things, and often the very same words, with that to the Ephesians, particularly the salutation here is the same with that to the Ephesians; in which, note, 1. The person saluting, Paul, once a persecutor, now a professor, yea, a zealous preacher of the faith of Christ, dignified with the title and office of an apostle, "an apostle of Jesus Christ;" that is called and sent immediately by him to plant and propagate the christian faith throughout the heathen world, but "by the will of God;" Christ, as head of the church, is intrusted with sending out ministers into his church; but the Father's will, and Christ's will do both concur and fully agree in sending forth his ministers to instruct and edify his church; and woe to such as intrude themselves into any office in the church without their call and commission; let them expect a blow instead of a blessing. Note, 2. The apostle joins Timothy in the salutation; though Timothy was not an apostle or a penman of any part of the scripture, yet because he was well known to the Colossians, and much valued and esteemed by them, and was a person of eminent worth and excellency in himself, and of singular serviceableness to the apostle, he therefore calls him his brother, being "his fellow-laborer in the work of the gospel." Where the great humility of St. Paul is remarkable, and worthy of imitation; who, though an inspired apostle, extraordinarily and immediately called by Christ himself, an aged person, long engaged in the work of Christ, yet is far from despising young Timothy, his inferior, greatly his inferior in all respects, that he gives him all fitting respect, and puts honor upon him, in calling him his brother, they being fellow-laborers in the work and service of the gospel. Note, 3. The persons saluted, the "saints and faithful brethren in Christ, which are at Colosse." He calls all the members of this christian church by the name of saints, they all making an outward and visible profession of sanctity and holiness: and many of them, no doubt, were what they professed, not only relative, but real (No. 58.)

saints; he styles them also "faithful brethren in Christ, that is implanted into Christ, some by outward profession, others by inward sanctification; or the expression, "saints in Christ Jesus," may intimate to us, that all our grace and sanctity must be exercised and acted by strength derived from Christ, and all our holiness be accepted in Christ Jesus. Note, 4. The salutation itself, "Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." By grace, understand the free love, and gracious favor of God, together with all the effects and fruits of it; these are wished from God as the Father: intimating, that God bestows not his special grace as a Creator, but as a Father in Christ; next he wishes them "peace from our Lord Jesus Christ," he being the purchaser of our peace, upon whom was laid the chastisement of our peace, and by whom God is at peace with us, and reconciled to us. But why is there no mention of the Holy Ghost, as well as of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ? Because it is by the Spirit, that God the Father and Jesus Christ dwell in us, and do communicate this grace unto us; so that praying for this grace, is praying for the communion of the Holy Ghost.

3 We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you;

4 Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints;

Our apostle, to give the Colossians a full assurance of the firmness of his love unto them, acquaints them, that himself and Timothy, from the time they heard of their conversion, did never cease to give solemn thanks to God for it, and particularly, for their faith in Christ, and for the love which they bore to all saints, to all their brethren, and fellow-members in Christ. Where note, 1. The person whom St. Paul offers up his prayers and praises, his supplications and thanksgivings to, and that is God; intimating, that religious invocation and adoration belong only to God; not to any creature, who can neither know, nor is able to supply our wants. This God whom St. Paul prayed to, is called the "Father of our Lord Jesus;" so he is, with respect both to his divine and human nature; in respect to his Deity, he is of the same essence with the Father, begotten of him from all eternity; and in respect of his humanity, he is his Father, being, as man conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost. Note, 2. The mercies and blessings which St. Paul offers up his thanksgivings to God for, and this on the behalf of the Colossians; in general they are spiritual blessings: in particular, 1. For their "faith in Christ Jesus; Christ alone is the proper object of our assiance and trust; and by faith we repose the entire trust and confidence of our souls upon the sufficiency of his merits. 2. "For their love to all the saints." Where observe, That faith and love are inseparable companions: there is a necessary connexion between them: faith without love, is no living grace; love without faith, is no saving grace. Observe also, The proper object of a christian's love, it is the saints as saints, that is, for their sanctity and holiness: and to all the saints, let their private opinions and personal infirmities be what they will; we have "heard of your love to all the saints:" love is that brotherly affection which every true christian chiefly bears to his fellow-members in Christ, for grace's sake: now the love of grace in another, being so good an evidence of the life of grace in ourselves, hence it was that St. Paul, hearing of the Colossians' love to all the children of God, ceases not to give thanks unto God for it, as the fruit and evidence of their conversion.

5 For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel;

6 Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth:

Here 1. St. Paul discovers the motives which excited the Colossians to such steadiness and constancy in the faith of Christ, and in love one to another; and that was "the hope laid up for them in heaven;" that is, the great and good things here hoped for, and there to be enjoyed. As the sinner's misery consists not in what he feels, but what he fears; so the believer's happiness lies not in what he has in his hand, but in what he has in hope; the reward which encourages his perseverance in faith and love, is laid up in heaven;" that is, safely and plentifully, as a parent lays up his treasures for the use of his children: it is both lawful and laudable then for christians to have an eye to the promised reward, as an encouragement to duty, "for the hope which is laid up for you in heaven." Observe, 2. The means by which they came to the knowledge of this hope, it was by "the word of truth," the preaching of the gospel to them by the ministry of Epaphras; this was so exceedingly blessed by God, that thereby the saving hope of this reward was wrought in them. Where note, The title given to the gospel, it is eminently "the word of truth," having Christ for its main subject, who "is the way, the truth, and the life; and being confirmed by Christ the Testator's blood. Note, farther, that the preaching of this word of truth, the doctrine of the gospel, is the great instrumental mean, appointed by God for begetting in us a lively hope of the reward laid up for us in heaven; "for the hope laid up for you in heaven, whereof you have heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel." Observe, 3. The commendation here given of the gospel, which had begot in these Colossians a lively hope of the heavenly reward: it is commended, 1. For being one and the same gospel which was preached by the apostles throughout all the world, "which is come unto you, as it is in all the world;" that is with incredible swiftness into the most eminent parts and places of the world then known; an infallible proof of the divinity of the gospel, that it was thus owned and blessed of God. The gospel, at all times, and in all places, is one and the same; and Christ when he pleases, can swiftly drive the chariot of the gospel round about the world, and bring in not only persons and families, but cities, nations, and kingdoms, to the obedience of it. 2. The gospel preached to them is commended for its fruitfulness, "it bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you;" that is, fruits of piety and holiness towards God, and fruits of righteousness and charity towards man. Learn hence, That it is matter of praise, and unspeakable thanksgiving, to the ministers of Christ, when the light of the gospel breaks forth among a people, where it never before shined, and is accompanied with early and constant fruits of piety, humility, faith and love, in the hearts and lives of those to whom it is preached. "The gospel bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day you heard of it, &c."

7 As ye also learned of Epaphras our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ;

8 Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit.

9 For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;

Observe here, 1. The person who first preached the gospel of Christ to the Colossians, and converted them to the christian faith, it was Epaphras; "As ye learned of Epaphras." Observe, 2. The commendation given to Epaphras, and his character by St. Paul; he was regularly called to the work, and a diligent fellow-laborer with St. Paul in the work, of preaching and dispensing the mysteries of the everlasting gospel to a lost world; "who is for you a faithful minister of Christ." Learn hence, That the knowledge of life and salvation is ordinarily wrought in persons by the preaching of the gospel, by men called of God to that sacred function. Observe, 3. A particular instance of the faithfulness of Epaphras towards the Colossians, he declared unto St. Paul their "love in the spirit;" that is, their spiritual love and fervent affection to him, though they had never seen his face nor heard his voice. The faithful ministers and members of Jesus Christ do affectionately love one another, though they see not the face of each other; there is no such loadstone of love as the grace of God: this will draw forth the heart and affections of a believer to the ends of the earth, to pray for, to mourn over, and to rejoice with such of their brethren as they never saw, but of whose condition they have heard. Observe, 4. The kind return which St. Paul makes to them, for their love in the Spirit towards him; "for this cause we do not cease to pray for you;" there is no such way to attain an interest in, and to obtain constant benefit and advantage by the prayers of the ministers of God, as to be expressive of our love and affection both to God and them. Observe, 5. The special blessings which he prays for on the Colossians' behalf, namely, that they might be filled with "the knowledge of his will," that is, attain to a more perfect and comprehensive knowledge of God's will and their duty, furnished with all divine "wisdom and spiritual understanding;" to regulate their lives according to their knowledge. Learn from hence, That there is a fulness of divine knowledge, which is attained by none, but should be aimed at by all, seeing they that know most of God's word and revealed will, come far short of what they should know. Learn, 2. That the knowledge, wisdom, and understanding which christians should especially labor after, and attain unto, is of things spiritual: "that ye be filled with knowledge and spiritual understanding." O let divine and spiritual knowledge be our chief care and principal business! It is called here spiritual understanding, because it is from the holy Spirit, and conversant about spiritual things, which far exceeds the most refined notions concerning other things; and Christ tells us, that eternal life depends upon it, John xvii. 3. Spiritual knowledge fits us for the service of God on earth, for the sight of God in heaven: And Christ has told us, that he will take a second journey from heaven, to render vengeance on them which know not God, and on them which do know (notionally) but obey not practically the gospel of our Lord Jesus, 2 Thea. i. 8.

10 That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God;

Here the apostle sets down the end of his prayer in the forementioned manner for the Colossians, why he desired that their knowledge should so exceedingly increase; it was in order to practice, that they might "walk worthy of the Lord, unto all pleasing, and be fruitful in every good work;" this is the true end of knowledge, practical obedience. All knowledge without this, makes a man like Nebuchadnezzar's image, with a head of gold, and feet of clay: some persons study to know, only to know, that is curiosity; others endeavour to know only to make themselves known, that is vainglory: but to know, that we may practise what we know, this is gospel duty. Quest. But how can any person be said to "walk worthy of the Lord?" Ans. Not with a worthiness of merit, but with a worthiness of meetness, when we walk as it is meet, and fit for persons professing godliness to walk; when we walk "as becometh the gospel of Jesus Christ," in obedience to his precepts, in imitation of his pattern, answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords, and answerable to the high and glorious hopes which the gospel raises us to the expectation of, this is to walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing." The second branch of the apostle's prayer, on the behalf of these Colossians, was, that they might be "fruitful in every good work," that is, labor after universal fruitfulness in good works. By good works, he undoubtedly means works of piety towards God, works of righteousness towards our neighbours, works of sobriety towards ourselves, works of charity towards all. By fruitfulness in these good works, he means an unwearied diligence, and persevering constancy in the doing of them, that our fulness be an universal fruitfulness, an humble and self-denying fruitfulness, a proportionable fruitfulness, an abounding and abiding fruitfulness; that is to be fruitful in every good work. The third request, which in this verse he puts up for them, is, that they may increase in the knowledge of God. As fruitfulness in good works makes much for the increase of knowledge, so increasing in knowledge will contribute very much towards our fruitfulness in good works; the way to grow in grace is "to grow in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Pet. iii. 11.

11 Strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness:

In the former verses, prayer was offered up to God by St. Paul, to enable the Colossians to do his will, his whole will, acceptably; in this verse he pleads with God, to strengthen them with an almighty power to bear afflictions, the sharpest and longest afflictions, patiently and joyfully: "Strengthened with all might, unto all patience with joyfulness." Learn hence, 1. That the cross of Christ, or sufferings for Christ are unavoidable, but not unsupportable; though they will shock an ordinary patience and constancy of mind, yet "might, all might, power, glorious power," which is here prayed for us, and elsewhere promised to us, can and will enable us to stand under them. Glorious power will be victorious power. Learn, 2. That patience, much patience, very much patience, yea, all patience, is needful, nay, absolutely and indispensably necessary, to enable a christian to bear some trials, and to glorify God in an afflicted condition. All patience, I say, is necessary in order to the cheerful bearing of afflictions, that is, patience at all times, patience under all crosses, patience, if possible, without any mixture of impatience; patience that may give a man the possession of himself, and quiet the whole man, the tongue, the hand, and the heart. Such measures and degrees of patience as will keep the heart from sinking, the tongue from complaining, the hand from revenging, Lord! grant, that whenever any of these are called forth to suffer either for thee, or from thee, they may be "strengthened with all might, according to thy glorious power, unto all patience and long suffering with joyfulness."

12 Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light;

Our apostle having prayed for the Colossians in the foregoing verses, here breaks forth into the duty of thanksgiving on their behalf, "Giving thanks unto the Father, &c." Where note, 1. A description of heaven, or the blessed state of good men in another world, it is an inheritance, an "inheritance of saints and an inheritance in light," 1. It is an inheritance; now that is a possession only proper to children, Hæreditas filiis debetur, non servis. It is an unmerited and undeserved possession, and it is the best donative that a father has to give unto his children: particularly, this inheritance of heaven, which God gives to all, and yet to every one of his children, is the freest inheritance, the surest, the most satisfying, and the most delightful, and the most durable inheritance. 2. Heaven is the inheritance of the saints, or of holy persons only; such as are really holy, universally holy, perseveringly holy, to them, and only to them, does it belong, it is purchased for them, it is promised to them, it is given to them, they have already the firstfruits of it in the Spirit's inhabitation, which is given to them as an earnest of heaven; it is prepared for them, and they are prepared for that; and it shall be finally adjudged to them at the great and last day. 3. It is an inheritance in light, that is, an inheritance with God; an inheritance in joy, an inheritance in glory, and a common inheritance for all the saints: as the light of the sun is a common blessing to all that have eyes to see it, and every person in a room has the benefit of the light of the candle, as if he enjoyed it by himself alone; so is the inheritance of heaven, it is fully and entirely enjoyed by all the saints, as if there was but one to possess and enjoy it. Note, 2. The qualifications of the persons who may, upon good grounds, expect to be made partakers of this glorious inheritance when they die, namely, such, and only such, as by the assistance of God's grace, and the concurrence of their own care and endeavours, are made meet, that is, fit prepared and ready for this inheritance whilst they live. Our persons must be justified by the blood of Christ, our natures renewed by the grace and Spirit of Christ, and our lives daily more and more conformed to the doctrine and example of Christ, or we can never partake of this inheritance; without likeness to God, we can have no expectation of living with him. Note, 3. The duty belonging to and expected from them whom the Father has made meet for this glorious inheritance, and that is the duty of eternal thanksgiving. "Giving thanks to the Father, who has made us meet. As none shall enjoy this inheritance but such as are made meet for it; so those, all those who are made meet for it, must ascribe their meetness unto God, and give him thanks for it. It is a spiritual blessing, it is a transcendent favor, it is a discriminating favor, it is an everlasting favor; eternity will be too short to spend in the admiration of it, and in gratulations for it; let such of us as are interested in it, now begin the work upon earth, of giving thanks to the Father, for making "us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light."

13 Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son:

In these words our apostle declares how God makes his children and people meet for the inheritance of heaven and eternal glory, namely, by bringing them out of that dark state of heathenism, sin and misery, in which they lay, and translating them into a state of grace, called here "the kingdom of God's dear Son. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness;" here we have the deliverer, God the Father, ver. 12. he delivered us; all that are made meet for the inheritance in light, were once under the power of spiritual darkness: the deliverance itself, and the manner of the deliverance; he hath rescued us by a strong hand, as the word imports, as Lot was delivered out of Sodom. Note, 1. That the state which every soul is in by nature, is a state of darkness; sin originally springs from darkness, it naturally delights in darkness, it ultimately leads to eternal darkness. Note, 2. That it is God, and God alone, that can deliver a soul from the power of spiritual darkness. 3. That no power short of Almighty power in God, is able to deliver a sinner from the dominion of sin, and the power of spiritual darkness; such is the ignorance and blindness of the understanding; such is the rebellion that is found in the sinner's will, so great the irregularity and disorder of the affections, and indeed of the whole soul, that the sinner is not only unable to deliver himself, but stands in a direct opposition to the grace of God, which offers to work deliverance for him, till, of unwilling he is made willing, in the day of Christ's power, Psal. cx. 3. "And translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son;" that is, brought us into a gospel state, made us members and subjects of his kingdom of grace, and heirs to his kingdom of glory. Learn, 1. That Christ was God's Son, his dear and only Son, the Son of himself, and the Son of his bosom love: he is called his Son, being so by an eternal and ineffable generation; not upon the account of his miraculous conception only, nor in regard of his sanctification and mission only, nor in regard of his resurrection chiefly, nor in regard of the dignity of his person, nor in regard of the dearness of his person; but he is very God of very God, begotten of his Father, by whom all things were made; and accordingly he is, for nature, co-essential, for dignity, co-equal, and for duration, co-eternal with the Father, and consequently truly and really God; and he that denieth the divinity of the Son, in God's account denieth the Father also. Learn, 2. That Christ, as God's dear Son, is a Spiritual King, and exercises a kingly power in and over the souls of those whom he hath delivered from the power of darkness. Learn, 3. That such as are subjects of his kingdom of grace, shall certainly be translated into his kingdom of glory.

14 In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins;

Here our apostle further declares how we are made "meet for the inheritance of heaven, and delivered from the power of darkness, namely, by our redemption in Christ" from sin, satan, death and wrath: by a price paid by the Mediator, to the justice of God his Father. "In whom we have redemption," that is, the fruit and benefit of Christ's redemption, which eminently consists in remission of sin. Note here, 1. The deplorable state into which the whole race of mankind was brought by sin, namely, a state of slavery, and spiritual captivity unto sin; redemption supposes this; slaves and captives need a redeemer, none else. 2. That there was no delivery from this slavery, but by a price paid down to the justice of God: redemption is a delivery by ransom and price. 3. That no other price did, or could redeem us from our miserable captivity, but the blood of Christ; we have "redemption through his blood." 4. That although Christ did pay this ransom unto God, and not to satan, whose enslaved captives we are, yet, by virtue of the ransom paid, we are delivered from satan's slavery, and sin's dominion; when God the judge was once satisfied, satan the gaoler had nothing to do to detain and keep us any longer in prison. 5. That forgiveness of sin, or a full and final discharge from sin's guilt, and from all obnoxiousness to God's wrath, was one special fruit of Christ's redemption; he died to deliver us from the wrath of God, and from the rage of our lusts too, otherwise, he had but sealed us a patent to sin with impunity.

15 Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature.

The apostle having mentioned our redemption in the former verse, describes the person of our Redeemer in this and the following verses, in such lofty characters, as evidently bespeak him to be a divine person, truly and really God, and consequently the fittest person to undertake so great and glorious a work, as the redemption and salvation of a lost and perishing world. Note here, 1. The Redeemer described by his eternal relation to God, he is "the image of the invisible God," that is, his natural and essential image;

thus he is, in respect of his eternal generation as God; as a child whom we call the express image of the father, is of the same nature with his father, so is Christ of the same essence and nature with God, his nature is the same, his attributes are the same, his works the same, the worship given him the same; faith and affiance in him the same: John xiv. 1. "Ye believe in God, believe in me." Again, Christ is the image of the invisible God, as God-man; by him, as a lively image, did God the Father set forth unto us his glorious attributes of wisdom, mercy, righteousness, and power. The first person in the God-head is called invisible to the patriarchs; but the Son frequently appeared, as a preludium, to his incarnation, in which he appeared visibly to all. Note, 2. Christ is here described, as by his eternal relation to God, so by his eternal relation to the creatures; "He is the first-born of every creature;" that is, 1. He was before every creature, and therefore he himself cannot be a creature: the apostle says expressly, ver 17. "That he is before all things," that is, Christ had a being before there was any created; he was before all creatures, both in point of dignity, and in point of duration. Thus, Rev. iii. 14. Christ calls himself the "beginning of the creation of God," that is, the principal efficient cause of the creation, and so could not be a creature himself, but consequently must of necessity have been God from all eternity with the Father: Or else, 2. By the "first-born of every creature," may be understood, that he was the Lord and heir of all the creatures: in allusion to the first-born among the Jews of old, who were lords over their brethren, Gen. xxvii. 37. "Behold I have made him thy Lord;" the first-born is natural heir, and heir did anciently signify Lord. Now Christ is said in Acts x. 36. "to be Lord of all," and Rom. iv 14. "He is called heir of all things:" Now, how well may Christ be said to be the Lord and heir of all things, when "all things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made!" Learn hence, That the Socinians have no ground from this text to reckon Christ amongst the number of creatures, he having a being antecedent to all creatures; yea, being Lord of the whole creation; and accordingly the apostle styling him here the "first-born of every creature," never designed to insinuate, that the Son of God is a creature, as evidently appears by the next verses.

16 For by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him.

17 And he is before all things, and by him all things consist;

Mark the connexion: the apostle affirms Christ to be the first-born of every creature, namely, because "by him were all things created, and by him all things consist:" now if all things were created by him, surely he himself cannot be a creature. And thus the sense of the apostle's words runs easy; Christ is the image of the invisible God, the Heir and Lord of the whole creation, for by him all things were created; he that created all creatures, cannot himself be a creature; for it is impossible that any creature should create himself. Mark further, Christ is here represented as Creator of the universe; "all things were created by him in heaven and in earth," all the angels in their several orders, degrees and dignities. 2. as he is represented the Creator, so likewise the upholder of every creature: as "by him were all things created," so "by him do all things consist." 3. He is set forth as the last end of all the creatures; all things were created for him, as well as by him. Learn hence, 1. That all created beings from the vilest worm to the brightest angel are the workmanship of Christ's hand; they are not only creatures, but his creatures; he is the omnipotent Creator, and their rightful Lord. Learn, 2. That all things were created for him, as well as by him, for the manifestation of his own glory, as God; he that was the first cause, must be the last end: and accordingly, all the creatures throughout the whole creation do give glory unto Christ, some in an active way, as angels and saints; some in a passive way, as damned men and devils; some in an objective way, as sun, moon, and stars, giving us occasion to glorify the power and wisdom of their great Creator. Learn, 3. That seeing the whole creation was at first made, and is still upheld by the power of Christ, it proves him to be evidently and undeniably God: He that created all things, and upholdeth all things by the word of his power, is and must be God. Vain here is the Socinian evasion, who, by creation, understand a renovation of the mind, and a reformation of the manners of men by the gospel; for Christ is here said to create all things in heaven, that is particularly the angels in heaven; but they having kept their first station, wanted no renovation, so that it must be understood of the first creation of the natural world, and not of the renovation of the moral world. God forgive these men's perverting and bold practising upon the scriptures. Can any sensible man persuade himself, that when St. Paul says, that "all things were created by Christ in heaven and earth, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers," that the apostles should mean no more than the moral renovation of the world below by the preaching of the gospel, in which the angels were not concerned? For though Christ was an head of confirmation to them, yet they had no need of a renovation, or being made new, having always kept their first station.

(No. 59.)

18 And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the preeminence;

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, described what Christ is in himself, comes next to describe him, with relation to his church; showing, 1. That he is her Head, he is the Head of the body, the church; as the head and the members make one body, so Christ and his people constitute one church; he is of the same nature (as man) with his church, he poureth forth the same Spirit upon his church, he is both an Head of authority, and an head of influence to his church; he sympathizes with her in all her sufferings on earth, and longs for the full fruition and final enjoyment of her in heaven. 2. He is the beginning of the christian church, the root, the fountain, and foundation of it, the active beginning, or the first principle and author of it, and of all those influences of grace and spiritual life which do animate and enliven it. 3. He is called the first-born from the dead. 1. Because he was the first that arose to an immortal life, never to die more; all others that were raised to life, besides him, died again, but death had no more dominion over him. Again, 2. Because he was the principal and efficient cause of their resurrection; all that were raised before him, were raised by him, by a power derived from him: and, 3. Because he is the pattern and exemplary cause of the resurrection; his members are not only raised by him, but like unto him. Phil. iii. 21. "Fashioned like unto his glorious body." Was his body raised substantially the same? So shall ours be. Was his body wonderfully improved by the resurrection? So shall ours, in point of purity and spirituality, in point of power and activity, in point of immortality and incorruptibility. Was his body raised to be eternally glorified? So shall ours. How fitly then is our Lord here called the "first-born from the dead?" Even herein he had "the pre-eminence."

19 For it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell;

Still our apostle proceeds in describing the person of our Redeemer, and the admirable qualifications found in him for the work and service of our redemption; he declares here, that there was a perfect and complete fulness of all divine graces and excellencies dwelling in the Mediator, and that by the pleasure and appointment of God the Father; there is in him a fulness of merit for our justification, a fulness of grace for our sanctification, a fulness of wisdom for our direction, a fulness of power for our preservation, a fulness of mercy, pity and compassion, to relieve and succour us in all our distresses. And this fulness which is in Christ, is an original and independent fulness, and it is an infinite and inexhaustible fulness; it is a complete and comprehensive fulness, and it is a ministerial fulness; the fulness that is in him of grace and comfort, is on purpose to communicate unto us, to be dispersed and given forth to all his members. No sooner had our apostle said, that he is the "Head of the body, the church;" but he instantly subjoins, that "it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell," namely, for his church's benefit and advantage. Learn hence, That for any one to be, or to pretend to be the church's head, it is necessary that he be endowed with all the fulness of the Godhead, and of all ministerial graces; and therefore it is the highest degree of blasphemy in the Pope, a vain sinful man, to assume this title to himself, being destitute of this divine fulness; full indeed he is, but full of pride, full of sin, full of himself; and, without repentance for this and his other blasphemies, will at length, be full of wrath.

20 And (having made peace through the blood of his cross) by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven.

Here one special reason is assigned why all fulness dwelt in our Lord the Redeemer, namely, to fit him for the great work and office of a Mediator or Reconciler, that so he might happily make up that breach which sin had made between God, and the world, having removed the enmity which was betwixt them by his death and sufferings, called here the "blood of his cross," that is, the blood which he freely and voluntarily shed upon the cross. Note here, 1. That God and man were once friends, though soon by sin made enemies; reconciliation doth suppose an antecedent friendship. Note, 2. That though man was first in the breach, yet God was first in the offer of reconciliation; "It pleased the Father by him to reconcile all things to himself." Note, 3. That as there was no possibility of ever making up this breach, but by a Mediator; so no person in heaven or earth was or could be found, in all things fitted or furnished for the work of a Mediator, but only Christ. "By him to reconcile all things to himself." Note, 4. The universality of the subject reconciled, "all things both in heaven and in earth;" By "things in heaven," 1. Some understand the blessed angels; but there being no breach between God and them, Christ was not the author of reconciliation, though he was an head of confirmation to them. Others understand it of a reconciliation between the angels and man, thus: whilst man continued in his obedience to God, angels and men were in a state of perfect friendship one with another; but when man rebelled against God, the angel became averse to man for that rebellion; but God being reconciled to man by the death of his Son, the angels are become friends and ministering spirits to us, and both they and we constitute one church under Christ the head thereof; thus Christ reconciled all things in heaven and earth, that is, the angels in heaven he has reconciled to man on earth. 2. Others, by "things in heaven," do not only understand the angels, but the saints departed; the patriarchs, prophets, and all the faithful now in heaven or here on earth, they were all reconciled, in order to their being saved; intimating, that the blood of Christ did expiate the guilt of those persons who lived before him, as well as of those that died after him: he reconciled all things in heaven and earth, capable of reconciliation, appointed to it, and that stood in need of it. Note, lastly, The instrumental means by which all this was effected, namely, by "the blood of the cross;" to make up the breach betwixt God and the fallen creature, cost the Mediator no less than his precious blood. Lord! Who can look upon sin as any other than an infinite and immense evil, which cost the Son of God his life to expiate the guilt of it! How can a little sin be committed against a great God?

21 And you, that were sometimes alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled.

22 In the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable, and unreprouable in his sight;

St. Paul having treated of Christ's work of reconciliation in general, in the preceding verse, in this he applies it to the Colossians in particular: where, 1. He describes to them the miserable state and deplorable condition they were in before they were converted to the christian faith; they were strangers, nay, enemies unto God: "Enemies in their minds," which implies a deep rooted enmity, advancing so high as to hate God, not as a Creator, but as a lawgiver: not as a Benefactor, but as a judge and revenger of sin. O deplorable degradation, to be at enmity in our minds against him who is the author of our being, and the fountain of our happiness! Observe, 2. The gracious change wrought in their condition by virtue of Christ's mediation, "you hath he reconciled;" not only laid down his life to purchase reconciliation for them, but by the ministry of his word, accompanied with the operation of his Holy Spirit, working upon their hearts; even then when they had a strong aversion from God to accept of terms of peace and reconciliation with him: "You, who were alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, now hath he reconciled." Observe, 3. The way and means by which Christ effected this work of reconciliation for them and us, namely, by taking upon him a true body, subject to fleshly infirmities, though without sin; and in that body suffering death for us, that we might be presented at the last day perfectly holy unto God. In order to our reconciliation with God, it pleased Christ, the second Person in the ever-glorious Trinity, to assume a body of flesh, that he might be of the same nature with us, and in that body of flesh to die for sin; that the same nature which had sinned, might give satisfaction for sin. And further, to make us completely happy, he has not only taken away the legal enmity on God's part, but the natural enmity on our part; for he sanctifies those whom he reconciles initially in this life, but perfectly and completely in the next, where and when they shall be presented holy, unblameable, and unreprouvable, to his heavenly Father.

23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister:

Here our apostle declares to the Colossians, how they may know whether they were indeed of the number of those who were actually reconciled to God by the blood of his Son, namely, if they persevered in the faith, and continued grounded fast in their holy religion; "If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled; implying, that is, the great duty of christians, who have sat under the preaching of the gospel, to be well settled in the doctrine of faith, which they have heard and received; and that the best way to be settled, is to be well grounded; if we are not settled in religion, we can never grow in religion; an ungrounded christian can never be a growing christian; and if we are not well grounded in the faith, we can never suffer for the faith; for such as are sceptics in religion, will never prove martyrs for the sake of religion. Observe, 2. The universality of that tender, which by the preaching of the gospel is made unto all sorts of sinners, of reconciliation with God, and acceptance through Christ; which gospel was preached to every creature under heaven; that is to lost mankind, to some of all sorts; not Judea only, but amongst the Gentiles also; to every human creature, no person, no nation being refused or passed by; plainly intimating, that an indefinite and universal tender of reconciliation with God and salvation by Jesus Christ, is made unto all persons, by the preaching of the gospel. Happy they, whose hearts are inclined and disposed to accept of, and comply with them, who in the day of the gospel's visitation, do know the things of their peace.

24 Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh, for his body's sake, which is the church.

As if the apostle had said, "I am not only contented with, but I greatly rejoice in, my sufferings for you converted Gentiles, and help, as much in me lies, to fill up some part of that which is, by God's decree, behind, unfulfilled of the sufferings of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church." Note here, 1. That Almighty God has decreed such a measure of sufferings to his church, whereof Christ, as the head, underwent a considerable part and proportion, when he was here upon earth, in his poverty, in his labors, in his sufferings, both in life, and at his death. Note, 2. That there is yet a remainder of sufferings, assigned over by Christ unto his members, which must be filled up by them, whereof St. Paul had a great share, and every believer must have some share; for, as long as Christ has a member upon the earth, there will be something for that member to suffer. Note, 3. That those sufferings which Christ's members suffer, are the sufferings of Christ; the sufferings of the members are the sufferings of the Head, being undergone for the sake of the Head. Christ, in his natural body, considered, can suffer no more; but in his mystical body, in his members, he daily suffers, and will suffer, till the measure of sufferings is filled up which God hath determined. Quest. But why are Christ's sufferings in and by his members thus to be prolonged, yea, perpetuated? Ans. Not by way of satisfaction for sin, not in order to reconciliation with God, but in order to the conversion of the world, for example to others, for perfecting of their own graces, and for increasing of their glory.

25 Whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God, which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God;

26 Even the mystery, which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints:

27 To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ in you, the hope of glory:

Our apostle in these words, seems to assign a reason why he underwent the sufferings mentioned in the former verse so cheerfully, as even to rejoice in them; namely, because he was a minister of the church, by the special dispensation of God, to preach the mysteries of the gospel to the Gentile world. Learn thence, That such as are eminent in the church, and, as ministers of the gospel, do lay out themselves more abundantly in the church's service, they must expect to meet with a measure, and a full measure of sufferings beyond others. There are no such enemies to the devil's kingdom, as the zealous and faithful ministers of Jesus Christ; therefore he will be sure to revenge the ruins of his own kingdom. Observe, farther, What it was that St Paul was appointed by God to preach to the Gentiles, namely, that great mystery of their vocation and calling; this he calls here a mystery, a rich mystery, a glorious mystery, a mystery hid from ages but now made manifest. Learn hence, That the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ, as a Redeemer, was long hid from the knowledge of the Gentiles; and that at last they were brought to the knowledge of Christ, and the participation of gospel privileges was a great mystery awfully to be admired, and a glorious mercy with all thankfulness to be acknowledged, "to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles—which is Christ, in you, the hope of glory," which gospel, preached amongst you, and received and entertained by you, is an earnest and ground of your hope of glory. Note here, 1. That Christ is in, and among believers; he is among them by the preaching of the gospel, he is in them by the inhabitation of his Holy Spirit. Note, 2. That all true believers, whilst here on earth, have an hope of glory. Note, 3. That Christ's indwelling presence in the souls of believers by his Holy Spirit, is an earnest of that glory, and an evident demonstration of their hope of it: believers have in them a glorious hope, they have before them a glory hoped for; Christ is the ground of both, by him we obtain the end of our hope, even the salvation of our souls.

28 Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus;

29 Whereunto I also labor, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily.

Observe here, 1. What was the principal subject of the apostle's preaching, it was Christ; whom we preach; Christ was the matter of his preaching, and the great end of his preaching. Observe, 2. The manner of St. Paul's preaching; it was by informing the understanding and judgment, by directing the practice, warning men of the evil of sin, and of the danger of continuing in it. Observe, 3. The end of his preaching, it was to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus; that is, to render them complete both in knowledge and obedience. Observe, 4. The indefatigable pains and diligence used by the apostle in that work of preaching, intimated in the words laboring and striving, "whereunto I also labor, striving." Observe, 5. The gracious help and blessed success which he had in his preaching, humbly and thankfully acknowledged, and ascribed unto God, "according to his working, which worketh in me mightily." From the whole learn, 1. What was the sum of St. Paul's preaching, and ought to be of ours also, to bring men to repentance and faith in Christ, to advance them towards a perfection in knowledge and obedience, by informing their judgments, and directing their practice. Learn, 2. That the faithful ministers of Christ do judge no labor and pains too great; no strivings or sufferings too much, no contending with the errors and sins of men sufficient, in order to the bringing of them unto God by conversion and repentance. Learn, 3. That such ministers as thus indefatigably labor and strive for the good of souls, shall not labor and strive alone, they shall be accompanied with divine assistance: Christ will strive with them, and work with them: "Striving according to his working." 4. That when ministers have met with success in their striving, by Christ's working with them, they must ascribe nothing of praise to themselves, to their own piety, pains, or pains, but ascribe all to him that striveth by them, "and worketh in them mightily."

CHAPTER II.

Our apostle having in the former chapter, declared that the doctrine he preached to the Colossians by Epaphras, was according to truth, and exhorted them to continue grounded and settled in the same; in this chapter he cautions and warns them against all such corrupt doctrines, as any sort of false teachers might be ready to obtrude upon them; whether they were the Gentile philosophers, who attempted to draw them to the worshipping of angels; or the judaizing doctors, whose endeavour it was to bring them under the yoke of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law, long since abolished by the death of Christ: to fortify the Colossians against both, is the design of this chapter, in which our apostle thus bespeaks them:

FOR I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh;

Observe here, 1. The holy agony which our apostle was in, and the mighty conflict he had with himself, upon the account of the Colossians; "I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you; namely, by prayer, care, study, and endeavour to do you good: here we see how passionately good men long for the good of those whom they never saw; as members of the catholic church, they wish well to the whole, and to every part. Observe, 2. What was the ground and occasion of St. Paul's inexpressible agony and concern of spirit, for and on behalf of these Colossians; namely this, there was a number of men risen up who began very early to corrupt the purity and simplicity of the gospel and the christian religion: a sort they were, partly of judaizing, and partly paganizing christians; the former joined the Jewish ceremonies, the latter the Gentiles' impurities, even in worship with the christian religion. Now the urgency of this case put the solicitous and concerned spirit of this great apostle into an inexpressible agony, as his words here intimate; "I would ye knew what a conflict I have for you and your neighbours of Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh." The men of the world little understand, and less consider, what burden of solicitous care lies upon ministers of Christ, for and on behalf of the whole church of Christ in general, which is continually in danger of being corrupted by false teachers who every where lie in wait to deceive.

2 That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgement of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ:

Our apostle having discovered, in the former verse, that inward anxiety of mind which he labored under, on the behalf of these Colossians, doth, in these words, propose an expedient how the threatening danger might be averted, namely, by mutual love one to another, and by a clear and efficacious faith of the gospel; by these he reckons they would be so closely compacted together, as that no subtlety nor violence could endanger them: if, by faith, they did cleave close to God and Christ, and by love keep close to one another, he firmly believed they would give no enemies an opportunity, either to be the successful authors, or the delighted spectators of their ruin. Learn hence, That the maintaining of sincere love amongst christians, and the improving of their faith to greater measures of certainty and efficacy, in reference to the substantial of christianity, are the best means to unite, establish, and preserve them against the fatal danger of a ruinous apostacy; "That their hearts may be comforted, being knit together in love, &c."

3 In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

That is, in Jesus Christ, and in his gospel, "are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," laid up as a store-house, and from thence only are they to be expected and derived. The knowledge of Christ and his gospel is an extensive and comprehensive knowledge, a rich and enriching knowledge; the chiefest gain is loss, and the richest treasure is dung, when Christ's riches are displayed; and after all that we have or can attain unto, of the knowledge of Christ, his work is unsearchable, no finite understanding can reach the depth thereof; for in him "are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

4 And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words.

5 For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in Spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ.

Note here, How exceedingly desirous the apostle was, that the Colossians might continue sound in the christian faith, and be preserved out of the hands of the false teachers, who by false arguments, and ensnaring persuasions sought to beguile them, in matters of religion: we are in greater danger from the subtle seducer, than we are from the fiery persecutor; sophistical arguments, and insinuating persuasions, captivate those persons whom violence could never have brought over to their party; therefore is our apostle so earnest with the Colossians, that none should "beguile them with enticing words." Note farther, How our apostle gives another reason of this his solicitous care for them, namely, his fervent affection towards them, notwithstanding his great distance from them, for though not in body, yet in mind he was present with them, and having received from Epaphras an account of the good order and government of their church, and of the steadfastness of their faith in Christ, the notices thereof were matter of exceeding joy and rejoicing to him; "Though absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the Spirit, joying, &c." Learn, hence, That a church's steadfastness in the faith of Christ, and unity amongst themselves in gospel order, doth render a church a joyful object to all beholders, and particularly to the ministers and ambassadors of Christ, who greatly rejoice therein.

6 As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him;

7 Rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving.

That is, "As you have received the doctrine of Christ Jesus the Lord, by the preaching of Epaphras, and therein have embraced Christ by faith, so do you constantly adhere to that doctrine, conforming your lives thereunto; and seeing you are thus implanted into Christ, be like trees, well and deeply rooted in him, or like a house, firmly built upon him as the only sure and abiding foundation." Learn, That such as have received the grace of God in truth, ought to labor after stability in grace, and establishment in the true religion, that they may stand like a rock, immoveable in assaults, and unshaken amidst all the batteries that may be made upon their faith by heretics and seducers.

8 Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ;

Our apostle comes now in a particular and special manner to warn the Colossians, that they beware of all the enemies of christianity, whether pagan or Jewish, for christianity was opposed by both; the heathen philosophers and wise men did amuse the christians with their vain speculations; the Jewish teachers were for imposing upon them the Levitical rites, which he calls rudiments or elements fitted for the infancy of the church; but these things were not now after Christ, that is, not according to the doctrine and mind of Christ. "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, &c. Where note, That it is not philosophy, as such, which St. Paul warns them against; for true and sound philosophy is the improver of our reason, the guide of our faculties, and teaches us the true knowledge of God, and ourselves, and is no hindrance, but a great help to religion; but it was the philosophy of the Greeks at that day which is here condemned, because it was vain and empty, fallacious and deceitful. It was vain because it conducted nothing to true piety, and making them better; it was deceitful, because it hazarded their souls, and robbed them of happiness. Note farther, that the Mosaic rites and legal ceremonies, as they were prescribed by God, and adapted to the infant state of the Jewish church, had a goodness, yea, an excellency in them; but the observation of them, since the coming of Christ, is sinful, being an implicit denial, that he is come in the flesh; accordingly, he warns them to beware of the philosophy of the Greeks, and the ceremonial rites of the Jews; neither of which, he tells them, were after Christ, that is, not according to the institution or injunction of Christ, but did draw away the heart from him, therefore, they were both unwarrantable and unsafe.

9 For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily:

10 And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power:

Here St. Paul gives a reason of the foregoing caution against philosophy; for in him, that is, in Christ, "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily;" as if he had said, "Let no man impose upon you by a lame and imperfect philosophy, there is no need of that, for now there is introduced an absolute and complete doctrine, namely, that of our Lord Jesus Christ, which has the fulness of all divine wisdom in it, and the 'fulness of the Godhead,' dwelling bodily in himself, that is, personally and substantially." Where note, That the apostle says not, that the Godhead is assistant to Christ, but, that he resideth or dwelleth in him; as the Deity dwelt in the ark symbolically, so it dwelt in Christ bodily. Note farther, That Christ is not here said to be filled with the fulness of God, as the church is said to be, Eph. i. 23. in regard of the gifts and graces which she had received from him: but the whole fulness of the Godhead is here said to reside in him, which can argue him to be no less than really and truly God, his complete essence dwelleth in him. Well might the apostle therefore add, ver. 10. "Ye are complete in him," wanting no requisite to salvation; ye need not go to the philosophers for knowledge, for in Christ you have complete wisdom; he is above all pagan philosophers and Jewish rabbies; nay, he is the 'Head of all principalities and powers,' that is, above the highest angel in heaven. Here observe, That it was the opinion of the paganish, as it is now of the popish part of mankind, That Almighty God was too high to be immediately approached, and therefore, they applied themselves to angels as mediators betwixt God and them; but the apostle acquaints them, that the angel-mediatorship is vain, since Christ is also their Head and Lord.

11 In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ:

The apostle had asserted before, that we are complete in Christ; He proves it now thus; we want not circumcision; Why? Because we have in Christ the thing signified by circumcision, namely, the spiritual circumcision of the heart, which consists in putting off, by the power of Christ's Spirit, the body of natural corruption; which done, there was no need of the outward circumcision made with hands, or the cutting off the flesh of the foreskin. Observe, Original corruption is a body, or, as a body to us, it cleaves as close to the soul as the flesh to the bones. This body, with all its members, we must be cutting daily by spiritual circumcision, or a real mortification; and, where that is done, God is well pleased: he regards not that circumcision which is outward in the flesh, which is made with hands, but that which is inward, the circumcision of the heart, and of the spirit, whose praise is not of man, but of God.

12 Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead.

Our apostle here compares christian baptism with the Jewish circumcision, and shows, that the signification and spiritual intention of both was one and the same, obliging all persons who took the outward sign upon them to put off the old man, and put on the new; to die unto sin, and live unto God. Accordingly, the ancients made use of divers ceremonies in baptizing adult and grown persons, thereby to represent the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ; immersion, or putting the person three times under water, either as our Saviour was under the earth three days, or in allusion to the three persons in the Trinity, in whose name we are baptized; and likewise emersion, their coming up out of the water, resembling our Lord's arising out of his grave. Note here, 1. That baptism under the New Testament, succeeds circumcision under the Old, and is a rite of initiation to christians; as circumcision was to the Jews; for the apostle here proves, that by virtue of our spiritual circumcision in baptism, we have no need of the outward circumcision of the flesh. Note, 2. That baptism is undoubtedly Christ's ordinance for infants of believing christians, as circumcision was of old for the infants of believing Jews: for if under the gospel, infants be not received, by some federal rite, into covenant with God, they are in a worse condition than children under the law; and the apostle could not truly have said, we "are complete in Christ," that is, as complete without circumcision, as ever the Jewish church was with it, if we had not an ordinance, to wit, baptism, as good as their abrogated ordinance of circumcision. And the Jews would certainly have objected it to the reproach of christianity, had not the christians had a rite of initiation for their children, as they had of circumcision, which sealed the covenant to themselves, and their little ones, and was the door, by which all persons entered into the Jewish church. Note, 3. The spiritual fruits and effects of baptism, namely, mortification in sin, vivification in grace, by virtue of the death and resurrection of Christ, apprehended by such a faith as is of the operation of God, that is, produced by the energy of the gospel, and the efficacy of the Holy Spirit. Learn hence, That neither sacraments, nor the death or the resurrection of Christ, in themselves, will avail to the mortification of sin, and the quickening of grace, if Christ himself be not applied to by such a faith, as is of the special operation of God, the faith of his working, and of his approving: this alone will effectually enable us to die unto sin and live unto God.

13 And you, being dead in your sins, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses.

14 Blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross:

15 And having spoiled principalities, and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it.

Still our apostle proceeds in proving, that we are complete in Christ, and that the Colossians had no need of circumcision in the flesh, having all in Christ that was necessary for justification as well as sanctification. To satisfy them herein, observe, 1. He acquaints them with their deplorable condition by nature, "you being dead in your sins," without any hope of spiritual life, and by reason of "uncircumcision of your flesh," aliens from the church of God (and strangers to all the promises made unto it) hath he quickened and pardoned; having freely forgiven you "all your trespasses." O blessed privilege of justification, to have sin forgiven, trespasses universally forgiven, all trespasses freely forgiven! Observe, 2. What it cost Christ, to purchase pardon for us, to discharge us from our obligation to wrath, and our obnoxiousness to the curse and condemnation of the law; no less than his precious life laid down upon the cross, "blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances against us, and contrary to us, &c." An allusion to a practice amongst men who cancel bills and bonds, and all obligations wherein they stood bound, when once the debt is satisfied. Now says the apostle, your debt of sin is paid to the justice of God, by the death of Christ; and seeing the obligation is cancelled, it would be madness and impiety to renew it again, as those do, who plead for circumcision, and practise the legal ceremonies. Note here, There was an obligation upon every man to undergo the curse of the law; for violating the commands of the law, there was "an hand-writing against us." The obligation must be cancelled, before the condemning power of the law can be abolished, and sin pardoned: none but Christ could cancel this obligation; and not be either without paying the full sum payable from us: Christ when hanging on the cross, did "nail this hand-writing" to his cross, which shall never be produced in judgment against the penitent believer; but this obligation remains upon the file uncanceled, with respect to all sinners who live and die in their sins, and they shall always lie in prison, ever satisfying, but never able fully to satisfy this obligation. Observe, 3. That Christ hath not only by his death cancelled this hand writing, and nailed it to his cross, but has vanquished and triumphed over all our spiritual enemies; satan, and all the powers of hell, are led as so many pinioned captives before the triumphant chariot of his cross, making them a spectacle of scorn and shame in the eyes of God, angels and men; ¶ having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, &c." Note here, 1. Christ's bloody cross was a chariot of triumph unto him. Lord! whilst thou wert bleeding and racking upon the gibbet for us, thou wert then rejoicing and triumphing for the benefits redounding to us. Note, 2. That satan, that great conqueror, was conquered by Christ, and led in triumph before the chariot of the cross. O satan, thou wert never thus baffled, befooled, and disappointed before! When thou and thy agents wert spoiling Christ, even then was he spoiling principalities and powers, and triumphing over them, when they were insulting over him: the serpent now bruised our Lord's heel, but had his own head and power for ever broken; "triumphing over them in it," that is, in and by his cross.

16 Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new-moon, or of the sabbath-days.

17 Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ.

Here we have an inference or conclusion drawn by our apostle from the foregoing argument, that seeing the ceremonial law was now abolished, therefore none should take upon them to judge or condemn another for not observing any of the legal ceremonies, either those that related to meats, that is, the difference to be observed in meats, or the other relating to the difference to be observed in days. Here note, That the days observed amongst the Jews, were of three sorts: Anniversary, which returned every year, called here an holy-day; Lunary, which returned every month, the first day of every new moon; Weekly, which returned every week, and on the seventh day of every week: all which are abrogated, even the Jewish seventh day sabbath; and the Lord's day, or the christian's first-day sabbath, substituted in its place, 1. Cor. xvi. 2. Observe here, 1. That there is both a sinful and a lawful abstinence from meats; that abstinence is sinful, when men abstain from some meats, upon pretence of holiness and conscience, as if some meats were unclean, or less holy in their own natures than others, 1. Tim. iv. 4 or as if simple abstinence at any time were a thing acceptable to God in itself, without respect had to the end for which it is sometimes required. But there is a three-fold abstinence from meats, which is lawful; Political, enjoined by the magistrate for civil ends; Medicinal, prescribed by the physician for health's preservation; Ecclesiastical, when God by his providence, and the voice of his church calls his people to fasting. Observe, 2. The reason alledged by the apostle, why christians should not judge one another, with respect to meats and drinks, times and seasons, namely, because those legal ceremonies were but dark shadows of things to come; but the body and substance, represented by those shadows, is Christ come in the flesh: and consequently, to observe the ceremonies, and regard these shadows under the gospel, is in effect to say, that Christ the body is not yet come. Here note, 1. The title given to the ceremonial worship, it is styled a shadow, because it was a dark and imperfect representation of the truth: what is a shadow, but the coming of a thick body between us and the sun? The legal ceremonies were interposed between Christ the true light and us, and so cast a shadow of him. Note, 2. The title given to Christ with respect to the shadows of the ceremonial law, he is the body and the substance of them; now as the shadow vanishes when the substance is come, so these ceremonial ordinances were to cease upon the coming of Christ; and to observe them now, under the gospel, is in effect to say, that Christ is not yet come in the flesh. Note, 3. That the Jewish sabbath was a ceremonial ordinance, and part of that hand-writing of ordinances which was to be blotted out by Christ; and consequently the christian is not obliged to observe it. As the distinctions of meats and drinks, and the observation of the new moons, were confessedly ceremonial; so was also the Jewish sabbath, which with the rest was equally cancelled by Christ, as a part of the hand-writing of ordinances; so that to observe the Jewish sabbath, or to condemn the christian for not observing it, is as much a denial that Christ is come in the flesh, as to observe circumcision, or any other part of the ceremonial law.

18 Let no man beguile you of your reward, in a voluntary humility, and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind:

19 And not holding the Head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God.

Our apostle having warned the Colossians against the errors of the Judaizing teachers, comes next to warn them against the practice of the paganizing christians, who were directed by their guides to worship the angels, covering their error with a plausible show of humility, pretending it was presumptuous to go to God immediately, without the mediation of those excellent creatures; but this the apostle tells them was a bold intruding into things they knew nothing of, God having neither revealed nor taught any such thing; and urged, that they were vainly puffed up with the foolish imaginations of their own fleshly minds. Next he shows, that these angel-worshippers do not acknowledge Christ for the head of the church, while they apply themselves to angels as mediators; whereas he alone discharges the office of the Head, completely giving life and growth to his whole church, and to every member thereof; which members being furnished with spiritual life from him, and knit to him, and one another by the joints and bands of charity and other graces, they grow and increase with such an increase of holiness as is from God, and tends to his glory. Note here, 1. That the nature of man is prone, extremely prone, to idolatry and false worship. 2. That it is as really idolatry to worship an angel, as it is to worship a worm; for divine worship is only due to a divine person. Note, 3. That it is a renouncing of Christ, to make use of angels, or any other Mediators, besides Christ, unto the Father, not holding the Head. It was a notion, that early and indeed universally possessed the minds of mankind. God was not to be immediately approached to by sinful men; but that their prayers were to be presented by certain mediators and intercessors, who were to procure for them the favor of God, and the acceptance of their prayers. Hence they worshipped angels and the souls departed of their heroes, whom they canonized, and translated into the number of their inferior gods, by whom they addressed their supplications to their superior gods. With this notion almighty God was pleased to comply so far, as under the Jewish institution to appoint Moses a Mediator betwixt him and them; and now under the christian dispensation to appoint Jesus Christ to be the only Mediator betwixt God and man. Note, 4. That it is usual for idolaters and false worshippers, to cover themselves with a more than ordinary show of humility; let none beguile you in a voluntary humility. True it is, that all duties of worship ought to be voluntary, as voluntary is opposed to constrained; but they must not be voluntary, as voluntary is opposed to instituted or appointed: God doth no more approve of that worship we give him according to our will, than he doth approve of our neglect of that which is according to his own will. But man, vain man, likes any way of worshipping God which is of his own framing, much better than that which is of God's own appointing.

20 Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances;

21 Touch not; taste not; handle not;

22 Which all are to perish with the using; after the commandments and doctrines of men;

23 Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body, not in any honor to the satisfying of the flesh.

Our apostle being now in the close of this chapter, returns to expostulate, and argues the case with those who were willing to subject themselves to the observation of the old Jewish rites and ceremonies. He argues thus: "If, says he, you profess yourselves in your baptism to be spiritually dead with Christ, and to be freed by his death from the Levitical ordinances, why are ye subject to those ordinances? Such are touch not, taste not, handle not; touch not any unclean thing, taste not any forbidden meat, handle not any consecrated vessel; all which observances were to perish necessarily with the very using; and whereas they were set off with a specious show of wisdom, as if they were voluntary services and free-will offerings to God, he acknowledges, that they had indeed a show of wisdom, a show of humility, and a show of mortification and austerity to the body, and not seeming to give any honor to the satisfying of the flesh; but all this had nothing of spiritual devotion and piety in it." Learn hence, 1. That such as do by baptism profess themselves to be dead with Christ in the ceremonial law, may certainly conclude that the Jewish ceremonies have no more any power over them, or that they ought to yield themselves to the observation of them: "If ye be dead with Christ, why are ye subject to ordinances?" Learn, 2. That though God approve and accepteth willing worship, yet not will-worship; what fair show soever it may seem to have, either of wisdom, humility, or mortification; whatever is the product of our fancies, is a very fornication in religion, and an abomination in the sight of God, how pleasing soever it may be in the sight of men; and yet men are the most forward to that service of God which is of man's finding out and setting up; man likes it better to worship a god of his own making, than to worship the God that made him; and likes any way of worshipping God which is of his own framing, more than that which is of God's appointing. Ah! Wretched heart of man, which, whilst it seems very zealous to worship and honor God, hath not zeal to do it in any other way than in that which reflects the highest dishonor upon him.

CHAPTER III.

Our apostle in this epistle (as his manner is in all the rest) having laid the doctrine of the gospel for a foundation, and rectified some errors, both in doctrine and practice, amongst the Colossians; he comes now to the practical part of this epistle, exhorting them to a conversation in all things answerable to the doctrine of Christ; and the first duty he excites them to the practice of, is that of an heavenly conversation, expressed by seeking of, and setting their affections upon things above, and not on things below.

IF ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.

2 Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth.

Observe here, 1. The nature of the duty to which we are exhorted; this is expressed both affirmatively and negatively; affirmatively, seek the things above, and set your affections on them; negatively, not on the things here on earth; it being impossible to seek and set our affections upon both in an intense degree. Quest. But what is it to seek those things that are above, and to set our affections upon them? Ans. In these two words, four things are comprehended; 1. An act of our understanding, that we know the worth of these things. 2. An act of the will, to choose these things, and with the ardor and vehemency of our affections to love them. 3. An act of industry and endeavour in the pursuit of these things, if by any means we may attain them. Our affections are so many springs of motion to set our endeavours on work for the obtaining of what we love and desire. 4. It implies a clear preference of the things above to things below, when they come in competition; set your affections more on things above than on the things below, and show it by your readiness to part with these things. Observe, 2. What is the object of this act, or what is it that we are to seek and set our affections upon, namely, the "things which are above;" God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, together with the blessed state and condition of heaven, and the happiness above; as also those dispositions and qualifications which are requisite for the obtaining of this happiness, and bringing us to the fruition of it; all these are comprehended in the latitude of the object, "the things which are above." Observe, 3. The arguments which our apostle uses to excite us to this duty: 1. "If ye be risen with Christ," that is, if ye believe that Christ is risen, and if ye will bear a conformity and resemblance to him in his resurrection, and be made partakers of the power and virtue of it; for Christ's resurrection is not only a pattern, but a principle; it has a power and efficacy in it to raise us up to a spiritual life; "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above." 2. A second argument is drawn from Christ's exaltation in heaven: he "sitteth on the right hand of God;" which words declare the exaltation of his human nature, and his being advanced to be the supreme King and Governor of his church. Now the force of this argument lies in the relation that is between the Head and the members, between Christ and christians; as the Head has an influence upon the members, so the members have an affection for the Head, which makes them aspire heavenwards, where the Head is; because their glorified Saviour, sitting at the right hand of God, by the power of his Spirit, draws out their affections towards him: "If ye be risen with Christ, seek the things above." As if St. Paul had said, "Is Christ our Head risen, and ascended into heaven? Let us in our hearts and affections follow him thither, and patiently wait till he receive our souls, and raise our bodies, and take us wholly to himself, that we may be for ever with the Lord."

(No. 59.)

3 For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God.

Here we have a fresh argument to enforce the foregoing exhortation, seek the things above, for ye are dead, that is, dead to sin, dead to the world, therefore be not over eager in the pursuit of the things below. How affrighting a sight would it be, to see a dead man rise out of his grave, and converse with the world, and follow the things here below! As affecting is it to see christians, who by baptismal profession do own themselves to be dead to the world, yet buried in the world; and instead of setting their affections on things above, pursuing with the full bent of their desires, the things below. Ye are dead, it follows, your life is hid with Christ in God: Your life, that is, your spiritual life of grace, and your eternal life of glory, they are both hid with Christ, now with God in heaven. Hid in Christ, 1. As the effect is in the cause, as the life of the branches is hid in the root, so is the life of a christian hid in Christ; he is our root. Again, hid in Christ, that is, 2. Deposited and laid up with Christ, committed to his care and custody, securely put into his hands. 3. Hid with Christ, that is, dispensed by him, and derived from him at his pleasure; of his fulness we receive, when and in what measure he pleaseth. Note here, 1. Our life of grace only deserves the name of life; our natural life, short and uncertain in itself, and common to us with the brutes, deserves not comparatively, the name of life. Note, 2. That Christ is the believer's life, he is both the author and efficient cause of it, the meritorious cause of it, and the exemplary cause and pattern of it. Note, 3. That the christian's life is hid with Christ. This phrase imports, 1. Security and safety: what is hidden in Christ, and with him, must be safe, and out of the reach of danger; grace is incorruptible seed, that shall never die: the world, satan and sin, may assault, but shall not overcome; neither lust within, nor the devil, nor the world, shall be able to vanquish that life which is hid in Christ. 2. It imports obscurity; what is hidden, is concealed: the life of grace is totally hidden from the wicked, and hid, in some sort, from the believer himself, under spiritual desertion, under the winnowings of temptation, under the prevalency of corruption; much more is the life of glory hidden, it doth not yet appear; we can no more conceive of it by all we have heard, than we can conceive what the sun is by seeing of a glow-worm. 3. Our life being hid with Christ, it imports plenty and abundance: "I am come, that ye may have life more abundantly," John x. 10.

4 When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

11 E

That is, "When Christ, who is the author, and purchaser, and preserver of our life, shall appear to judge the world at the great day, then shall all believers, who have received spiritual life from him, be sharers in glory with him. Here note, 1. That Jesus Christ, by whom believers live a life of grace, and from whom they expect a life of glory, shall certainly appear, yea, and have a very glorious appearing; he shall be glorious in his person, glorious in his attendants, glorious in his authority, &c. Note, 2. That when Christ appears in glory to judge the world, then it is that all believers shall enjoy a full glorification with him. Note, 3. That the faith of approaching glory, at Christ's second appearance, is a strong argument to take off our "affections from things below, and place them on things above." St. Paul's argument is, to press the Colossians to set their affections on things above," because Christ is above, and, when he appears, they shall "appear with him in glory."

5 Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry:

Note here, 1. That although the apostle told them in the third verse, that they were dead to sin, yet here, in the fifth verse, he bids them mortify sin; intimating, that the work of mortification, at the best, is but imperfect, and must be carried on daily and progressively; they were mortified but in part; the old man has a strong heart, and is a long time a dying, after it has received its deadly wound: sin lives a dying life, and dies a lingering death; "Mortify therefore, &c." Note, 2. What it is they are called upon to mortify, "their members upon earth;" Where, by members we are to understand all the lusts and corruptions of our hearts and natures, all the relics and remains of sin unsubdued and unpurged out of the soul; he instances in "fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affections and desires, and covetousness," which loveth the world above God, and is therefore no better than idolatry." But why are these called members, and members upon earth? Ans. They are called members, in allusion to what St. Paul had called sin before, chap. ii. ver. 11. namely, a body of sin, therefore he calls particular lusts members of that body; and also because they require and call for the members of the body, as instruments to bring them into act; likewise, because these lusts are naturally as dear to men as their bodily members, they can as soon part with a right hand or a right eye, as with a bosom and beloved lust; they are also called members upon the earth, because they are conversant about earthly things, because they will cleave to us as long as we live upon earth; and to intimate, that none of these must be carried to heaven with us, but be mortified on the earth. But what is it to mortify these members? Ans. To mortify sin, is to deny our consent to the solicitations of sin, to suppress the first motions of sin, to enervate the power and activity of sin. Learn hence, 1. That in the holiest and best of God's children and servants, there are relics and remains of sin, to be daily mortified, and gradually subdued. Learn, 2. That after God has brought a person into a state of grace, it is his duty, and ought to be his endeavour, daily to mortify sin, and all the remains of unsubdued corruption. A caution, take heed of concluding sin is mortified, because it is restrained, because the acts of sin are intermitted, because some particular sins are subdued: is all sin hated of thee, loathed and left by thee? It is more to loath a sin, than it is to leave a sin? sin may be left, and yet be loved; but no man can loath a sin, and love it at the same time. Learn, 3. That covetousness is a sin, which, above others, a christian should set himself against, and endeavour to mortify and subdue, it having a sort of idolatry in it, drawing our love, our trust, our fear, our joy, from God, and placing the supremacy of our affections in and upon the creatures. True the covetous man does not believe his money to be God; but by his inordinate loving of it, and fiducial trusting in it, he is as truly guilty of idolatry, as if he bowed his knee unto it: for God more regards the internal acts of the mind, than he doth the external acts of the body. In like manner, the papists do not believe their saints and angels to be gods; but by praying to them, and trusting in them for relief and help, they give them the inward worship of the soul, and consequently they are as guilty of idolatry as if they did believe them to be God.

6 For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience.

7 In the which ye also walked some time, when ye lived in them.

Here our apostle backs his exhortation to mortify sin, with strong arguments and motives; the first is taken from the wrath of God which, in its dismal effects, falls upon those who continue in, and under the power of those sins: "For which things' sake, that is, for the committing of which things, and for continuing impenitent of the commission of them. the wrath of God cometh upon them." Here note, 1. God's wrath is the due desert of man's sin; yet it is not so much sin as obduration, and impenitency in sin, that draws down wrath. Note, 2. That believers themselves do stand in need of arguments drawn from the wrath of God, to make them afraid of sin, and to excite them to mortify and subdue it; for here the apostle propounded the terrors of divine wrath to these believing Colossians. The second argument is taken from their former continuance, yea, long continuance in these sins; "in which ye also walked some time, when ye lived in them;" that is, in the forementioned sins ye yourselves also walked before your conversion, when ye lived in them, and took delight in the practice of them. Learn hence, That no argument will prevail more with a christian to follow on the work of mortification closely for time to come, than the remembrance of his long continuance in sin in time past; "in which sins ye walked some time, when ye lived in them; Now "mortify therefore, &c."

8 But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth.

9 Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds;

10 And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of him that created him.

In the foregoing verses, St. Paul exhorted the Colossians to mortify external and outward sins, as fornication and uncleanness; here he presses them to mortify internal and spiritual sins, such as anger, wrath, and malice, sins of the heart. The axe of mortification must be laid to the root of inward corruption, spiritual sins, heart sins: though they are minoris infamie, of less infamy and reproach before men, yet they are majoris reatus, of greater guilt in the sight of God; therefore a sincere christian has a special respect to these in the works of mortification; put off all these, anger, wrath, malice: anger, or the sudden motions and risings of passion: wrath is anger advanced to an height; and malice is anger accompanied with desire of revenge, a rooted displeasure: as jealousy is the rage of a man, so malice is the rage of the devil; it is the very soul and spirit of the apostate nature. No sin renders a man so like to satan as wrath and malice. A malicious desire of revenge is so far beneath a christian, that it is the baseness of a man, yea, the spawn of a devil. This sin indulged, destroys the soul, as sure as murder, yea it is no less than murder in the account of God, 1. John iii. 15. "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." Observe next, The apostle exhorts the Colossians to guard against the sins of the heart: "Put off blasphemy, filthy communication, and lying;" that is, evil speaking, filthy speaking, and false speaking. Sins of the tongue are to be guarded and watched against, as well as sins of the heart; they are most scandalous, they dishonor God, and discredit religion, and wrong our own souls. The sins of the tongue are little considered, their great guilt not apprehended, but men must account for their open reproaches, secret backbitings, scoffings, derisions, whereby they endeavour to fix an ignominy upon their neighbour: and particularly, the sin of lying is here cautioned against, "Lie not one to another." All lying is here condemned; the officious lie, tending to our own or our neighbour's profit; the pernicious lie, tending to our neighbour's prejudice; the jocular or jocose lie, tending to recreation and sport. The scripture condemneth all, without restriction, Rev. xxi. 8. "All liars shall have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimstone," Rev. xxii. 15. Whosoever loveth and maketh a lie." Lying makes a man like the devil, who was a liar as well as a murderer from the beginning. Observe, lastly, The argument to enforce the exhortation to mortify all sin, the sins of the heart, the sins of the tongue, the sins of the life, and that is drawn from the consideration of their present state; they had in their baptism made a profession to "put off the old man with his deeds," that is, their old sinful nature, and put on the new man" in baptism, which being renewed by illumination and divine knowledge, and so conformed to the image of God, rendered them now the objects of his special love. Note here, That there were many ceremonies in baptism used in the primitive church, to which St. Paul alludes in several places in his epistles; as drenching in water, so as to seem buried in and under it, Col. ii. 12. "Buried with him in baptism;" likewise putting off their old clothes at going in, and putting on new at their coming out of the water, to which St. Paul alludes here, when he tells them they had, namely, in their baptism, put off the old man, and put on the new. Whence learn, That there is no argument more moving and effectually exciting unto holiness of life, than that which is taken from our baptismal vow and profession; the obligation of this is very strong, if duly considered. The apostle makes use of it here as a potent argument, to quicken them to the mortification of all sin, seeing they had in baptism "put off the old man, that is, professed and solemnly engaged so to do, and "had put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness."

11 Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ is all, and in all.

Where that is, in which state of renovation, or under the present gospel-dispensation, there is found with God no respect to any man's person or nation, as before there was under the legal dispensation; now Jew and Gentile, male and female, bond and free, circumcised and uncircumcised, every one that "feareth God and worketh righteousness, is accepted of God, through Christ, who is all, in all things, to all believers;" but how is Christ all in all unto his people? Thus, his teaching is all in all in the work of illumination; his Spirit is all in all in the work of conversion; his death is all in all in the work of satisfaction, his righteousness is all in all in the matter of our justification, his grace is all in all in our satisfaction, his intercession is all in all in our acceptance, his peace is all in all in our consolation, his power is all in all in our resurrection, his presence is all in all in our glorification. O blessed Jesus! art thou thus all to me? I will labor to be all to thee; I will give thee all that I am, my soul with all its faculties, my understanding, my heart, and my affections, particularly my love and my hatred, my joy and my sorrow, my hope and my fear, my body with all its members: for thou hast created, redeemed, and wilt glorify the body as well as the soul; and therefore I will glorify thee with my body and with my spirit, which is thine: I will also give thee all that I have, by consecrating it all to the service of Christ, and resigning up all to the will of Christ, and will entitle thee to all that I do, by making thy word my rule, and thy glory my end, in all my actions and undertakings.

12 Put on, therefore (as the elect of God, holy and beloved) bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering;

13 Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye.

Our apostle having now finished his exhortation in the practice of that great duty of mortification of sin, called here, a "putting off the old man," comes next to mention several graces and virtues, which he exhorts them to be found in the practice of; and this he styles, a "putting on the new man;" teaching us hereby, that a negative holiness is not sufficient to salvation; it is not enough that we cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well; a man may go to hell for not doing good, as well as for doing wickedly. Observe, farther, The particular graces and virtues which they are exhorted to put on. 1. "Bowels of mercy and kindness;" that is, a tender pity towards, and an inward sympathy with, those that are in misery; and this expressed in outward acts of succour and relief, according to our ability. There is a natural pity which man can hardly put off, it is seated in the very nature of man; and accordingly, unmercifulness is a sin against the light of nature, as well as against the law of God: but there is, besides this, a spiritual pity, which flows from pure love, and that a divine love; now, this is more an act of grace than of nature; this the apostle here exhorts the Colossians to, "Put on bowels of mercy; they who have put on, and are clothed with garments of holiness, will also put on bowels of mercy as a garment. 2. "Humbleness of mind;" whereby a man, sensible of God's goodness, and his own infirmities, hath an humble apprehension, and a modest estimation of himself: the more holiness any person has, the more humility he has; humility is a certain evidence of our holiness, because it is a great part of our holiness. 3. "Meekness and long-suffering," which moderate anger, and enable us to put up affronts and injuries. This is a spirit and temper divine, and truly Christ-like; none so abused and affronted as he; but, being reviled, he blessed, and committed himself to him that judgeth righteously. When another hurts thee by unjust provocation, why shouldst thou hurt thyself by sinful passion? Christ was a Lamb for meekness; it doth not become any of his followers to be like lions for fierceness. 4. Forbearance, and mutual forgiveness; "Forbearing one another and forgiving one another." No christians are so perfect but they are liable to offend one another; he must have no friends, that will have a friend with no faults, and consequently they stand in need of forgiveness from each other. Learn hence, 1. That christians are obliged, by the laws of their holy religion, to forbear and forgive one another. 2. They are obliged to imitate Christ in this duty of forgiveness; Christ forgives us universally, freely, sincerely, so as never more to upbraid us with the fault he has forgiven us; such a forgiveness are we to exercise towards our brother. "As Christ forgave you; so also do ye." Observe lastly, The argument which St. Paul makes use of to press the Colossians to the practice of the forementioned duties, and that is drawn from their election and vocation; "Put on as the elect of God, bowels of mercy." You that had the favor to be chosen of God out of the heathen world, to be his church and people, and are now holy and beloved of God, let the sense of this divine favor oblige you to humility and meekness, to longsuffering and mutual forgiveness, yea, to the love and practice of universal holiness.

14 And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness.

Still our apostle makes use of the former metaphor, comparing the graces of the Holy Spirit to garments, which he exhorts christians to put on; he had mentioned the putting on of mercy, meekness, humility, &c. before; now he advises, to put on charity, or the grace of love, as the upper garment over and above all the rest, comparing it to a bond or ligament, which ties and knits all the members of the church together. Quest. But what is this grace of charity? Ans. It is a brotherly affection, which every true christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ for grace sake; or a gracious propensity of heart towards our neighbour, whereby we will, and do to our power procure all good for him. Quest. But why does St. Paul compare charity to an upper garment? "Above all, put on charity." Because, 1. The upper garment is larger and broader than the rest, so ought charity to extend itself to all persons, and upon all occasions. 2. The upper garment is usually fairer than the rest, so doth charity shine brightest amongst all the graces. 3. The upper garment distinguishes the several orders and degrees of men; thus christians are known by love as by a livery; it is the bond that Christ's sincere disciples wear. Quest. But how is charity "the bond of perfectness?" The meaning is, that it is the most perfect bond of union among christians, it knitteth together all the scattered members of the church, and makes their graces and gifts subservient to the good of one another, so that the church is hereby made a complete entire body, which was lame without it; in this sense, charity is called "the bond of perfectness."

15 And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body; and be ye thankful.

As if the apostle had said, "Let that peace which God has given you within, and calleth you to exercise without, govern your lives, and direct you in all your actions towards men, and live in continual thankfulness to God!" Here note, That the original word to rule in the heart, signifies to umpire, or to act the part of an umpire, in appeasing strife. Now, this peace, 1. Inwardly hushes and stills all in the soul, when tumultuous affections are up, and in an hurry; when anger, hatred, and revenge begin to rise in the soul, this calms and composes all. 2. Outwardly, peace of conscience produces peaceableness of conversation; where the peace of God rules in the heart, it disposes to peaceableness in the life. Now, this consists in these things, namely, in an unwillingness to provoke others, in an unaptness to be provoked by others, in a readiness to be reconciled when provoked, and in a forwardness to reconcile others that are at variance.

16 Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom;—

These words come in by way of direction and advice, to help the Colossians in the exercise of the foregoing graces; seeing it is the word of Christ, or the holy scriptures, which teach the forementioned duties, he advises that the word of God may dwell in, and take up its abode with them, richly and plentifully, that they may be furnished thereby with all true and sound wisdom. Note here, 1. The title given to the holy scriptures, they are "the word of Christ because they have Christ for their author, Christ for their object, and Christ for their end. Note, 2. The advice given with respect to the word of Christ, "Let it dwell;" Not come for an hour, but to tarry; not to tarry for a night, but to take up its fixed residence and abode. Note, 3. Where it should dwell not in the ear, not in the head only, not in the memory barely, nor in the affections, but in the heart and soul, Psal. cxix. 11. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee. The law of God is in his heart; none of his steps shall slide," Psal. xxxvii. 31. Note, 4. How the word should dwell in us, richly, copiously, and plentifully, in its commands, in its promises, in its threatenings; let the word, the whole word dwell in you, being diligently searched, heartily received, and carefully observed. Note, 6. The persons to whom this advice is given by the apostle, all the saints at Colosse, the whole body of the people are enjoined an holy familiarity with the Bible, it is to be in their houses, in their hands, and in their hearts, that it may dwell richly in them. Why then, and with what face dare the church of Rome forbid the common people to read the Bible, calling it an heretical book? For a reason they very well know, namely, Because it is the most dangerous book against popery, that ever was written in the world.

— Teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

Here our apostle declares one special benefit which the Colossians would receive, by having "the word of Christ dwell richly in them;" it would enable them to teach and admonish one another, and also to excite and stir up the affections of each other, by singing those "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs" therein contained, or such others as were composed by the inspiration and direction of the holy Spirit of God; always remembering, not to sing gracefully only, but with grace; that is, with attention and devotion in our hearts to the Lord. Learn hence, The singing psalms, both in public assemblies, and private families, and therein praising and blessing of God for mercies received, is a great and necessary duty, to be jointly performed by all persons capable of it. Learn, 2. That in singing, a special regard must be had, that there be an inward harmony, and gracious melody in the soul, by the exercise of the understanding, and the orderly motion of the affections; if the heart and affections be not stirred up in this duty, the outward grace, though never so graceful, availeth nothing.

17 And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

Here our apostle lays down a general rule for the right management of all our words and actions, in the whole course of life; "Whatsoever ye do, do all in the name of our Lord Jesus," giving thanks to God for all the mercies you receive by Jesus Christ. Learn hence, 1. That all our thoughts, words and actions, must and ought to be done in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, to do all by the authority and command of Christ, to do all in the power and strength of Christ, to do all for the honor and glory of Christ, to do all after the pattern and example of Christ. Learn, 2. That all prayers and thanksgivings, as they are only due to God, so they must be performed by us through Jesus Christ, that so they may find acceptance with God; "Giving thanks to God and the Father by him."

18 Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord.

(No. 59.)

Observe here, 1. That St. Paul, in the former part of this chapter having laid down general exhortations, to live suitably to the gospel which the Colossians had received, comes now, in the close of this chapter, to exhort them to the practice of particular duties in their respective places and relations, as husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants. Learn hence, That the doctrine of the gospel lays the highest and strictest obligations upon all those to whom it is revealed, to perform every personal and relative duty in an holy and acceptable manner, both to God and man. Observe, 2. The wives' duty of subjection here required; "Submit yourselves to your own husbands." This implies and comprehends in it, a reverend esteem of them, an affectionate love unto them, speaking respectfully of them, and to them, and yielding obedience to their commands. Observe, also, the qualification and manner of this subjection, "as it is fit in the Lord," that is, in all lawful things, and in obedience to the Lord's commands, and not in any thing contrary to his will. Thus obeying, the woman's subjection is service done to Christ; which may comfort her, in case of any unkind returns from her husband to her.

19 Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them.

Observe, 1. The general duty of the husband declared to love his wife with a special, peculiar, conjugal affection, and to discover this love by a tender care over her, an affectionate regard to her, cohabitation with her, contentment and satisfaction in her, a patient bearing with her weaknesses, or prudential hiding of her infirmities, a cheerful supplying of her wants, a readiness to instruct and direct her, a willingness to pray for her, and with her; where true love is found these duties will be performed. Observe, 2. A particular sin, which all husbands are to avoid in their conversation with their wives, and that is being "bitter against them;" not bitter in affection toward them, that is, cold and indifferent in their love to them; not bitter in expression towards them, speaking reproachfully to them; not bitter in their actions towards them, giving them bitter blows, which is contrary to the law of God and nature. Learn hence, That it is the will and command of God, that husbands should not behave themselves churlishly, sourly, or imperiously towards their wives; not ruling with rigor, or being morose and rough, stern and severe in their carriage towards them, but to treat them with that endearing familiarity that is due to them, as part of ourselves.

20 Children, obey your parents in all things: for this is well-pleasing unto the Lord.

Observe here, The duty bound upon all children, and that is, obedience to their parents; this implies inward reverence, outward observance, a pious regard to their instructions, a following their good examples. Observe, 2. The object of this duty; "Obey your parents," that is, both parents; as obedience is due from all children, so it is payable to all parents, to mothers as well as fathers; nay, Lev. xix. 3, the mother is named first, because in regard of the weakness of her sex, she is most liable to contempt. Observe, 3. The extent of the duty, in all things, that is, in all lawful things, and in all indifferent things, in every thing that is not sinful; though to the child it may seem unnecessary or unreasonable, yet the parents' command is to be obeyed. Observe, 4. The argument and motive to excite and quicken to this duty, "It is well pleasing unto the Lord;" hereby they do acceptable service unto the Lord, who will reward it with long life on earth, and eternal life in heaven. God takes a mighty pleasure in the performance of relative duties; they are not only pleasing, but well-pleasing to him; we are no more really, than what we are relatively in the account of God: that which we call the power of godliness, consists in a conscientious performance of relative duties.

21 Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged.

Here the parents' duty, that is the duty of both parents is laid down, "provoke not your children to wrath;" that is, abuse not your power and authority over them, by being too severe unto them; embitter not their spirits against you, by denying them what is convenient for them, by inveighing with bitter words against them, by unjust, unseasonable, or immoderate correcting of them; give them no just occasion to be angry. The reason is added, "lest they be discouraged; either dispirited and heartless, or desperate and hardened; lest by dejection of spirit, they become stupid. A parent's conduct must be moderated with prudence, shunning the extremes of too much indulgence on the one hand, and too great rigor and severity on the other.

22 Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh: not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God:

23 And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men;

24 Knowing, that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance. For ye serve the Lord Christ.

Observe here, 1. The general duty incumbent upon all servants, and that is obedience to such as are their masters according to the flesh, to execute all their lawful commands; such as are God's freemen, may be servants to men, though not the servants of men. Observe, 2. The qualifications and properties of this obedience which is due and payable from servants to masters, it must be in "singleness of heart," in great simplicity and sincerity of spirit, and with an eye to their great Master in heaven; with an eye to the command of their great Master, with an eye to the presence of their great Master, to the assistance and acceptance of their great Master, and to the honor and glory of him also; and it must be done heartily, and with good will, as to the Lord, and not to men. Learn hence, That the meanest and basest services in the place and station in which God sets us, being done with right qualifications, and from sincere motives, and for sincere ends, is service done to Christ, and as such, shall be accepted and rewarded by him. Observe, 3. The mighty reward which the Spirit of God propounds as encouragement to the poor servants in their obedience to their masters, "Of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance. No service so mean but shall be rewarded, if conscientiously performed; no distinction in heaven between servants and sons, all shall receive the inheritance there, who have done faithful service here; and as the meanest service done with right qualifications, is service done to Christ, so shall it be accepted of him, and rewarded by him; "Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance, for ye serve the Lord Christ."

25 But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons.

That is such servants as have wronged their masters, or such masters as have oppressed their servants, God, who respects no man's person, and regardeth the rich no more than the poor, will take his time to revenge the injuries and wrong, done by either to each other." Note here, The severity and impartiality of divine justice: God, the righteous judge, will revenge the wrong, every wrong, whensoever, and by whomsoever it is done; he will revenge it impartially, he will revenge it proportionably: a just retribution, according to the wrong done, shall be rendered to every one by the righteous and just God: "He that hath done wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons."

CHAPTER IV.

MASTERS, give unto your servants that which is just and equal, knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven.

Our apostle concluded the foregoing chapter with an exhortation to servants, to discharge their duty with all fidelity to their masters, remembering, that whatever wrong is done by them, shall, sooner or later, be revenged by God; he begins this chapter with advice to masters, to give unto their servants "that which is just and equal; that which is just, or that which is according to compact and agreement, either explicitly or implicitly made; as work, wages, food, clothing, and all fitting accommodations; also that which is equal in reason and charity, as to oblige them to serve God faithfully, to serve their masters cheerfully, not exercising a magisterial, much less a tyrannical power over them; and the argument to enforce it is strong, "knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven;" remembering they have one above them, from whom they must expect the like. Learn hence, That justice is to be observed towards poor servants, and that there are several offices of humility and charity which are due unto them by the command of God: such are these, 1. That we look upon them not barely as servants, but as brethren, partakers of the same common nature, and capable of the same grace with ourselves, consequently not to treat them as vile persons. 2. That we wink at some of their mis-carriages which are not apparently sinful, and do not punish every transgression committed by them: he must keep no servant that will have a servant with no faults. 3. That we do not rule with rigor, without giving some reason for what commands seem hard and difficult, and that we permit them to plead their cause, and to defend their right, provided they do it with humility, not contradicting or refusing to execute the command of their master. 4. That to well-deserving servants we give something above their wages, allowing them all fitting encouragement whilst they are with us; and when they go away not suffering them to go empty from us. Thus doing, masters will "give unto their servants that which is just and equal: but how ordinary it is for them that are a little above others, to forget there is one above them?"

2 Continue in prayer, and watch in the same, with thanksgiving.

Observe here, 1. The duty exhorted to, and that is prayer; a transcendent privilege, as well as an important duty. Observe, 2. The manner of the duty, and how it must be performed, with constancy and perseverance. 1. Continue in prayer, that is, continue instant in prayer; not that every other duty is to be neglected, that we may always perform this, but we are always to keep our heart in a praying frame, and be found in the practice of the duty at all fitting seasons; we are then said to do a thing continually, when we do it seasonably; what a man does out of conscience, he will do with perseverance. Nature will have her good moods, but grace is steady. 2. Watchfulness in prayer is here directed to. Watch in the same; particularly, we ought to watch for the duty, in the duty, and after the duty: to watch for the fittest praying season, to watch our hearts in the season of prayer, that our thoughts do not wander, nor our affections flag to watch after the duty, that our hearts be not lifted up by any assistances received in the duty; nor be too much dejected, upon the score of those infirmities that mingle themselves with our prayers; but direct the eye of our faith to Christ as our intercessor, who pleads for the gracious acceptance both of our person and services, notwithstanding the imperfections of them both. Observe, lastly, What must always accompany prayer for mercies we want, namely, thanksgiving for mercies received: Watch in the same with thanksgiving. There is no such effectual way of begging as thanksgiving; God is offended, when we are loud and clamorous in asking favors, but dumb and tongue-tied in returning thanks: need will make us beggars, but grace only thankgivers.

3 Withal, praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds;

4 That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak;

Our apostle having directed the Colossians to the duty of prayer in general, here he requests an interest in their prayers for himself, and all the ministers of Christ in particular. Whence observe, 1. That the ministers of Jesus Christ are and ought in a special manner to be remembered in the saints' prayers. Observe, 2. The mercies he desires may be prayed for, on his behalf, namely, utterance and boldness: ministers depend upon God, as for other ministerial gifts, so particularly for the gift of utterance, and it is their people's duty to be earnest and instant with God for the same; and as for utterance in delivering their message, so for boldness in suffering for it, when called to it. No prayers can be too much to strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts of the ministers of Christ unto an holy boldness, who suffer persecution for what they preach; therefore is St. Paul so earnest here with the Colossians, as he was before with the Ephesians, chap. vi. 18. and with the Romans, chap. xv. 30. desiring them to strive together in their prayers for him; where, by the way, remark, That the apostle thus passionately desiring the living saints to pray for him, but never desiring once the prayers and intercessions of the saints departed, nor of the Virgin Mary, is an evidence that he approved not of their prayers, nor looked upon them as mediators and intercessors with God then, as the church of Rome does now.

5 Walk in wisdom toward them that are without,—

By them without, are meant the heathen, who are yet without the pale of the visible church; to walk in wisdom toward them, is a duty of great latitude, but imports particularly here, an endeavour to the uttermost to promote their conversion and salvation, by begetting in them a due veneration for the gospel, and a love and liking to the christian religion. Learn hence, That private christians, by walking wisely before them that are yet unconverted effectually to christianity, may be exceedingly helpful to promote the entertainment of the gospel amongst them. They may pray, and pray in faith for their conversion, and the further spreading of the gospel, in order to that end. The ardent devotions and the holy conversations of private christians are excellent means to recommend the gospel and the christian religion, and to represent them as most amiable and desirable.

—Redeeming the time.

Having in the former part of the verse, directed the Colossians to walk wisely before the unconverted Gentiles that were among them, in this latter part of the verse, he advises them to redeem every opportunity, for gaining over those infidels to the christian religion. A christian that knows the worth of time, will redeem it, will improve it for the soul, for the benefit of his own soul, and for the advantage of others: how this is done, see the note on Eph. v. 16.

6 Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man.

Direction is here given to all christians for the right government of the tongue, and well ordering of the speech, that it be not corrupt and rotten, filthy or frothy, vain and unprofitable, but mild and courteous, savory and gracious, wise and discreet. Note here, 1. That we are not left at random in our ordinary discourse, to let our tongue run riot and talk what we please, without any regard to the edification of others. Note 2. That there ought to be both a gracefulness and grace in our speech, some savor of piety, something that may testify there is grace wrought in ourselves, and tends to the working of grace in others. Note, 3. That our speech may be thus savory at all times, it must be seasoned with salt. 1. With the salt of truth: there must be an agreement betwixt the thing and our words without falsehood; and an agreement betwixt our tongue and our hearts, without dissimulation. 2. With the salt of wisdom and prudence; this will teach us the time when, the manner how, and the measure how much to speak; those words must needs be unsavory, that have neither truth nor prudence in them. The people wondered of old at the gracious words which came out of Christ's mouth; and we may justly wonder at the graceless words which come out of the mouth of many that are called christians.

7 All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother, and a faithful minister, and fellow-servant in the Lord:

8 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your estate, and comfort your hearts;

9 With Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you: they shall make known unto you all things which are done here.

Observe here, 1. That although St. Paul had now with him but a few friends at Rome to comfort him in his bonds, yet he spares two of them to visit and comfort these Colossians. See the public spirit of our apostle, who preferred the common good of the church at Colosse, before his own comfort at Rome. Observe, 2. The persons whom St. Paul sent to them, Tychicus and Onesimus, whom he styles brethren, faithful brethren, beloved brethren, nothing endears persons so much to one another, as religion and the grace of God. These ties are stronger than those of nature: no such love as likeness occasions, especially likeness to God. Observe, 3. The design and end of St. Paul's sending these two persons to them, namely, 1. "To make known unto them all things done at Rome:" Mark, All things, without exception, both his doings and sufferings, both in public and private, the apostle was ashamed of neither. Happy it is, when the conversation of Christ's ministers is such, both in public and private, that they need not be ashamed to have it known, or that the church may understand it. 2. That he might comfort their hearts: but how could Tychicus and Onesimus do this? 1. By making known to them the true cause of his sufferings, that it was for the gospel's sake. 2. To keep them from discouragement at the report of his sufferings, that they might not be offended at his chain, nor sink under the burden of immoderate sorrow upon his account. 3. To comfort their hearts with the report of that holy joy and cheerfulness which the apostle had in his own spirit, under the present burden of his sufferings. See the note on Eph. vi. 22.

10 Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner saluteh you, and Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, (touching whom ye received commandments. If he come unto you, receive him).

11 And Jesus, which is called Justus, who are of the circumcision. These only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been of comfort unto me.

Our apostle coming now to the conclusion of his excellent letter, sendeth (as his manner was) particular salutations to those he wrote to. These salutations were both from others and himself. Here we have three of St. Paul's companions sending salutations to the church at Colosse, namely, Aristarchus, a fellow-prisoner; Mark, sister's son to Barnabas, who though he did desert St. Paul and Barnabas, and went not with them to the work, yet returning to his duty, he is recommended to the church's reception; and Jesus, who was called Justus, possibly from his just conversation. Jesus is the same with Joshua, signifying a Saviour: however, we do not find that any christians, since their Lord's resurrection, did ever give their children the name of Jesus, out of a due reverence to their Lord and Master, who is God-man, blessed for evermore. Now we learn, That neither distance of place, nor length of time ought to cool that love and good-will, that hearty and sincere affection, which christians should bear to one another. Note farther, That, as in the large catalogue of salutations which St. Paul wrote to the saints at Rome, Rom. xvi. in which particular persons are mentioned, St. Peter's name is not once named: so here, in this catalogue of salutations sent from Rome, no mention is made of St. Peter's name either; doubtless had he been now at Rome, he had sent salutations as well as the rest; here are salutations from Aristarchus, Mark, and others, none from Peter. Behold here the weak ground which the Pope builds his pretended supremacy and headship upon, namely, that he is St. Peter's successor, who was bishop of Rome; now though it can never be proved that St. Peter exercised any supremacy over the rest of the apostles, it can less be proved that he was ever bishop of Rome; nor is there any word in scripture to prove that he ever was at Rome, but rather the contrary; it is certain he was not at Rome when St. Paul wrote this epistle, there being only these, he says, whom he mentions, who are his fellow-laborers unto the kingdom of God.

12 Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always laboring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God.

13 For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis.

Our apostle next mentions the particular salutation sent from Rome to the church at Colosse by Epaphras, who is described from his country; he is one of you, that is, a citizen of Colosse; by his office, a servant of Christ, that is, a minister of the gospel; by his fervor of affection towards these Colossians, evidenced by his prayers for them, he la- bors fervently for you in his prayers. The word signifies to strive as in an agony, pointing out our ministerial duty to us, not only to preach unto, and to pray with, but fervently to pray for our people. God forgives our forgetfulness of, our backwardness to, our remissness in, this part of our duty. Too seldom do we bear our people upon our hearts, when we go in and out before the Lord: Oh! how far are we from praying ourselves into an agony for them, when our petitions freeze within our lips, which we put up for our own souls! One thing might here be noted further concerning Epaphras, he was minister of (some think bishop of) Colosse; yet he was born there, he is one of you, that is, of your city. Now, Christ tells us, a minister is in hazard to meet with disrespect in his own country, he is usually of no honor there: however, Epaphras being called to the work of God in the place where he was born, embraces it, and God gives him reputation with the people for his faithfulness in his place. Observe, lastly, What was the subject matter of Epaphras' prayer for his people at Colosse, namely, "That they might stand perfect and complete in all the will of God:" it is the desire and prayer, the care and endeavour of every faithful minister of Christ, that his people may stand fast in their obedience, in universal obedience, in perfect and complete obedience to the will, the whole will of God in all things; yet one thing more is observable in Epaphras, he had not only a great zeal for his own people at Colosse, but for them at Laodicea and Hierapolis, which were neighbouring churches. Learn thence, That the ministers of Christ are to look upon themselves, as ministers of the whole church; and although they take care of a particular congregation, yet it is their duty to desire and endeavour that all christians within the reach of their ministerial labors, may find some special benefit and advantage by them. Epaphras had a fervent zeal for the churches in Laodicea and Hierapolis, as well as at Colosse, and it was his commendation that he had so.

14 Luke, the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you.

Still the apostle is sending salutations from Rome to the Colossians. 1. From St. Luke, who, of a physician for the body, becomes a physician for the soul, as Matthew of a publican became a preacher. Luke well deserved the title here given him of beloved, in that he undertook the ministry at the time when civil authority did allow no maintenance for ministers, and when his employment as a physician would probably have advantaged him much more. "Luke, the beloved physician, greets you." 2. Demas also, who when persecution grew hot, his affections grew cold; yet now he sends salutations with the rest to the church at Colosse. St. Paul complains of his forsaking of him, 2 Tim. iv. 10. for the sake of the present world. Let no professor judge of himself by his external profession, by his performance of outward duties, by his associating himself with the people of God, nay, by his suffering with the servants of God; (Demas did all this) but by their sincere love to Christ, and persevering faithfulness in the trying hour of temptation; we know not what we are, till sufferings appear.

15 Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the church which is in his house.

(No. 60.)

Our apostle had sent the salutations of others to them before, he sends his own now. 1. Generally to all the christian brethren which were in Laodicea, to whom he directs this epistle to be read in the next verse. Now, to prepare them to hear it with greater attention, he sends salutations particularly to them. Salute the brethren in Laodicea. No particular people must desire or expect to monopolize and engross the whole of a minister's affections to themselves; but as he is the minister of the catholic church, so it is both his duty and desire, that all particular churches, yea, individual christians, should share in his affectionate love towards them, in his care and concern for them. He salutes Nymphas in particular, a person perhaps very eminent for piety and charity, as may be gathered from the following words, And the church which is in his house. By which, 1. Understand his family and household, who were so piously instructed, so religiously governed, so devoutly disposed, as if they had been a church, Learn thence, That masters of families should train up their household in religion and godliness, instructing, reproving, exhorting, all that are under their care, that their house may deserve the name of a church; The church which is in his house. 2. Some by the church in his house, understand a material house, or some particular room in his house, which he had given to a certain number of christians for a place of public worship. Although the church, in the apostle's time, had not the countenance of civil authority, to provide either places for worship, or maintenance for ministers; yet such fervor of zeal was found in the breasts of christians, that then, such as were of ability, wanted not for inclination to contribute largely and freely unto both; charity moved to give more then, than force of law can compel and constrain now; Nymphas gives his house to be a place of public worship to the church. See the learned Mr. Mede on Cor. xi. 22.

16 And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans:

Here St. Paul directs to the reading of this epistle themselves, which the Spirit of God had directed him to write unto them. Let this epistle be read amongst you. All holy scripture is to be read and perused by every private christian; the same Spirit that did indite the scriptures, requires the reading and understanding of them. And further, St. Paul desires this epistle, being read amongst the Colossians, should next be read in the church at Laodicea; who being their neighbours, received the same poison or errors from the false teachers, crept in amongst them, and consequently stood in need of the same antidote. That doctrine which is directed to some particular church or person, recorded in scripture, was of universal use then, and may be now, to all particular persons and societies.

—And that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea:

Much controversy has arisen in the church about this epistle from Laodicea; some have affirmed that it was written by St. Paul to the Laodiceans, but lost; from whence they would infer, that the canon of the scripture is not entire; but supposing it were so, yet it follows not but that we have all things necessary to, salvation in the holy scriptures.

It is very probable that St. Paul himself, and several other apostles wrote more epistles than are in the bible; what then? We have what the wisdom of God thought fit to hand down to us, and what is sufficient to make the serious reader of it, wise unto salvation. Surely Almighty God was not bound to bring down all that they wrote to us, but only what his own wisdom saw fit and necessary for us. Others understand it of an epistle from Laodicea to St. Paul, and that he answered it fully in this epistle to the Colossians, and sending it back, desired the Colossians might read it, for better clearing of some passages in this epistle to them. Lastly, Some understand it of the epistle to the Ephesians, Ephesus being the metropolis, or the chief city of Laodicea; and accordingly some called the epistle to the Ephesians, the epistle to the Laodiceans: the truth is, there is a very great affinity betwixt the epistle to the Ephesians, and this to the Colossians; the doctrines, exhortations, and many expressions are the very same; so that it is no wonder if he desired they should be both read at Colosse, to let them see that he wrote the same doctrine to other churches which he had done to them.

17 And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it.

This Archippus is, with good reason, supposed to be the minister at Colosse, in the room of Epaphras, now with St. Paul at Rome. Some think, that in the absence of Epaphras, he was grown somewhat remiss and slack in his ministerial duty; he directs therefore the Colossians to admonish him to the exercise of greater diligence in discharging all the parts of his trust committed by Christ unto him, Say unto Archippus, Take heed, &c. Observe here, A double charge, 1. A charge of message, Say unto Archippus; The Colossians must say it. St. Paul could have wrote a private letter to him; but they must excite him, yea, say to him to his face, not to him behind his back: it is the people's duty to stir up their ministers to the faithful performance of their duty; the fire of our ministerial zeal doth not burn so bright, but we may need our people's bellows to inflame it; but this must be done with prudence by the people, in a way of exhortation, not by the way of exprobration; to stir up your minister to his duty, that you forget not your own. Observe, 2. The charge of an office, "Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received of the Lord, that thou fulfil it." Here, 1. A duty enjoined, to fulfil the ministry: but what is that? Negatively, not to secure the success of our ministry, we may deliver our own souls, though our people's be not delivered; the nurse is not charged with the life of the child, but with the care of the child; she shall be paid whether it live or die: nor is it absolutely to perform every part of our ministerial duty without the least deficiency; no, we rejoice in the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have done our duty: positively, to fulfil the ministry, is to perform all the parts of our duty with care and faithfulness, persevere in diligence, particularly, public preaching and private inspection. A non-preaching minister is no minister, a breathless nurse, a murderer of souls, a bell without a clapper, a cryer without a voice; yet doth not his work lie all in a pulpit, but the greatest part out of it: he is styled a watchman; for what? because he is to watch one hour with his people in a week? No, surely, but because he is to watch over them, and converse with them all the week, upon occasion. Is not the physician to visit his patient, as well as to prescribe his physic? Doth the husbandman cast his seed into the ground, and never come into his fields to see whether it comes up, and how it grows? Verily, our people are great gainers by our profitable converse with them, and we shall be gainers by them too. We may gain more experimental knowledge by an afternoon's visiting our people, than by a week's study. Note, 2. The means here directed to, for the fulfilling of the ministry, Take heed to the ministry; What doth that import? 1. Take heed to thy study; ministerial abilities are not rained down like manna upon us. The apostles did not study indeed, but one reason was, they had no time to study, they were itinerary preachers. 2. Take heed to thy doctrine, that it be the pure word of God, and delivered purely; not only in opposition to error, but in opposition to levity. 3. Take heed, that is to thy life and practice, that we may tread out the steps before our people, which they are to take towards heaven. Note, 3. The motive to stir us all up to the fulfilling our ministerial trust: we have received it: there is the importance of a special favor, and also the importance of a strict account; what we have received, we must give an account for. 2. We have received it of, or from the Lord; this implies assistance, that God has called us to it, will assist us in it: "Lo, I am with you always to the end of the world;" with you to assist, with you to succeed, with you to reward. Let Archippus then, every one in the work of Christ, take heed to the ministry which he has received of the Lord, that he fulfil it.

18 The salutation by the hand of me Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen.

Here our apostle closes his epistle with a general salutation under his own hand, intimating thereby, that he had wrote the whole with his own hands. He begs them to remember his bonds; that is, 1. To sympathize with him in his bonds. 2. To pray for him in his bonds. 3. To receive the word of God, which he had written, to them in his bonds. 4. To prepare for sufferings themselves, his bonds being but the forerunners of their bonds. Thus it is the people's duty to remember the pious ministers in their bonds. He adds, Grace be with you, wishing them an abiding interest in the special favor of God, with a multiplied increase of all spiritual blessings flowing from thence; increase of all grace to enable them to glorify God on earth, and to prepare them for glory with God in heaven. Amen.

THESSALONIANS.

This epistle to the Thessalonians, though placed last, yet is supposed to have been written first by St. Paul to this particular church; and not without probability, because the gospel was more early preached at Thessalonica, than either at Rome or Corinth as appears by the Acts of the Apostles.

Thessalonica was the chief city in Macedonia, whither St. Paul, in a vision, was directed to go and preach the gospel; accordingly he went, Acts. xvi. and xvii. and laid very early the foundation of a christian church in this city, which consisting partly of Jews, and partly of Gentiles, they were severely persecuted by both. Now the apostle, hearing what hard things the Thessalonians suffered, he writes this epistle to confirm them in the faith, and to prevent their being shaken by those persecutions.

To encourage them to perseverance in the faith, and patience under their present persecutions, he first informs them, that it was nothing strange that they should thus suffer from those Jews and Romans, who had killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and were contrary to all men; and then puts them in mind of the transcendent reward laid up for them, and the severe punishments that were prepared for their persecutors. And, lastly, He animates and encourages them, by the example of his own constancy, to perseverance in their holy profession; and concludes his epistle to them, with particular exhortations to holiness of life, and unblameableness in conversation.

CHAPTER I.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians, which is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

St. Paul begins this epistle, as he does the rest, with a very kind and gracious salutation; in which we have observable, the persons saluting, the parties saluted, and the salutation itself. Note, 1. The persons saluting, Paul, Silvanus and Timotheus: Paul only was the inspired writer of this epistle, the other two were his associates and assistants, instruments with him in converting the Thessalonians to christianity, and whom they had a deservedly great affection for; he joins them therefore with himself, as asserters and approvers of the truth contained in this his epistle, that so he might procure the greater respect to the doctrines it contained; he therefore names them with himself, Paul, Silvanus, or Silas, as he is called, Acts xvii. and Timotheus;

But why not "Paul an apostle, or Paul a servant of Jesus Christ," as in other epistles, but bare Paul only? Answer. Because his apostleship was not at all questioned by them; the Thessalonians had a seal of it in their hearts; and there were no false apostles among them to deny his apostleship, as the Galatians and other churches had. The prudent and faithful ministers of Christ know, both how and when to use those titles of honor and respect which God hath given them, and also when it is convenient to forbear the assuming of them. Note, 2. The persons saluted, The church of the Thessalonians: Thessalonica was the metropolis, or mother city of Macedonia, where a christian church was planted by the ministry of St. Paul and Silas, but with great opposition from the Jews, who forced Paul to fly to Beroea for his own safety, Acts xvii. and Jason, with others that entertained him had like to have been sacrificed in their own houses; yet there, in despite of the devil's rage, and persecutors' malice, doth God erect a glorious church, a christian church, in honor of his Son, who purchased it with his blood. Learn hence, That when and where God will gather to himself a church, no opposition, either of men or devils, shall be sufficient to hinder it; at Rome itself, nay in the court of Nero, under the very nose of that bloody tyrant, was a church collected, Phil. iv. 22. No wonder the devil struggles, when his kingdom totters; it follows, which (church) is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, that is, established in the knowledge, faith, worship, and obedience of God the Father; they were Gentiles, called off from their dumb idols, to serve the living and true God, and were distinguished from all other societies and communions whatsoever; they were in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, that is, they enjoyed a blessed union with Jesus Christ by faith, and a sweet communion and fellowship both with Father and Son, by the bond of the Spirit. Behold the high dignity and glorious privilege of the christian church, to be thus knit and united, both to the Father and the Son, by the agency of the Holy Spirit! "To the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." Note, 3. The salutation itself, "Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ." Where observe. 1. The option or blessings wished, grace and peace: grace, in scripture, signifies, first, the gracious favor of God towards us; and next, all the gifts of grace, all benefits and blessings issuing forth and flowing from thence: peace, usually signifies in the scripture language, all manner of prosperity and happiness. 2. The author and fountain from whence those blessings flow: 1. From God the Father: 2. From the Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ; intimating, That whatever spiritual grace or temporal blessing we now receive from God, is from him, not barely as a Creator, but as a Father, a gracious Father in Christ, in whom he pours out the immensity of his love upon us, and through whom he conveys all kinds of blessings unto us.

2 We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers;

3 Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father:

Note here, 1. The holy wisdom of our apostle, who being about to magnify and extol the graces of the Spirit wrought in the Thessalonians, particularly their faith, their love, their patience and hope, instead of commending them for these graces, he breaks forth into thanksgivings unto God for them; "We give thanks to God always for your work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope:" his business was not to celebrate and commend them, but to admire the special grace of God conferred upon them, and conspicuous in them. Learn hence, That it is our duty, and will be our great wisdom, so to speak of the grace of God, which we see and observe in others, as that they may not be puffed up with any conceit of their own excellencies, but see matter of praise and thanksgiving due unto God only, and nothing to themselves. Note, 2. The special and particular graces which St. Paul observed in the Thessalonians, their faith, their love, their hope, together with the evidence of the sincerity of those graces, their faith was a working faith, that is, fruitful in good works; their love was a laborious love, promoting the good of all the saints; and their hope in the Lord Jesus, rendered them patient in and under all tribulations for his sake. There is no such way to judge of the truth of the inward habits of grace in the heart, as by observing the effects and fruits of that grace in the life; the apostle concluded they had true faith, because a fruitful faith; true love, because a laborious love; a good hope in Christ, because accompanied with patience under the cross of Christ. Note, 3. St. Paul's offices and acts of love performed on the Thessalonians' behalf, namely, thanksgiving and prayer. 1. Thanksgiving, We give thanks unto God always for you all. But why, O blessed apostle, art thou so thankful for the graces of God's holy Spirit wrought in these Thessalonians? For thy own sake, no doubt, as well as theirs; he saw in them an eminent seal of his apostleship, the happy fruit and blessed effect of his ministry among them. This, O! This it was, that drew forth his very soul in thanksgivings to God. Learn, that the faithful ministers of Christ rejoice greatly at the sight and appearance of the grace of God in any person; but when they see it in their own people, as the seal of their ministry, and the blessed fruit of their own painful endeavours amongst them, this carries them out into transports of thankfulness; verily, the joy of their hearts is too big to come out at their mouths, they give thanks for such a mercy without ceasing. Yet, 2. He subjoins prayers with his praises, adds supplications to his thanksgivings, making mention of you always in my prayers; to let them know that there was still much grace wanting in them to keep them humble, as well as great grace in them to make him thankful: our prayers for grace, must be thankful prayers, or accompanied with thanksgiving; when we pray to God for more grace, we must ever be thankful for what we have received; and when we return thanks for grace received, we must be earnest and instant with God for further and fresh supplies of grace wanted. Note, 4. The frequency, yea, constancy of our apostle, in performing these duties of prayer and thanksgiving on the behalf of these Thessalonians. "We give thanks to God always for you, remembering you without ceasing in the sight of God, and our Father:" that is, as often as we appear before God our Father, we incessantly pray for you, and constantly bless God on your behalf. Where observe,

The comfortable relation in which the saints of God do approach and draw near unto God in prayer, they come to him as a Father, yea, "as their Father; in the sight of God our Father." The Holy Spirit of God vouchsafed to believers under the gospel, enables them to come before him in prayer, with a full assurance of his fatherly affection towards them, as being the sons of God, through faith in Christ Jesus, and it enables them to cry, Abba, Father; and they are very careful to improve this their relation to God, and interest in him as a Father, in prayer in behalf of themselves, and all their fellow brethren and members in Christ. Thus St. Paul here, "We give thanks for you, and remember you without ceasing, in the sight of God and our Father."

4 Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God:

5 For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake.

Observe here, 1. One special ground and reason assigned, why the apostle's heart was thus extraordinary carried out in praise and thanksgivings unto God, on the Thessalonians' behalf, and that was the knowledge of their election, "knowing your election of God," that is, knowing certainly and infallibly, by your proficiency in the forementioned christian graces of faith, love, and hope, that God had certainly chosen you out of the Gentile world, to be a church and people to himself, and that it was the good pleasure of God to gather a christian church at Thessalonica; and also he did know and believe, with a judgment of charity, that Almighty God had chosen them to eternal life also, to be a part of his church triumphant in heaven, as well as of his church militant upon earth; the preaching of the gospel having met with such visible success amongst them. It is our unquestionable duty, and we learn it from St. Paul's example, in charity to number them amongst God's chosen, in whom we see, as much as man may see, the fruits and signs of God's election. Observe, 2. The ground which St. Paul had to build his confidence upon, that the Thessalonians were a people chosen of God, and that was rational evidence, "knowing your election of God; for our gospel came to you not in word only, but in power." Where note, The piety and prudence of St. Paul's charity, it was not weakly grounded or credulous, but guided by reasonable evidence; "Charity hopeth all things," that is, all things that it hath good ground to hope, but nothing more than what probable evidence may induce it to hope. St. Paul, when he saw the apostasy of Hymenæas and Alexander into error and vice, without censoriousness and uncharitableness, pronounces that they had "made shipwreck of the faith." 1 Tim. 1. 20. For he had sufficient reason to believe, there could be no faith where there was no holiness. There are a generation of men amongst us, who brand the ministers of God with censoriousness, and rash judging the present state of men, though they judge by their lives and actions; they would have us hope well concerning them, against hope, and judge quite contrary to rational evidence; we must believe them to have faith, when they have no knowledge; that they are right penitents, and sorrowful for their sins, when they make a sport of sin; that their hearts are chaste, when their mouths foam out nothing but filthiness; but let them know, we dare not bring a curse upon ourselves by calling good evil, and evil good: our charity though not causelessly suspicious, yet neither is it foolishly blind. Observe, 3. The particular and special evidence which the apostle had of the Thessalonians' election, and that was the great and gracious success of his ministry amongst them. Our gospel came—But how our gospel? Not as if he were the author of it, but the dispenser only; not our gospel by original revelation, but by ministerial dispensation only. But how did the gospel come amongst the Thessalonians? "Not in word only" sounding in the ear, or reaching and resting in the understanding only, as a light to gaze upon; but in power, that is, accompanied then with the power of miracles, now with a convincing, terrifying, humbling, renewing, and reforming power. It follows, "and in the Holy Ghost;" that is, the preaching of the word was at that time attended, as with a mighty power of miracles, so with an extraordinary effusion and pouring out the Holy Ghost upon them that heard it, prevailing upon them to embrace it, and to submit themselves unto it. With this miraculous power of the Holy Ghost was the preaching of the word accompanied then, with an enlightening, quickening, regenerating, and sanctifying power now; the ministry of the word is the great instrument in the hand of the Spirit, for the conversion of sinners, for the edification of saints, and for the salvation of both. Again, the apostle's ministration came unto them in much assurance, that is, with a full conviction both to them and him; to them, with an evident conviction of the truth of his doctrine; and to him, it was a full persuasion, yea, a firm assurance, that God had chosen them to be a church and special people to himself. And lastly, As to his own conduct and conversation amongst them, he appeals to them, and to their own knowledge, whether it was not answerable to the doctrine delivered by him; "Ye know what manner of men we were amongst you for your sake." Happy is it when the pious and prudent conversation of a minister amongst his people, is, and has been such, that upon a fit occasion, he can and dare appeal to God and them as witnesses and observers of it; "Ye know what we were among you; ye are witnesses and God also, how holily, and justly, and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you," chap. ii. 10. An heterodox conversation will carry an orthodox preacher to hell; there is a preaching life, as well as a preaching doctrine; if religion be taught by the first, and irreligion by the latter, we sadly disappoint the end of what is spoken; though like a cracked bell, we may be instrumental to ring others to heaven, yet for ourselves there is no remedy, but to the fire we must go, either for our refining, or for our condemnation. The throne and the pulpit, above all places, call for holiness; the prince and the preacher, above all persons, are most accountable to God for their example; "Ye know what manner of men we were among you."

6 And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost;

7 So that ye were ensamples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia;

11 H

In these words our apostle gives us another probable evidence, that the Thessalonians were undoubtedly chosen of God, namely, because they were very active and operative christians; they did in their life and practice conform themselves to that excellent pattern and example held forth unto them by their preachers. "Ye became followers of us." Where note, That there ought to be something worthy of imitation in the lives of ministers, something which their people may safely follow; and it is the people's duty, not only to lend an ear to their doctrine, but an eye to their pious conversation. It is added, "Followers of us and the Lord:" followers of Christ absolutely as an unerring pattern; of his ministers conditionally, so far as they followed Christ; but "followers of the Lord" here, seems to import their following of him in his sufferings and afflictions, as appears by the next words, "Having received the word with much affliction." Such as are sincere and serious christians, are followers of Christ in his sufferings, as well as in his example: they follow him in the sharp and thorny path of affliction, in which he went before them; they are willing to bear his cross, as well as to wear his crown; to suffer for him as well as to be glorified with him. Observe next, The particular instance wherein the Thessalonians became followers of the apostles; it was this, that they preached the word to them with great desire, and delight, and joy, though at the same time they endured a great "fight of afflictions," contending with the opposition both of men and devils, in preaching the word unto them: in like manner did they "receive the word with much affliction," and adhere to it in the midst of persecution; and all this accompanied with such inward joy, as none but the Holy Ghost could be the author of in them: "Ye received the word with much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost." Learn hence, That upon the preaching of the word, to have an heart open to "receive it, to receive it with affliction, with much affliction," and yet with joy and rejoicing, with a cheerful spirit, and such a joy as the Holy Spirit of God is the author and producer of, is a good evidence, that a person is chosen of God, and has a title to the everlasting inheritance. Observe farther, Our apostle, in a just and deserved commendation of these Thessalonians, tells them to their great and singular honor, that as they were followers of them (the apostles) in sufferings, in patience, and cheerfulness; so they were themselves living patterns, and lively ensamples of courage and constancy under their sufferings, to all the neighbouring churches in Macedonia and Achaia. Then is the grace of God received by us, a mark and evidence of our election of God, when we have advanced to such a considerable proficiency and growth in it, as to become patterns and examples of piety to all that are round about us. Thus the Thessalonians here, "Ye are become ensamples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia."

8 For from you sounded out the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place your faith to God-ward is spread abroad; so that we need not to speak any thing.

9 For they themselves show of us, what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God;

Still our apostle proceeds in a copious commendation of these Thessalonians, or rather in a thankful admiration of the grace of God shining in them; he tells them, and that without flattery, that the fame and report of their graces was spread abroad far and near, insomuch that the foreign churches amongst whom he conversed, were able to give him a perfect account how the apostles' entrance amongst them at Thessalonica was; though not pompous, yet very prosperous, strangely succeeded and singularly blessed; to the turning of them from dead idols to serve the living and true God. Learn, That where true grace is rooted in the heart, though it be not immediately seen, yet it cannot long be hid, but it will discover itself in the genuine fruits and vital effects of it, to the deserved admiration, and wished for imitation of all beholders whatsoever: "From you sounded forth the word of the Lord, &c." And how you turned from idols, that is, how readily and speedily, how sincerely and heartily you turned from idolatry, your former idolatry, in which you had been educated and brought up; yet upon the preaching of our gospel, ye left it, and turned with indignation from it, to serve God, the living God, so called in opposition to their dead and dumb idols; and the true God, in opposition to their false gods. These words of the apostle teach us how to expound those words of our Saviour, John xvii. 3. "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God." Teaching us that the Father is called the only true God, not in opposition to Jesus Christ, as the Socinians would insinuate, but in opposition to idols and false gods only. Now from this effect, which the gospel had upon the Thessalonians, to turn them from idols to serve the living God, we learn, That as every man naturally bears an idol in his heart, that is, sets up something there in God's stead, which attracts and draws off the chief of his affections from God; so wherever the gospel is heartily received and entertained, there will be an abandoning of, and turning from whatsoever did usurp God's throne in the soul, and the person hereafter will only love and serve the living and true God: "Ye turned from idols to serve the living and true God."

10 And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come.

Here the apostle produces a farther evidence of these Thessalonians' conversion, namely, that they did not only turn from idols to serve God the Father, but did also believe in Jesus Christ his only son: this act of faith is expressed by waiting, they "waited for his Son from heaven," that is, by faith they expected that Christ, whom the apostle had preached to them, and was gone to heaven, would certainly come again from thence, to deliver his redeemed ones "from the wrath to come," that is, from the punishment and vengeance eternally due unto them for sin. And the ground of this their expectation was, Christ's resurrection from the dead; "to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead" Note here, 1. A description, an heart-affecting, yea, a soul-affecting description of that wrath which doth await every wicked and impenitent sinner; it is a wrath to come; after thousands, yea, millions of years, that sinners have lain under it; still it is a wrath to come; and they are as far from being delivered from it, as the first hour they fell under it. Note, 2. That Jesus Christ delivered up himself to death, that he might be a Saviour and deliverer of his people from this wrath; let it break forth when it will, not a drop of it shall ever fall upon any one of them. Note, 3. That believers may warrantably expect deliverance by Christ from this wrath, seeing God has raised him from the dead. Note, 4. Therefore, may and ought they to wait and wish, to look, and long for his coming from heaven, when deliverance from wrath will be perfected and completed.

CHAPTER II.

The design and scope of the apostle, in the chapter now before us, is, to acquaint the Thessalonians with the sincerity and success of his ministry amongst them; as also to put them in remembrance of his meek deportment toward them, even as a nurse among her children: and from the gracious success which God had given him in his ministerial services for them, he concludes that these his converts to christianity, the Thessalonians, would certainly be his joy and crown of rejoicing, in the day of the Lord Jesus.

FOR yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain;

Observe here, How our apostle did and durst appeal to the Thessalonians themselves as touching the sincerity and success of his public ministry among them: "Ye yourselves know." It is not sufficient to a minister's comfort, that he be well reported of amongst strangers, for his zeal and diligence, for his sincerity and faithfulness, unless he can and dare appeal to the consciences of his own people, and call them to vouch and bear witness to his integrity: "Ye yourselves know that our entrance in unto you, was not in vain. Our entrance in unto you;" that is, our first preaching amongst you "was not in vain," that is, say some, it was not in vain in the matter, we did not preach about vain, useless and unprofitable niceties and speculations; but our preaching was substantial, sound and solid; it was not vain in the manner, say others; it was not undertaken rashly, and without a call, nor managed in a slight and vain manner; but the word in vain here, seems to point at these two things; 1. That it did not want power and energy, but had the demonstration of divine assistance to confirm them in the faith that heard it, and also those that preached it, in expectation of success. 2. "It was not in vain" that is, it did not want fruit, it was not without a great and gracious success: for the word vain, when it is applied to the message which the ministers of God bring, signifies the not accomplishing the great ends for which it was designed. Isa. lv 11. "The word that goeth out of my mouth, shall not return unto me in vain," but prosper, &c. Hence learn, That where a minister is regularly called to, and faithfully discharges his duty amongst a people, both by public preaching and private instruction, his labors seldom, if ever, want fruit, in some degree or measure, either sooner or later, either manifest or secret, either for conversion or edification. We have the promise of Christ's presence with us, Matt. xxviii. 20. And if the fault be not ours, we shall certainly experience it; both the presence of his power to strengthen us, and the presence of his gracious Spirit to succeed us. Possibly we do not see any visible success at present; but this may comfort us, there is more good done by the ministry of the word than we are aware of; and if we reap not the fruit of the seed we sow, they who come after us may; but if neither they nor we reap fruit, our ministry shall not be in vain, with reference to ourselves; yet shall we be glorious, though Israel be not gathered. But oh! that our people might share in that glory with us, and also shine as the stars, for ever and ever! God grant we may never be called forth by Christ to give a judicial testimony against any of them at the bar of God, for not "believing our report."

2 But even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated, as ye know, at Philippi, we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much contention.

Here St. Paul discovers to the Thessalonians the great difficulties and dangers which he broke through at his first entrance amongst them to preach the gospel: he acquaints them with the reproach and disgrace he underwent at their neighbouring city, Philippi, and the sufferings there endured for the gospel, which are recorded, Acts xxi. 23. But nothing of that nature could discourage him, but that he rather waxed more bold in spirit, resolving to preach the gospel of God, though with much contention and opposition from the unbelieving Jews. Where mark, That the apostle calls his boldness, a boldness in God, because a boldness for God, and from God; it was not barely the fruit of a natural courage, but it was a zealous boldness in the cause of God, and proved a convincing, as well as a courageous boldness; it is one necessary requisite and qualification in the ministers of God, in order to the rendering their ministry fruitful and successful; that a wise, humble, zealous and convincing boldness be found with them in their delivering the truths of God unto their people: "We were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God."

3 For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile:

4 But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak, not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

Here our apostle assigns a subordinate reason why his preaching was so successful amongst the Thessalonians; namely, because it was very sincere: there was both sincerity in the doctrine preached, and also in the preacher of that doctrine. Where note, 1. St. Paul calls his preaching an exhortation; doubtless because a great part of his preaching was, as ours ought to be, applicatory and exhortatory, earnestly and affectionately exciting the hearers to cleave unto the truths, whether doctrinal or practical, delivered to them. Note, 2. How St. Paul removes from himself the opposites of sincerity, some of which point at the sincerity of the doctrine preached by him; it was not of deceit, or of ensnaring and seducing error, not suited to the corrupt opinions and wicked inclinations of men; nor of uncleanness, nothing that he either preached or practised did countenance and encourage men in their filthy lusts, as did the false preaching of the false apostles, and the Gnostics: Nor in guile; this points at the sincerity of his own heart in preaching, his exhortation was not in guile; that is, he did not seek himself, under a pretence of acting for God and his glory, nor propound his own worldly advantage as his ultimate end. Learn hence, It is the duty of Christ's ministers, not only to preach the pure word of God, but to preach it purely, in simplicity of heart, and with a single eye at God's glory, without looking at, or having any regard unto base, sinister ends, or bye respects. Note, 3. That St. Paul having vindicated his ministry from all suspicion of insincerity, next assures them of his great uprightness in all his ministerial performances, making it his chief design to approve himself unto God, and to be approved of him, not in the least regarding to please men, but only in subordination to God. Note, 4. The arguments or motives inclining him thus, in much sincerity, to approve himself to God in all his ministerial services; namely, 1. The consideration of that high favor and honorable trust which he had received from God: "We were allowed of God, to be put in trust with the gospel;" God did fit him for this trust, and then entrusted him with it, and he looked upon both as a favor and honor from God. 2. The consideration of God's omniscieny and all-seeing eye, who trieth our hearts. The apostle well knew that Almighty God was both a witness of his doctrine and conversation, and also privy to his intentions and purposes, his aim and end, as being a God that searcheth the heart; therefore he so preached, not as pleasing men but God. Learn from both, That nothing doth more effectually constrain the ministers of Christ to the faithful discharge of their whole duty, than the consideration of the honor and weight of that trust which God hath conferred on them, and the remembrance that the eye of an all-seeing and heart-searching God is both upon and within them also; We so speak, being put in trust with the gospel by God, who trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness:

6 Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ.

Still our apostle sees fit to proceed in avouching his own sincerity in preaching the gospel, and disowning all flattery, covetousness, and vain-glory, to have any influence upon him in the discharge of his ministerial trust. First, He used not flattering words, that is, speeches fitted to gratify the lusts and honors of men, or for gaining their favor, or courting their good opinion. Flattery in any is odious, in a minister it is monstrous; both because spiritual men ought to be most plain hearted, and also because flattery about spiritual things is most fatal and pernicious, both to the giver and receiver. Secondly, He used not a cloke of covetousness, that is, he had no covetous design in his ministry; his great end, in that administration, was not worldly, or outward advantage to himself; and because a covetous design is secret, and man cannot judge of it, he appeals solemnly to God, that searcheth the heart, as a witness of his freedom from that design; "I used no flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness: God is witness;" as if he had said, "Had I used flattering words, you might witness it, but I could have worn a cloke of covetousness so closely, that you could not have seen it, but God could; he can judge through the darkest cloud, and see through the thickest cloke or covering; but I appeal to him, whether I have put on such a cloke, or no." An oath then is lawful to a christian; he may solemnly appeal to God, and call him to witness the truth of what he speaks, in and upon a just and great occasion; thus St. Paul here by oath, purges himself from covetousness of spirit. Thirdly, He purges himself from all ostentation and vain-glory; he tells them plainly, he did not hunt after applause from others, nor sought so much as due respect in a fitting maintenance from themselves, though herein he assures them he did remit of his right; seeing as an apostle of Christ, he might have been burdensome, that is, chargeable to them, by exacting maintenance from them. Learn, 1. Though every man may (much more a minister) have a due respect to his own honor and just reputation, yet to hunt after respect and esteem, and to seek it with the full bent of our desires, doth savor of vanity and vain-glory. Learn, 2. Though the ministers of the gospel have an undoubted right to an honorable maintenance, yet it may be a pious prudence in them, at a particular time, to remit their right; and when they do so, with an eye at the glory of God, and the advantage of the gospel, God will recompense it to them.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children:

8 So, being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us.

St. Paul having cleared himself, and his ministry, in the foregoing verses, from the charge and imputation of those foul vices of flattery, fraud, and covetousness, which the false teachers were guilty of; he next gives an account of his holy and humble, meek and gentle, courteous and affable behaviour amongst them, performing all duties towards them from a principle of tender love, even such as is found in a nurse to her babe, which makes her stoop to the meanest offices for it; "We are gentle among you as a nurse," not an hired nurse, but a mother-nurse, who takes nothing for nursing, who bestows all her time and pains in nursing, who draws forth her breasts, and gives down her milk with pleasure to her nursery, lodging it in her bosom, carrying it in her arms, with all possible demonstrations of a tender affection towards it, especially bearing with it, in its frowardness and manifold infirmities: intimating to us, with what tenderness of affection a minister should be devoted to his people.

ple, bearing with them, and forbearing of them, and exercising all that indulgence towards them, which may mutually endear them to each other. Observe farther, Our apostle having resembled himself in general, to a nurse cherishing her children, next instances, in particular, wherein he stood ready to express, like a nurse, his indulgent care over them. Thus, 1. As the nursing mother, if she be but a short-time absent from her children, doth most vehemently long to see them, and draws forth her breast towards them with the utmost desire and delight: in like manner, was our now absent apostle most affectionately desirous of seeing and enjoying his beloved Thessalonians. 2. As the nursing mother, when she gets to the child, with unspeakable delight, feeds it with her own blood, concocted and turned into milk; so was the apostle desirous to impart, not the gospel only, but his own soul, that is, his life; implying how ready he was to seal the gospel with his blood, and to confirm the Thessalonians in the faith of Christ. 3. As the moving, impelling, and impulsive cause of the nurse's indulgent care and indefatigable pains, is pure love, motherly affection, and no hope of gain; so was likewise the case of St. Paul here towards these Thessalonians; "We were willing to impart unto you our own souls, because ye were dear unto us." Learn hence, That there is no stronger love, nor more endeared affection between any relations upon earth, than between those ministers of Christ and their beloved people whom they have been instrumental to convert to God.

9 For ye remember, brethren, our labor and travail: for laboring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God.

10 Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily, and justly, and unblameably, we behaved ourselves among you that believe:

Notwithstanding our apostle was free, wholly free, from all shadow and appearance of covetousness in the whole course of his ministry, yet it may seem as if some persons (probably the false apostles) did, though with the highest injustice charge him with it; accordingly to clear himself from that imputation, here he tells the Thessalonians, he labored night and day in the business of his calling; making tents to maintain himself, that so he might not be chargeable or burdensome to any of them; or any ways retard or hinder the success of the gospel amongst them; "laboring night and day, that we might not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God freely." Yet observe, This was only a case of necessity; for at other times, and in other places, we find our apostle asserting his own right, and God's appointment, that every one that preacheth the gospel, should live of the gospel. 1 Cor. ix. 14. Next our apostle calls upon them to remember his labor and travail, that is, his pains and diligence in preaching the gospel; the words signify labor unto weariness, and labor after weariness, his painfulness, both in his preaching, and in his secular calling; and from his calling upon the Thessalonians to remember this, he learns us this lesson of instruction, namely, that it is the standing duty of a people to keep in their constant remembrance of the great labor and pains which the faithful ministers of Christ do take amongst them, that so they may be duly thankful, both to God, and them, and put a just value upon that spiritual good, which, at any time, they have experienced and received from them; Remember, brethren, our labor, and travail. Observe again, Having asserted his laboriousness in preaching to them, he next puts them in remembrance of his exemplariness in conversation amongst them, how holily, justly, and unblameably we behaved ourselves amongst you; that is, performing his duty with great integrity and uprightness towards God and man, so that none justly could blame him for neglect amongst them; and for the truth of this, he appeals to God as a judge, and themselves as witnesses; Ye are witnesses, and God also. Learn hence, That it is a great happiness and unspeakable consolation, both to ministers and people, when the duties of religion relating to both tables, are performed with such exactness that they can and dare appeal to one another, as to their holy and unblameable conversation, and to God himself, as to the purity of their aim, and sincerity of intention.

(No. 60.)

11 As ye know, how we exhorted and comforted, and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, 12 That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

Observe, That still our apostle appeals to their own consciences for his good behaviour amongst them: Ye know: happy minister, that has a throne in the consciences of his people, unto which he can and dare, at all times, appeal, for the clearing of his innocency and integrity, in and before the face of the whole world! Observe next, That having compared himself to a nurse before, he resembles himself to a father now, we exhort you as a father doth his children; as it is the office of a father to direct and instruct, to counsel and exhort his children, so the apostle did exhort, comfort, and charge the Thessalonians, that they be strictly conscientious in the faithful discharge of their whole duty, both to God and man, and patient under all, and all manner of trials and afflictions whatsoever, which they did, or might meet with, in the way of well doing. Where note, That a mixture of meekness and gentleness, accompanied with authority and gravity, is an excellent composition in the ministers of the gospel: St. Paul having shown, that, for gentleness, he was a nursing mother, declareth here, that for authority and gravity, he was an instructing father. Observe lastly, The great duty which he did direct them in, and exhort them to, namely, to walk worthy of God, who had called them unto his kingdom and glory. Note here, 1. The duty exhorted unto, namely, to walk worthy of God: How so? Not with a worthiness of merit, but with a worthiness of meekness, to walk as becomes them who profess the name of God, who bear the image of God, answerable to the high and holy privileges received from God. Note, 2. The reason or argument enforcing the duty, he hath called you to his kingdom and glory, that is, to grace; and by grace here to glory hereafter; such as are called to the one, are called to both; grace is a certain pledge and earnest of glory, a low degree of glory, and glory the highest degree of grace; such as walk worthy of God now, shall live with him, ere long, to eternal ages.

13 For this cause also, thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God, which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth) the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe:*

14 For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God, which in Judea are in Christ Jesus; for ye have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews:

Our apostle's great design, in this chapter, being to set forth the wonderful success which the preaching of the gospel had among the Thessalonians, and also to assign the causes of that success, he having, in the former verses, given the reason of this success on his own part, namely, his sincerity in preaching it, and his pious conversation in all things suitable to it; now he comes to show the reason on their part, with all thankfulness to Almighty God for the same: first, they heard it; secondly, they received it: thirdly, they examined it, and found it no fable, but the word of God, and, as such, entertained it, with a divine faith; fourthly, the word thus received did work with a mighty power and efficacy in them that believed, that is, was accompanied with miracles, and miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit, then to confirm them in the faith of what they did believe; and the word has also now an efficacious energy and divine efficacy accompanying it in the hearts of believers, working upon the will, not in a way of compulsion, but in a way congruous to the nature and liberty of the will, by a divine influx, Tollendo resistentiam, non voluntatis libertatem, (as the great St. Austin speaks.) Observe next, St. Paul farther proves the efficacious success which the word had amongst the Thessalonians, from their constancy and patience under the sharpest sufferings for the word's sake; "Ye have suffered like things of your own countrymen:" as if he had said, "You of the christian church in Thessalonica, have shown yourselves like to the christian churches in Judea, in patient suffering persecution from your friends and kinsfolks, from your countrymen and fellow-citizens, as they did from the unbelieving Jews." Note, thence, That where the word is efficaciously received, it makes the embracer of it endure the hardest trials and sufferings rather than renounce it. Note, 2. That there neither is, nor can be, any better evidence that the word of God is effectually received, than when it enables christians to bear afflictions, and undergo persecutions with christian courage and holy resolution; Ye have suffered like things: but of whom? Of your own countrymen at Thessalonica, as the churches in Judea did of the Jews. Learn thence, That such is the fury of a persecuting spirit, that when men are judicially given up of God unto it, they will break all bonds, both natural, civil, and religious, and turn barbarous and savage, like wolves and tigers, towards those of their own flesh, who dare not deny the truth, which they persecute and oppose. Here the churches in Judea and Thessalonica were persecuted alike by their own countrymen, "Ye have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews."

15 Who both killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men:

16 Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles, that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.

Our apostle's design being to encourage the Thessalonians to patience and constancy under their persecutions for christianity, he acquaints them, that they did not walk alone in this thorny path, but that Jesus Christ, the prophets and apostles, went before them, and every step they took in it, was up to the knees in blood; They killed the Lord Jesus, &c. Where observe, The bitter and bloody persecution which the Jews were guilty of, they killed the Lord Jesus, and before him their own prophets, called their own because of their own nation, and sent with a peculiar message to them; and now they persecuted, banished and drove away St. Paul, and the rest of the apostles: they pleased not God; that is, they highly displeased him, dreadfully provoked him, they were haters of God, hateful to him, now hated of him, and lastly rejected by him; contrary to all men, that is, to the common interest of all men, by endeavouring to obstruct the preaching of the gospel, which bringeth salvation to all men; forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles, that is, to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, and consequently obstructing what in them lay, the salvation almost of all the world; filling up the measure of their sins, till at last, the wrath of God came upon them to the uttermost, in their judicial obduration, and the final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; after which the Jews have been no more a people, but scattered abroad through the face of the earth. From the whole, learn, 1. That it is a singular support to suffering saints, to consider, that Christ and his apostles suffered before them; and by his sufferings, has sanctified a state of affliction and persecution to them. Learn, 2. That a spirit of persecution seems oftentimes to run in the blood, and passes from parent to child, through many generations. Persecution became, as it were hereditary, and, in a sort, transient from one generation to another among the Jews; they killed Christ, stoned the prophets, and persecuted the apostles. Note, 3. How St. Paul ranks and reckons them that are enemies to the preaching of the gospel, with the obstinate shedders of Christ's blood; they are enrolled amongst the capital enemies of mankind; They killed the Lord of life, forbidding us to preach to the Gentiles; such as are enemies to preaching, are enemies to the souls of men. Object. But what need so much preaching amongst us, who are converted from heathenism to christianity? Ans. It is one thing to be converted from heathenism to christianity, and another thing to be converted from sin to God. Object. But we have the bible for that end, and can make use of that. Ans. Observe, it, and you will find, that such as are no friends to the pulpit, are usually none of the best friends to the Bible; follow them to their families, how doth the Bible lie by as a neglected book amongst them; and it must be a large charity, that can judge it is conscientiously used in the closet, when it is carelessly neglected in the family.

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time, in presence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire.

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you (even I Paul) once and again; but satan hindered us.

Observe here, That St. Paul having all along, in the chapter before us, compared himself to a tender father, and a nursing mother, for his affectionate love unto, and his solicitous concern for, these christian converts; he doth in the words before us, declare, that this constrained absence from them, occasioned him no less grief than that of a tender father, when bereft of his beloved children; or that of an indulgent mother, when the child she loves as her own soul, is taken violently from her. We, brethren, being taken from you; the words intimate such a separation as death makes between a father and a child, which rends the parent's heart in sunder, and is like cutting off a limb or member from his body, exquisitely painful; intimating, that the enforced absence of a pastor from his beloved people though but for a short season, is very afflictive. Ah! How heart rending then is a total and final separation from each other, occasioned either by natural or civil death! Observe, 2. St. Paul tells them, that though persecutors had deprived them of his bodily presence, yet not of his heart, for though not in body, yet in mind he was present with them; minister and people, like true lovers, are present with each other in soul, when separated in body. It is a singular comfort to christians under persecution, that their enemies can neither deprive them of the presence of God, nor the prayers of their faithful ministers; their prayers may meet, when their persons are distant, and they may be present in spirit, in heart and affection, when at the ends of the earth. Observe, 3. How he expresses his desire and endeavour, his fervent purpose, and fixed resolution to come unto them, to see their face, to refresh them, and be refreshed by them: "I endeavoured abundantly to see your face, but satan hindered;" that is, his instruments, persecutors, lay in wait for him, on the one hand, and caused some dissensions in other churches, which detained him from coming to them; on the other hand, satan hindered. Learn thence, that such as obstruct the preaching and propagating of the gospel, and persecute the promoters of it, are satan's instruments and ministers. 2. That such as do satan's work, it is fit they should bear his name. Thus Rev. ii. 13. "The devil shall cast some of you into prison," that is, his servants: it is fit that master and servant should have both one name.

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

20 For ye are our glory and joy.

Here, in the close of the chapter, St. Paul acquaints the Thessalonians with the true reason why he had such an endearing affection for them, and such a fervent desire to be present with them, they were his hope, his joy, his crown of rejoicing; that is, they were then the cause of his hope, not the ground and foundation of his hope; that Christ alone was; but their conversion by his ministry was, in concurrence with other things, a good ground of hope concerning his own salvation; ye are now my hope, my joy, and crown of rejoicing. Where note, A very remarkable gradation in the words; he calls them his hope, his joy, and his crown of rejoicing. His hope, that is, the matter of his hope, that they shall be saved; his joy, that is the occasion of his joy, in their conversion by his ministry; and his crown of rejoicing in Christ's presence at his coming, that is, the fruit and success of his ministry amongst them, would add to his crown, and redound to his glory in the day of Christ. Learn hence, 1. That there are degrees of glory in heaven, probably according to the measures and degrees of service we have done for God on earth; there is, no doubt, an equality of glory there, as to the essentials, but not with respect to the accidentals; besides the joy and satisfaction which the ministers of Christ are partakers of in heaven, in common with other glorified saints, they have an additional joy and glory from the success of their pious and painful labors, which God has crowned with the conversion and edification of many souls. Lord! Who would not study, spend and be spent in the service of such a master? Is it not worth all our labor and sufferings, to appear in the presence of Christ, accompanied with all those souls whom we have instrumentally either brought home, or built up in the most holy faith, either converted, comforted, or confirmed in the way to heaven? To hear one spiritual child say, "Lord, this is the instrument by whom I believed;" another, "This is the minister by whom I was established;" a third, "This is he that quickened me by his example, and provoked me to love, and to good works: O blessed be God that I ever saw his face, and heard his voice!" But, Lord, what will it be to hear thy blessed voice saying to us, "Well done good and faithful servants, enter into the joy of me your Lord:" I have kept an exact account of all your fervent prayers for your people, of all your instructive and persuasive sermons, of all your sighs and groans poured forth before me, on behalf of those whom ye would have persuaded to be happy but could not! Every tear from your eye, and drop of sweat from your face, shall now meet with an eternal recompence: you shall now find me, according to my promise, not unrighteous to forget your work and labor of love." O what a master do the ministers of Christ serve! Who would not sacrifice all that is dear for him, who has 'the assurance of such an exceeding and eternal weight of glory from him? Learn, 2. That the saints of God in heaven will know one another there: why else doth St. Paul here comfort himself, that these Thessalonians, whom he converted to Christ, would be his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ? Surely, this must needs suppose and imply his distinct knowledge of them in that day; if he did not know them, how could he rejoice in them? Doubtless we may allow in that state all that knowledge which is accumulative and perfective, whatever may heighten our felicity, and increase our satisfaction, as this must needs be allowed to do. Lord, make us faithful to the death, faithful to thee, faithful to our own souls, faithful to our people; and then, as they are now our hope and joy, so will they be our crown of rejoicing in the presence of the Lord Jesus at his coming. Amen.

CHAPTER III.

The design of our apostle in this, is the same with that of the foregoing chapter, namely, to give the Thessalonians the highest assurance, possible of his affectionate regard unto them, of his solicitous care and concern for them, and of his utmost endeavours to confirm and settle them in the faith of Christ, what afflictions and persecutions soever it might expose them to; and accordingly, he thus bespeaks them:

WHEREFORE, when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone,

2 And sent Timotheus our brother, and minister of God, and our fellow-laborer in the gospel of Christ, to establish you, and to comfort you concerning your faith;

At the latter end of the foregoing chapter, St. Paul acquainted the Thessalonians with his desires and intentions to come once and again unto them, but was always providentially hindered. Now here he gives them to understand, that such was the fervor of his affection towards them, that although he could not come, yet he could not forbear to send to them, though he left himself alone, preferring their necessity before his own convenience: When we could no longer forbear; that is, "When I could no longer satisfy myself without knowing your state and condition, I chose, though with much inconvenience to myself, rather to be left at Athens alone, in the midst of my afflictions and tribulations, than that you should be longer destitute of one to supply my absence, in order to your confirmation and comfort." See here a special instance of ministerial love and affection in St. Paul, preferring the church's good before his own comfort, and postponing his own convenience to their necessity; though Timothy's company was very desirable, very necessary and useful for him, yet he denies himself to serve them; We thought it good to be left at Athens alone. Observe, 2. The person sent by him Timothy, with his deserved character, and commendation, a brother, that is, a christian, a believer, a brother in Christ: a minister of God, that is, a preacher of the gospel; his fellow-laborer, or one that joined heart and hand with him in the preaching of the gospel from place to place. See here, a special instance of St. Paul's apostolical care for the churches of Christ, when he could not visit them in person, he sends to them, not any one he could come at, but the fittest he could get, one who was most likely, through God's assistance and blessing, to carry on the work he was sent about: I sent you Timotheus my brother. Observe, 3. The great end for which he was sent unto them; it was to confirm them, and to comfort them; to confirm them in the faith of Christ, and to comfort them under all their sufferings for the sake of Christ. The strongest faith needs confirmation and establishment; and it is the minister's duty, in trying times especially, to guard his people's faith upon the stability whereof their strength and safety doth depend.

3 That no man should be moved by these afflictions; for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto.

As if the apostle had said, one great end why I have sent Timothy among you, is this, lest either upon the account of your own afflictions, or my sufferings, you should be moved from your steadfastness, either drawn away by fraud and flattery, or driven away by force and terror?" that no man be moved by these afflictions. Observe also, The argument to confirm them in the faith, amidst all their sufferings and afflictions, and that is drawn from the pleasure and purpose, the ordination and appointment of God, concerning their afflictions; Ye yourselves know, that we are thereunto appointed. Learn hence, 1. That the best of saints are subject to be moved by their afflictions. 2. That it is the high commendation of a christian, not to stir or be moved from his steadfastness by the heaviest shock of affliction that may fall upon him? That no man be moved by these afflictions. Some render the word appointed, set as a mark to be shot at; some saints, with holy Job, are set on purpose as a mark for the arrow of affliction to be levelled at, yet then are they to keep their ground, and stand immovable; we honor God abundantly, when we are immoveable in our active obedience; and we glorify him eminently, when we are immoveable in our passive obedience; when we stand to it in the midst of sufferings, and are no more moved either by cowardice or impatience, than a post that is shot at. This is the glory of a christian, and his great duty, and it is the glory of God, and his certain due. Learn, 3. That believers are under a divine appointment from God himself, to undergo trouble and affliction. The ultimate destination of believers is to rest. God hath not appointed them unto wrath, but to obtain salvation: but the intermediate destination of them is to trouble and affliction, in order unto rest, and to prepare them for that rest. Seeing then that afflictions are appointed to us, and we appointed to them, seeing there is a decree of God concerning them, a decree as to the matter of them, as to the manner of them, as to the measure of them, as to the time of them, when they shall commence, how far they shall advance, how long they shall continue, seeing every thing in affliction is under an appointment; how meek and humble, how patient and submissive ought the christian's spirit to be under them? And with what steadiness of expectation may and ought he to look up to heaven for a sanctified use and improvement of them? Let no man be moved by afflictions, knowing we are appointed thereunto.

4 For verily, when we were with you, we told you before that we should suffer tribulation; even as it came to pass, and ye know.

Our apostle informed the Thessalonians in the foregoing verse, with the purpose and decree of God concerning the afflictions which were before them; in this verse he appeals to themselves, as to his own sincerity, in acquainting them, at their first conversion, that they must, through many tribulations, enter into the kingdom of God, and it came to pass accordingly; when we were with you, says the apostle, we told you before it came to pass, that we should suffer tribulation, and it shortly after came to pass as we told you. Learn hence, That it is the duty of the ministers of Christ to give timely warning of, and to acquaint young converts early with, the pleasure of God, to exercise all that belong to him with the cross, with variety of afflictions, trials, and sufferings, before they come, that so they may not stumble, nor be offended at them when they come. The sincerity of our apostle is here very remarkable; when he came first to preach the gospel at Thessalonica, he did not flatter them with the expectation of an earthly paradise of pleasure, but told them plainly, that christianity had a cross attending it, that a suffering hour would come, and they must expect it; when we were with you, we told you that we should suffer tribulation. Learn, 2. That when christians have had timely notice from the ministers of God, and from the word of God, of approaching trials and troubles, before they come, they ought to fore-arm themselves, and not to faint or sink under them when they come, much less to forsake religion because of them, but to continue steadfast, knowing that the heavier the cross is, the weightier will their crown be; for affliction, there is glory; for light affliction, a weight of glory, and for light affliction, which is but for a moment, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17.

5 For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labor be in vain.

6 But now, when Timotheus came from you unto us, and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity, and that ye have good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly to see us, as we also to see you:

Observe here, 1. One special end why St. Paul sent Timothy to Thessalonica, it was to know their faith, that is, their constancy in the faith; for he had a fear upon him lest satan the tempter had taken occasion; from the present persecution they were under to turn them from christianity; and that by their yielding to his temptation, and apostatizing from the faith, his labor, in the gospel had been in vain amongst them. Here note, That the saints' persecutions are called temptations, and ascribed to satan the tempter, who, by his ministers and instruments, endeavours to hinder the progress of the gospel, and by persecutions, to terrify and turn men from the profession of it. Note farther, That there is an holy jealousy in the minds of the faithful ministers of Christ, who, though they hope the best, yet are apt to fear the worst, with reference to the poor people, lest they should run in vain, and labor in vain amongst them; for though their labor shall not be in vain, with respect to themselves, their reward is with the Lord; (the careful nurse shall be paid, though the child dies at the breast;) yet with respect to their people, they may be in vain, yea worse, for a testimony against them, St. Mark vi. 11. Observe, 2. How happily the apostle's fear was prevented, touching these Thessalonians, by the return of Timothy, and the good tidings which he carried along with him, of the steadfastness of their faith, of the fervency of their charity, of their particular respect to himself, having always remembrance of him in their prayers, and making a respective mention of his ministerial labors and diligence, and this always when they had occasion to speak of him. And lastly, By their passionate and impatient desire to see him, (so much the original word signifies) to which he adds, that his desire was no less ardent to see them, though the providence of God had hitherto hindered him. Learn hence, That the best tidings which can be brought to the ear of a faithful minister of Jesus Christ, is this, That his people are sound and steadfast in the faith, maintainers of charity, and promoters of good works, and do account highly of, and honorably esteem the ministers and ambassadors of Jesus Christ; Timothy brought us good tidings of your faith, charity, and kind remembrance of us. Learn farther, From the Thessalonians' fervent desire to see St. Paul, and he to see them, that christian love doth earnestly long to evidence itself in christian fellowship, and passionately desires the communion of saints, for the mutual comfort and spiritual advantage of each other; the sweetest privilege, next to communion with God, is communion with his saints. O! What a pleasure is it, to behold the beautiful and blessed graces of the holy Spirit of God, sparkling and shining in each other, exciting and quickening one another, acquainting each other with their griefs, their doubts and fears. No wonder then that the Thessalonians desired so passionately to see St. Paul, and he as earnestly to see them.

7 Therefore, brethren, we were comforted over you in all our affliction and distress by your faith:

8 For now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord.

9 For what thanks can we render to God again for you; for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God?

In these words our apostle declares the transcendent joy and overflowing comfort, which was found in his soul, upon the knowledge he had received of the constancy and steadfastness of the faith of these Thessalonians; we were comforted in our afflictions by your faith: of all comforts which the people of God can afford to the ministers of the gospel, there is none comparable with that which results from their unfainting perseverance in the faith, and the unblameable holiness of their life. No comfort can be greater than our people's gracious demeanour; this put a kind of new life into St. Paul, in the midst of all the sorrows and sufferings the afflictions and persecutions he underwent. Now we live, says he, if ye stand fast in the Lord, that is, a life of joy and comfort; or, we live, that is, it will be a mean to prolong our life, as well as add to the comfort of it; and the contrary tends to the shortening of our days. Those that do impair the cheerfulness of their ministers' lives, such as deaden their spirits, and break their hearts, by their obstinate non-compliance with the rules of the gospel, are no better than murderers in the account of God. If ministers may, as all other persons do, value their lives by the joy and comfort of them, then may they say, with the great apostle, "We live, as we see any of our people stand fast in the Lord; and we die, as we see others slack fast in their sins." Observe farther, How highly thankful the apostle was to God, and what unspeakable praise he renders to him, for administering to him this occasion of joy by the constancy and perseverance of the christians' faith at Thessalonica; What thanks can we render to God for you, and for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes? The faithful ministers of Christ think that their hearts can never sufficiently be carried forth in thankfulness to God, for the success of their labors in the lives of their people; What thanks can we render? As if he had said, "I can never be sufficiently thankful, or I can never fully express my thankfulness to God for this honor, this favor, this benefit, that any one soul should be brought home to God by my ministry, much more that a christian church should be planted by my endeavours at Thessalonica; and that God should keep them steady and steadfast in shaking times, and support them under such persecutions and trials as would shock an ordinary patience and constancy of mind: O! What thanks can I render God for this joy?"

10 Night and day praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is lacking in your faith?

Observe here, How abounding St. Paul was in the duty of prayer for the Thessalonians; his prayer was assiduous and constant, night and day; it imports frequency and constancy in performance of the duty, Luke iii. 37. His prayer was also very fervent and affectionate, praying exceedingly, excessively, as the word will bear. Spiritual affections are strong and vehement. Note here, The admirable pattern which St. Paul sets before all the bishops and pastors of the church to the end of the world, namely, to be much, very much in prayer, to abound in this duty. Observe, farther, The subject matter of St. Paul's prayer, That he might see their face, and perfect what was yet lacking in their faith. Here note, That St. Paul's short stay among the Thessalonians when he first planted the gospel, did not permit so full and complete an explication of the matters and mysteries of christianity, as the apostle did desire; he therefore prays that God would bring him again amongst them, that he might supply what was wanting in their faith, that he might increase their knowledge, confirm their faith, inflame their love, excite their desires, quicken their endeavours, and carry on that good work to perfection in them, of which God had laid the foundation by him. Learn hence, 1. That even in the faith of the most renowned, as well as of the new converted christians, there is some deficiency and defect. 2. That one great end of the ministry of the word is, to help faith forward towards perfection; that which was the instrument to beget faith, is also the mean of increasing and confirming it, namely, the ordinances of God in general, and the ministry of the word in particular. As faith cometh by hearing, so is it confirmed by hearing also; longing to see your face, that we might perfect what is lacking in your faith.

11 Now God himself and our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you;

Observe here, 1. An implicit acknowledgement that our journeys intended, and visits designed to be given to our friends, are not in our power, but under the direction of God; we cannot visit a friend when we please, but when God will give us leave: we are not in our own dispose, but God's. Accordingly here, St. Paul begs of God to direct his way unto them, that all obstacles and impediments being removed, the providence of God might direct him, as in a right line, unto them, as the original word imports. Observe, 2. The persons whom he directs his prayers to, for this mercy, to God and Christ. Where note, That Christ is invoked as well as the Father, he is therefore God as well as the Father; because this invocation of him by all persons, proves him omniscient, searching the hearts of men, and also omnipresent, being with his people in all places; and consequently proves our Lord Jesus Christ to be truly and undeniably God.

12 And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you:

Still our apostle perseveres in prayer, on the behalf of his beloved Thessalonians; and the particular mercy he prays for, is their abundant increase in the grace and duty of love, first amongst themselves and their fellow-brethren in Christ, all christians far and near; next towards all men, heathens and infidels, their bitter and bloody persecutors not excepted. Where note, The true property of christian love; it is, 1. A brotherly affection, which every true christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ for grace sake; and, 2. A gracious propensity of heart, which a christian bears for God's sake to all mankind, whereby he wills, and to his power procures all good for them.

13 To the end he may stablish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

Here a particular and special reason is assigned, why he prayed so fervently for their abounding in love, namely, in order to their establishment in faith and holiness; teaching us, that as true love evidences the co-existence of all graces, so it gives stability and establishment to all graces. Learn hence, 1. That growth in grace is accompanied with stability both in faith and holiness. 1. That a general and abounding charity, being that by which we become most like unto God, tends exceedingly to our establishment in all grace, and renders us unblameable before God, at the appearance of Christ. Learn, 3. That there will be no possibility of appearing unblameable before Christ at his coming, without the love and practice of universal holiness in our christian course. Learn, 4. That the perfecting of a saint's graces, and rendering him altogether unblameable, without spot or imperfection in grace and holiness, is reserved till Christ's coming: then, and not till then, shall our holiness be perfected, our love improved to a seraphim's likeness, all burning; then shall we obey with vigor, praise with cheerfulness, delight in God above measure, fear him without torment, trust him without despondency, serve him without lassitude and weariness, without interruption or distraction, and be perfectly like unto him, as well in holiness as in happiness, as well in purity as in immortality.

*Come then, Lord, down to me,
Or take me up to thee.*

CHAPTER IV.

Our apostle having, in the three foregoing chapters, exhorted the Thessalonians earnestly to contend for, and courageously to persevere in that holy doctrine of faith, which he had preached to them, and planted amongst them, notwithstanding all the storms of persecution raised against them by the unbelieving Jews and opposing Gentiles; he comes now, in the remaining parts of this epistle, to recommend to them several duties and graces, with which, as with so many jewels of invaluable price, they were to adorn their christian conversation; and accordingly he thus bespeaks them, in the chapter now before us, ver. 1.

FURTHERMORE, then, we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as ye have received of us how you ought to walk, and to please God, so ye would abound more and more.

In these words, we have a general exhortation given to the Thessalonians, That according to the doctrine and injunctions formerly given them for an holy conversation suitable to the gospel, they would make it their care and endeavour to abound more and more in the exercise of piety, and onestrip themselves in doing their duty toward God and one another; We beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, &c. Where note, 1. With what great condescension and earnestness St. Paul applies himself to them; he styles them his brethren, and exhorts and beseeches them. The ministers of Christ must not only be teachers, but beseechers also, meekly and affectionately intreating persons to be kind to themselves, and comply with their present duty. Yet observe. 2. With what authority he backs his intreaty; he beseeches and exhorts by the Lord Jesus, that is, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by his authority, and for his sake: so that he that despiseth the gentle exhortations of Christ's ministers, despiseth not men, but God; as the authority of a prince is despised, when his messages by his ambassadors are rejected. Note, 3. The general and comprehensive duty which they are exhorted to, namely, to walk so as to please God in their daily conversation, to be found in the practice of all the duties and virtues of a good life. Where note, That St. Paul, in the course of his ministry, did not only explain and unfold gospel mysteries, but urge and enforce moral duties: Ye have received of us how ye ought to walk. This must be a minister's care, to acquaint his people, that as the privileges of christianity are very great, so the duties it requires are strict and exact; and those which we call moral duties, are an integral part of our religion; he that is not a moral man, is no christian; let us preach and press second-table duties, with arguments drawn from the first, namely, that they be performed in humble obedience to the command of God, and with a single eye at the glory of God, and from an inward principle of love to God, and then we can never preach up morality too much, nor our people practise it too much. Observe, lastly, The apostle exhorts them to abound more and more, that is, in grace and holiness; christians are to be thankful for, but not satisfied with, their present measures of grace received; God allows us liberty to enlarge our desires after an abundance of his grace; and happy is it where there is found an holy covetousness going along with the grace of God, as there is an insatiable covetousness going along with the gold and treasure of this world: this, says the apostle here, will please God, when ye abound more and more.

2 For ye know what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus.

Here our apostle subjoins a reason to enforce, his foregoing exhortation; what he now required of them, was nothing but what at their first conversion to christianity he had commanded them, and that in the name, and by the authority of Jesus Christ, to be performed by them; so that they were not his commands, but Christ's by him, and, as such to be esteemed of them. Learn hence, That the instructions and rules for an holy life, laid down by the apostles before the churches, are to be looked upon as the commandments of Christ, as being dictated by his Spirit, and delivered by his authority, and as such to be received of them, and obeyed by them.

3 For this is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication:

4 That every one of you should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honor:

5 Not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles which know not God:

This is the will of God, even your sanctification; that is, this is the will of God, eminently and emphatically revealed in his word, that christians should be holy and pure, chaste and clean: not indulging themselves in those impure and filthy lusts of the flesh, fornication and all manner of uncleanness, which the Gentiles, who knew not the true God savingly, were addicted to, and, in a most beastly manner guilty of; but that every one should know how to possess and make use of his body, and all its members, as the vessel and instrument of the soul, in holiness and honor. Observe here, 1. How the apostle descends from general to particular duties: he exhorted the Thessalonians, ver. 1. in the general, to walk so as to please God: here he exhorteth them in particular, to purity and chastity, both of heart and life, and to watch against all the violent eruptions of concupiscence in their earthly members; teaching us, that the ministers of God must not satisfy themselves with giving general exhortations to a good life, but must treat of particular sins and duties, and endeavour to put men upon the practice of the one, and to reclaim from the other; thus doth our apostle here. Observe, 2. The particular duty exhorted to, sanctification; a comprehensive word, and of a large extent; in the general, it consists in a conformity of our natures to the nature of God, and in a conformity of our lives to the will of God. In particular, sanctification here stands in opposition to all bodily uncleanness, as the next words do plainly show, that ye should abstain from fornication, that is, all filthiness and uncleanness contrary to chastity; intimating to us, that as there are no sins that human nature is more inclined to than the lusts of the flesh; so there are no sins that a christian should more guard against, and strive to mortify and subdue, as being contrary to that purity of nature and life which the gospel directs, and the Holy Spirit assists, unto. Observe, 3. The argument which our apostle here uses to enforce his exhortation to purity and holiness, This is the will of God; it is both the command of God that we should be holy, and the will of God to make us holy; now the signification of God's will ought to be a sufficient inducement to us to desire it, and endeavour after it. This is the will of God, even your sanctification, that you should abstain from fornication. Observe, 4. The remedy prescribed against all bodily uncleanness, and that is, a careful preserving the vessel of the body free from all fleshly pollution, and in that measure of purity and chastity which is suitable to the honor put upon it by God, in being made a temple for the Holy Ghost, That every one should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honor. Where note, the title given to our body, it is called a vessel; it is, first, the Spirit's vessel, he resides in it as in his temple; and accordingly, it seems to be an allusion to the consecrated vessels of the temple, in which a, more than ordinary cleanness and purity was found: secondly, It is the soul's vessel, it is its vessel or receptacle, in which, for a time, it is preserved, and it is the instrument of the soul, by which it acts and performs its office and function. Now it is every person's, every man and woman's duty, to possess their body, and to be master of it, not to be possessed by it, or enslaved to it, but to keep it in subjection to, and as the instrument of the soul; the body is God's curious workmanship, it is Christ's precious purchase, it is the soul's receptacle, it is the Holy Ghost's temple; therefore, to be kept holy, pure and clean, like the consecrated vessels of the temple. Observe, 5. our apostle exhorts the Thessalonians, not only to abstain from the outward act of uncleanness, but to mortify and subdue the inward lusts of concupiscence, ver. 5. or, as the word signifies, the feverish fit, or violent passion of burning desire which boileth within, through all the members of the body without. There is a divine art in the exercise of chastity, and no small skill required to keep a man's soul and body free from fleshly uncleanness; in order to which, inordinate desires must be resisted, the outward senses guarded, enticing and ensnaring objects avoided, wanton company declined, meat, drink, and sleep, soberly used, our lawful callings diligently followed, the first motions to uncleanness suppressed, prayer to God renewed; and, if these prevail not, marriage, God's special remedy, holily made use of. Thus may christians possess their vessels in sanctification and honor, not in the lust of concupiscence.

6 That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter: because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you, and testified:

7 For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness.

8 He, therefore, that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God, who hath also given unto us his Holy Spirit.

Here we have another positive duty pressed upon the Thessalonians, in which a great part of their sanctification or holiness would discover itself, namely, justice and equity in all their dealings, man with man. Thessalonica was a city of great trade and merchandise; therefore, the apostle directs them, in their traffic and commerce, neither by fraud nor force to overreach and go beyond one another: and the apostle, saying, Let none go beyond and defraud his brother, that is, his fellow christian, doth not suppose it lawful to defraud such as were not their brethren, but only lets them see that for christians to defraud and cheat, to overreach and go beyond one another, would be a very great aggravation of their crime, seeing the laws of their religion, as well as the light of nature, condemn all such injustice and dishonesty: and accordingly, the apostle adds a reason to enforce his exhortation, drawn from the dreadful effect of all such sins; namely, that it exposes and lays open the guilty person to the dreadful vengeance of God: The Lord is the avenger of all such. Learn hence, 1. That the wisdom of God has variously dispensed the gifts of providence to mankind; to some more, to others less; to some in one kind, to others in another: so that men cannot live without mutual commerce one with another. Learn, 2. That there is such a covetous and insatiable desire of wealth in the heart of man, that little regarding the measure of worldly things, which God has dispensed unto him, he lies at catch to take all advantages of his neighbour in matters of commerce, and, by defrauding and over-reaching him, seeks to increase his own worldly estate, with impairing of others; Let no man go beyond his brother: the apostle by forbidding this evil, plainly supposes man to be very prone and ready to fall into it. Learn, 3. That the sin of injustice in traffic and commerce, is so very heinous in the sight of God, that such men as are guilty of it, without repentance, must never expect to escape the vengeance of God, either here or hereafter; God is the avenger of all such Observe next, The reasons urged by St. Paul to enforce his foregoing exhortations to purity and justice. The first is taken from the design of God in their vocation; when called out of their heathenish state to christianity, they were called not to uncleanness, but out of uncleanness unto holiness. The second is taken from the heinousness of their sin, who shall despise or reject the commands here given for holiness and sanctification; he that despiseth, despiseth not man but God; to despise the minister of God in a command which he delivers from God, is to despise God himself; the apostle gave these commands by the direction of the Holy Spirit, which was given him for that end; Who hath also given unto us his Holy Spirit: Therefore, says he, he that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God. Where note, That although the reason here given, why such as despised the apostle, despised God himself, be peculiar to St. Paul, who had the Holy Spirit to guide him infallibly: yet so far as the ordinary ministers of Christ do follow the apostle's steps, and deliver nothing but what is agreeable to the word of God, the contempt of their message is a despising of God himself: He that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God.

9 But as touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you: for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another.

10 And, indeed, ye do it toward all the brethren which are in all Macedonia: But we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more;

Our apostle proceeds from an exhortation to chastity and justice, to press that of love, called here brotherly love, because it has all christians, all our fellow members in Christ for its object; and he persuades to the practice of it by a winning insinuation, that he need not say much upon this argument, because they were taught of God, that is, by the gospel of God, and influenced by the Spirit of God, to love one another. And observe we farther, The extensiveness of their love, it was not confined to a party, only to them in Thessalonica, but throughout all Macedonia; however he desires them to extend it still farther, to abound more and more: that is, first in the extent of it, let it reach not only the saints throughout all Macedonia, but even to them at the ends of the earth: secondly, in the measure of it, to excel even themselves in the degrees of their love. Learn hence, That neither brotherly love, nor any other christian grace, doth advance to such an height in any saint here, but it is still capable of further augmentation and increase, both intensively, by advancing to further measures and higher degrees of perfection, and extensively reaching to more objects, who ought to be sharers in our love.

11 And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

It is supposed by some, that the charity and bounty of these Thessalonians, mentioned in the foregoing verses, occasioned some persons to be idle, and carry tales from house to house, seeking by such flatteries and insinuations to maintain themselves without working; the apostle therefore commands every man to work at some calling, that they neither be a burden to the church, nor give a scandal to the heathen. Study to be quiet, that is, to be of a peaceable spirit and temper; and the original word imports an ambitious study; it ought to be our ambitious desire to live quietly and peaceably with all men; and to live so with some men will require study and earnest endeavour: If it be possible, live peaceably with all men, says St. Paul, Rom. xii. 18. Implying, that there are some men that it is impossible to live peaceably with; and whereas he adds, doing our own business and working with our own hands; that apostolical injunction requires, that every person be well employed, and found in the way of an honest and industrious diligence, for no man is sent into the world to be idle; and, as it is every man's duty, so it is also his privilege, to have a calling: the want of which exposes to innumerable temptations, for the devil finds an idle person always ready to run his errand.

12 That ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing.

Our apostle having exhorted the Thessalonians to industry and diligence in the foregoing verse, he presses it with a double argument in this verse. 1. Hereby they should walk honestly towards them that are without, that is in a decent and seemly manner in the eyes of unconverted Pagans, who are said to be without, because without the pale of the visible church: and, 2. Because, by God's blessing upon their industry, they would attain to such a competency of the things of this life, as to lack nothing which the wisdom of God saw fit and convenient for them; so that by industrious diligence we please God, we profit ourselves, are serviceable to the public, we silence and stop the mouths of the enemies of religion, and beautify our profession with a becoming conversation.

13 But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.

Our apostle, from this verse to the end of the chapter, exhorts the Thessalonians to moderate their grief and sorrow for their friends who died in Christ, many of which, no doubt, were martyrs for the truth in those days of persecution: he lays down many consolatory arguments, as so many sovereign antidotes against immoderate sorrow for the death of pious relations; and, first, he acquaints them, that such sorrow as is excessive, would be more like Pagans than christians, who mourn without hope of any life after this, that is, of a resurrection from the grave, and a future state of immortality. Our apostle doth not forbid sorrow for the dead absolutely, which Christ showed for Lazarus, and the church for Stephen, but it is excessive sorrow only that is here condemned. Learn hence, 1. That all sorrow for the death of friends is not unlawful, or forbidden to christians; the christian religion doth not destroy natural affections, but teaches us to moderate them. Learn, 2. That there is a mighty difference between the christian's sorrow for the dead, and theirs who are strangers to christianity: the sorrow of the heathen was extravagant and excessive in the measure; foolish, cruel, and impious in the manner; they tore their hair, beat their breasts, cut their flesh, and ran howling up and down in the most desperate manner: but the christian's sorrow is sober, moderate, silent, free from ostentation, under the government of reason and religion. Learn, 3. That the belief of a future state, and the hope of a joyful resurrection, is the cause of this great difference; it is ignorance of the happiness of glorified saints in heaven, which is the cause of our immoderate sorrow for their death, here on earth.

14 For if we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

St. Paul having, in the foregoing verse, dissuaded from immoderate grief and sorrow for the death of relations, comes now to lay down several considerations or consolatory arguments in order to it. The first word of comfort is this, That our relations over whom we mourn, are but fallen asleep; the grave is a bed, in which the saint is laid to rest, his body rests in a bed of dust, as in a safe and consecrated dormitory, till the morning of the resurrection: and, if the night be long, the morning will be the more joyous. The second comfort is, they sleep in Jesus, that is, in union with Jesus, as members of his body; in the faith of Jesus, that is, in such a belief of the doctrine of Christ, as is accompanied with an holy obedience to the commands of Christ. The third consolatory word is this, God will come, that is, to judgment, and when he cometh, will bring his sleeping saints with him, that is, he will bring their souls from heaven, their bodies from the grave. Body and soul united he shall take up to himself into the clouds, and then carry all his saints back with him into heaven. A fourth is this, our relations are not alone in death; Jesus died; the captain of our salvation marched before us through the black regions of death and the grave, and has perfumed the bed of the grave, by his own lying in it. Note here, The apostle says Jesus died, the saints sleep; a believer's death is called a sleep; I do not find that Christ's death is called a sleep; no, his death was death indeed, death with a curse in it: but the believer's death is turned by Christ into a sweet and silent sleep. Again, Jesus died and rose again, that is a comforting consideration, he was laid, but not lost in the grave: he rose by his own power, he rose as our head and representative, and accordingly, all his saints are risen in him, and shall rise after him; because I live, says Christ, you shall live also.

15 For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them, which are asleep.

In this verse St. Paul obviates an objection: some might say, that the saints found alive at the last day might be sooner happy than the dead saints; no, says the apostle, they that are alive, shall not prevent them that sleep, they shall not prevent their rising, nor shall they get the start of them, or get to heaven before them, or have any advantage above them; the living saint shall not be made happy without them, nor one moment before them. Learn hence, That the resurrection which the saints that sleep in Jesus shall be made partakers of, shall put them into as full a capacity of the glory of Christ's coming, as if they had remained alive in the body, till that blessed hour: nay, the dead in Christ shall rise first, that is, the saints who sleep in the grave at Christ's coming, shall be so far from being made less happy, or later happy, than the saints who shall be found alive, that they shall be first remembered: Christ's first care will be about his dead saints; they that have slept so long in their bed of dust shall be first awakened, before any thing be done about them that never slept; if there be any privilege, any joy, any triumph, greater than others, such as sleep in Jesus, and especially such as have suffered for Jesus, shall be partakers of it at that great day.

16 For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first.

These words give us the assurance of the certainty of Christ's second coming, and of the solemn manner of it, and of the consequence of it. Observe, 1. The certainty of our Lord's coming; The Lord himself shall descend from heaven; that is, the Lord Jesus, the Mediator: he will not depute an angel, but descend himself, to finish that last part of his mediatorial office. Christ will come personally, for the judgment will be managed visibly; and for the recompence of his abasement, it is requisite that he that was judged by the world, should come and judge the world. Reason says, he may come and judge the world, for he made it; faith says, he must and shall come to judge the world, for he has promised it. John xiv. 2. Let us then keep up our faith, and our faith will keep up our hearts. Observe, 2. The awful and solemn manner of our Lord's coming, and that is threefold: 1. He shall descend with a shout; the original word signifies such a shout as is heard among seamen when they descry the haven, and with united voices cry out, A shore, a shore. 2. With the voice of an archangel; probable it is, that Christ himself shall give the word of command, both to the quick and dead, to appear before him, and that this command shall be proclaimed by an archangel. 3. With the trump of God; the angel's proclamation shall be confirmed by sound of a trumpet, which will be heard far and near, even by those who are in the graves, and in the depth of the sea. Learn hence, That our Lord's second coming at the great day, to judge the quick and the dead, shall be attended with such solemnity, that all the terror, majesty, and dreadful reverence, which has been ever seen upon the earth, shall fall infinitely short of it. Great was the terror on mount Sinai, at the giving of the law, but far greater will the terror be at the day of judgment; when Christ comes to punish the transgressors of that law, and the disobeyers of his gospel. Observe, 3. The blessed consequence of his coming, namely, the resurrection of his saints; The dead in Christ shall rise first; the saints shall rise with the very same bodies which they laid down in the grave; and they shall rise first, that is, before those who are alive shall be changed: though it is very probable that there will be no considerable difference of time between the glorification of the raised saints, and those that are alive at Christ's coming, yet it seems evident, that the dead saints shall be raised, and in their bodies be glorified, before they that are alive shall be changed.

17 Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we be ever with the Lord.

Observe here, 1. The triumphant ascension both of the living and sleeping saints, together into the clouds; We which are alive shall be caught up together with them in the clouds. This ascension shall be effected by the power of Christ, by the ministry of angels, and by the spirituality of the saints' own bodies. Learn hence, That the descent of the saints of God into the grave, is not with so much weakness, ignominy and abasement, as their ascent after the resurrection, to meet their Lord in the air, shall be with power, triumph, and glory: Christ shall draw them, clouds shall carry them, angels shall conduct them. Observe, 2. The blessed meeting of all the saints together in one body, to take their flight together to meet the Lord Jesus, who comes from the third heaven to meet them in the lower region of the air, when Christ will own them in their persons, own them in their services, own them in their sufferings, and they shall receive their full and final benediction from the mouth of Christ, and take an everlasting possession of the heavenly kingdom together with Christ. Observe, 3. The saints' cohabitation and fellowship with Christ, together with its extent and duration, they shall ever be with the Lord; this implies the saints' presence with Christ, their vision and sight of him, their fruition and enjoyment of him, their delectation in him, their conformity to him. Learn hence, that the top and height of the saints' blessedness in heaven consists in this, that they shall for ever be there with Christ.

18 Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

That is, draw matter of consolation to yourselves from the foregoing considerations, against the loss of your deceased friends; intimating that the best and choicest of comforts, for supporting the spirits of men under afflictions in general, and the loss of dear relations in particular, are drawn from the holy scriptures; comfort one another with these words, that is with such scriptural words as he had now written.

CHAPTER V.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, treated of Christ's second coming to judgment, and foreseeing that some curious persons might take occasion from thence to inquire into the time when the general resurrection and future judgment should be, in this chapter he makes it his business to divert them from all such inquiries, and to put them upon the practice and performance of such duties as would prepare and fit them for that solemn time. Where note, That it was revealed to St Paul when he wrote this epistle, that there should be a second coming of Christ to judgment, and that it should not be till the departing from the faith, till the revelation and destruction of antichrist. 2 Thes. ii. 3. This it seems was an after revelation, for the Lord did not at once, reveal all his secrets to his servants, but by parcels.

BUT of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you.

2 For yourselves know perfectly, that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night.

3 For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.

As if our apostle had said, "Although I have told you that there will be a general resurrection, and future judgment, when Christ will certainly come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him, yet I suppose you do not expect that I should write to you of the particular time of his coming; for you have been told that his coming will be like the coming of a thief, without warning and without noise, when persons are most secure, least suspecting, and wholly unprovided for it; yea, as the pains of a woman in travail, which are unavoidable: the thief may perhaps not come, but the pains of child-birth must come, and also be painful when they come." Learn hence, 1. That the wisdom of God has thought fit to conceal and keep secret the determinate time of Christ's coming to judgment, and yet there is an itching curiosity in man's nature to search and pry into that profound secret, though the knowledge of it is not only impossible, but would prove unprofitable and hurtful to mankind, making the world secure and careless; whereas, not knowing the hour when our Lord cometh, should oblige us to be upon our watch every hour. Note then, That our Lord will certainly come at one hour or other, but at what hour he will come cannot certainly be known, yet there is no hour when we can promise ourselves that he will not come. Note lastly, That the pain and sorrow, the trouble and horror which the day of the Lord will bring upon such as are barely and unprepared for it, no tongue can utter, no heart can conceive; the greatest of earthly and bodily torments and sorrows, such as the pangs of a woman in travail, being but weak shadows, and slender representations of it, the day of the Lord cometh as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape.

4 But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief.

5 Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness,

Note here, The wisdom and holy caution of our apostle in his application to the Thessalonians; he had in the foregoing verses asserted the certainty and suddenness of Christ's coming, namely, to destroy Jerusalem, and to judge the world. Now lest these christians should be terrified in their minds, and shaken with apprehensions of fear from that sudden destruction he had mentioned, he casts in a reasonable word of comfort here in the words before us, assuring them that were sincere christians amongst them, that how sudden soever the coming and appearance of Christ might be, yet it should not find them unready and unprepared for it, because they were not in darkness, but in the light, and were not children of the night, but of the day; that is, they were not now in a state of heathenism, but christianity; they were not any longer in their gross and natural ignorance of God as they were before conversion, but they were the children of the light and of the day; living and walking in the light of the gospel, and in all holiness of conversation. Learn hence, That as sincere christians are freed from the gross darkness of their natural state, from the darkness and ignorance of sin, and do walk in the light of an holy conversation, so their knowledge and practical holiness will be a good security against the terror of surprising afflictions, and particularly against the dread and terror of the day of judgment: "Ye are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief."

6 Therefore, let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober.

7 For they that sleep, sleep in the night: and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night.

8 But let us who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love, and for an helmet the hope of salvation:

The apostle having acquainted the Thessalonians with the privilege of their converted state, that they were the children of the light, having received a light of knowledge, a light of grace and holiness, and a light of joy and comfort from the gospel, he comes next to infer the duties proper and suitable to persons in such a state; First, Negative, Let us not sleep, as do others; sleep is not proper for the day, but the night; the sleep here intended, is the sleep of sin, and of sinful security, whereby all the spiritual senses of a man are bound up, so that he is both unapprehensive of duty, and regardless of his danger. Secondly, Positive, Let us watch and be sober; that is, let us be always ready and prepared for Christ's coming; and that we may be so, let us be found in the daily exercise of sobriety, at no time overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and that day overtake us unawares; the exercise of these two graces, watchfulness and sobriety, do best together, and can hardly be separated one from another; he that is not sober, cannot be watchful; and he that is not watchful, can never be ready for Christ's coming: let us therefore (says the apostle) watch and be sober. Observe next our apostle subjoins a reason to enforce his exhortation to watchfulness and sobriety, because sleep and drunkenness are works of darkness, performed in the night, and are not suitable for the children of the day: "They that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that are drunk, are drunken in the night." The old heathens had their Bacchanalia, their drunken feasts in the night; and in the apostle's time, drunkenness was so shameful a vice, that men were ashamed to be seen drunken in the day-time: but, Lord, to what an height of impudence is the intemperance of our age arrived, when christians blush not to do that at mid-day, which heathens were ashamed of at midnight! Observe farther, Another reason suggested why we should be sober and watchful, namely, because our life is a spiritual warfare: it is now a time of fighting, therefore not of sleeping, and intemperate eating and drinking, soldiers must be upon their guard and well armed: accordingly St. Paul directs to the two principal pieces of spiritual armor to guard the most noble and vital parts, namely, the head and the heart; the helmet for the head, and the breastplate for the heart; for these two being the chief fountains of life and sensation, the preserving them safe, is in effect, the preserving of the whole man; and accordingly, the soldiers that were upon their watch, and kept sentinel, never stood without their helmet and breastplate. In allusion to which our apostle here directs us, as christian soldiers, to put on the breastplate of faith and love, and for an helmet, the hope of salvation, without which we can never be rightly and duly prepared for our spiritual warfare. Note here, of what admirable use, faith, love, and hope, are to a christian; faith fortifies against destructive temptations, love will preserve from apostasy and revolting, and hope will be of universal use unto us in the exercises of our christian course; it will be a cordial to comfort us, a spur to quicken us, a staff to support us, a bridle to restrain us, an helmet to defend us: "Therefore let us who are of the day be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love, and for an helmet, the hope of salvation."

9 For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ.

10 Who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

11 Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do.

Observe here, 1. A reason enforcing the apostle's exhortation to holiness of life, For or because God has not appointed us unto wrath, but to obtain salvation by Jesus Christ. Note here, 1. What a christian is not appointed to; he is not appointed to wrath. 2. What he is appointed to, namely, to obtain salvation. 3. The means by whom a christian doth obtain salvation, and that is by our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That God's ordination and appointment of us to happiness and salvation, doth not discharge us from care and endeavour after the practice of universal holiness; it is the greatest piece of folly imaginable, from the appointment of the end, to infer the refusal or neglect of the means. Learn, 2. That our Lord Jesus is the person appointed by God the Father, by whom alone all believers shall obtain salvation. Learn, 3. That nothing short of the death of Christ was sufficient to purchase salvation for us, we obtain salvation by Jesus Christ, who died for us. Learn, 4. That the great end designed by Christ, in dying for us, was our living to him, in order to our living with him; a life of grace on earth, is our evidence for a life of glory in heaven; whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him. Observe lastly, The great and important duty which he exhorts the Thessalonians to perform mutually to each other, and that is, to comfort themselves together with this hope, and to edify and build up one another in faith and holiness; wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, as also ye do; implying that as it is the duty, so it ought to be the endeavour of christians to edify one another, both in their graces, and in their comforts.

12 And we beseech you, brethren, to know them which labor among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you;

13 And to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. And be at peace among yourselves.

In these words have we declared both the minister's office, and the people's duty; the minister's office, with respect unto his people, and the people's duty both towards their ministers, and one towards another. The ministerial office and function is here described, and consists of three parts, publicly to labor, privately to admonish, ministerially to rule. To labor in the word and doctrine, the word signifies a labor unto weariness. Our work is the most weighty work, and, blessed be God, the most worthy work too. Admonition consists of two parts, reproving of sins committed, and exhorting to duties neglected; rightly to do both, requires that the minister be a person of knowledge and understanding, of prudence and discretion, of courage and resolution, of integrity, and unblameableness of conversation; to rule not magisterially, much less tyrannically, but in love, and with a spirit of meekness, executing that power which Christ has given for edification, and not for destruction: such a power as the shepherd has over the flock, to guide and conduct it; as the head has over the members, to influence and quicken them; as the father of the family has over the household, to take care of it, and provide for it. Observe, 2. The people's duty to their pastors, or spiritual guides declared; and this is twofold: 1. They are to know them, and this with a knowledge of observation, with a knowledge of approbation, and with a knowledge of imitation. 2. They are highly to esteem them, paying honor to the function, reverence to their persons, and all this in love, and for their work's sake. Observe lastly, The people's duty one towards another, and be at peace among yourselves; such a people can never join hearts in duty, that cannot join hands in love: christian love is a nursing mother to all graces, and tends exceedingly to make the work of the ministry successful; but when strife and dissension, when discord and division prevail either amongst the people themselves, or betwixt minister and people, farewell all expectations of success from the ablest ministry upon earth.

14 Now we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak, be patient towards all men.

Here our apostle directs the ministers of Christ how to carry themselves towards their people, namely, that they should admonish those that are unruly, and walk disorderly, that they should comfort the feeble-minded, such as are dispirited by, and dejected under their afflictions, that they should bear with the weak in faith, and be patient towards all mankind. Note hence, That the church of Christ here on earth, is like an hospital of sickly and infirm persons, laboring under great variety of spiritual diseases, and consequently fit objects of Christ's ministers, to exercise their patience and pains upon; some unruly, some weak, some feeble-minded; every person, every member of the church is a patient, and every patient has his particular distemper, which calls for indefatigable diligence, and invincible patience, from such as are spiritual physicians.

15 See that none render evil for evil unto any man: but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves and to all men.—

Our apostle from this verse closes his epistle with a general exhortation to all christians to be found in the practice of several necessary and important duties, the first of which is to abstain from all revenge, render to no man evil for evil; a malicious desire of revenge is so far beneath a christian, that it is the baseness of a man. Let him that does the wrong look to it, could an heathen say; not only revenge in the action, but in the affection, is greatly sinful before God, and deeply penal also; as jealousy is the rage of a man, so malice and revenge is the rage of the devil, it is the very soul and spirit of the apostate nature.

—But ever follow that which is good, &c.

By good here, as it stands in opposition to rendering evil, must be understood good-will and beneficence, or doing good to enemies, and this the apostle would have us follow, or, as the word signifies, pursue with eagerness, as the hunter doth his game, and this continually. Ever follow that which is good without interruption, notwithstanding a multiplication of injuries; and this not only among themselves, who were christian professors, but even among heathens (with whom they lived) though bitter enemies to christianity. Learn hence, That a christian must not turn vindictive, and impatient, or incline to any desires or motions towards private revenge, notwithstanding the malicious temper of his adversary continues; but instead of being overcome of evil, must labor “to overcome evil with good; render to no man evil for evil, but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves and to all men.”

16 Rejoice evermore.

17 Pray without ceasing.

18 In every thing give thanks: For this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you—

Observe here, 1. Three very extensive and comprehensive duties, which our apostle exhorts unto, all which have a kind of universality annexed unto them; now the more comprehensive any duty is, the greater its obligation is; the first duty is to rejoice evermore, that is, to carry ourselves so holily towards God, and so circumspectly and unblameably before men, that we may always have cause for rejoicing, and in the midst of temptations, and in the midst of poverty and affliction, may actually rejoice in the expectation of present advantage by them, and in the hope of the glory of God, as the reward of them. Learn hence, That the children of God ought to make conscience of rejoicing in God at all times, and in all conditions: but is not there a time to mourn, as well as to rejoice? Yes, but it is no where said, mourn evermore; nay, holy mourning has the seed of spiritual joy in it, it directly tends to it, and will certainly end in it; mourning is but a temporary, rejoicing is an eternal duty.

—Pray without ceasing.—

Note from the connection, That he that would rejoice evermore, must pray evermore; seldom praying and constant rejoicing will never stand together; according to our constancy in prayer, such will be the constancy of our joy. Note, 2. That frequent and constant prayer to God, is a duty required of all christians: we are then said to do a thing continually, when we do it seasonably, when we pray at stated times, morning and evening every day, when upon extraordinary occasions we perform the duty in an extraordinary manner, and when we perform it with unfainting perseverance, both frequently and fervently, though we receive no present answer to our prayers; and in a word, when the heart is always kept in a praying frame, this is to pray continually; and the reason for it is, because we stand in continual need of God, we want him continually, we sin against him continually, we are surrounded with temptations continually, we are exposed to troubles and afflictions continually, and we ought to glorify God continually; and if so, we must pray continually; not that a man should do nothing else but pray; for though we may do nothing without prayer, yet we must do many things besides praying.

—In every thing give thanks: For this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you.

Observe here, 1. The duty required, and that is, thanksgiving. 2. The extent of the duty, In every thing give thanks, that is, be thankful in every condition, and for every providential dispensation, both prosperous and adverse. Quest. "Should christians be thankful for afflictions?" Yes, Because they are fruits of fatherly love, because they conform us unto Christ, because they prevent sin, and purge out sin, because they fit us for glory, and will add to our crown of glory at the great day. Quest. "But should christians be thankful for sin, or when they fall into sin?" By no means. Rule. What we must not pray for, we may not give thanks for: we must pray to be kept from sin, therefore may not give thanks when we fall into sin; sin dishonors God, dishonours ourselves, exposes to God's wrath and curse, is the ground of our just detestation, therefore cannot be the ground of thanksgiving; yet when we obtain pardon of sin; or get any good by sin, we may and ought to rejoice at it. Observe, 3. The grounds and reasons of the duty. 1. It is the will of God, his revealed will; this the law of nature directs to, and the light of scripture calls for; and he that performs it spiritually, glorifies God abundantly. 2. It is the will of God in Christ Jesus, that is, this part of God's will is especially revealed to you by the doctrine of Christ Jesus, and by the example of Christ Jesus: Christ was both a great pattern and president of thankfulness all his life long: he thanked God frequently and fervently, and has made thankfulness a considerable part of our gospel service, Heb. xii. 15.

19 Quench not the Spirit.

Still observe, 1. The coherence and connection: he that would rejoice evermore, must pray without ceasing; and he that would rejoice in every thing, must be thankful in every thing; and he that would rejoice, pray and give thanks continually, must evermore keep the Spirit unquenched; the way to keep one's self warm, is to keep the fire burning; Quench not the Spirit; that is, neither the graces of the Spirit nor the motions of the Spirit. Note, 1. That the Holy Spirit of God in man is of the nature of fire, as fire, it enlighteneth, it enliveneth, it warmeth, it consumeth, it purifieth and refineth, it ascendeth upward. Note, 2. That this holy fire of the Spirit may be quenched; the gifts, graces, motions, and comforts of the Holy Spirit are of such a nature, that if they be not cherished, they are quenched: fire will go out as well by neglecting it, as by casting water upon it. Note, 3. That it must be a christian's special care, that the graces of God's Holy Spirit be not quenched in him, nor any of its motions resisted by him. Sin in general quenches the Spirit, as water quenches fire: particularly, sins committed against knowledge and conscience; inordinate love of the world quenches the Spirit, as earth will extinguish fire as well as water. A cold, customary, formal performance of holy duties, without the exercise of lively faith and holy love in the performance of them, will grieve and quench the Spirit, especially sensual lusts indulged, and anger, malice and revenge harboured in the heart: the holy Dove will not rest upon that man, that has the heart of a vulture in his breast and bosom; and let us always remember, if we quench the Spirit in his motions, he is also quenched by us in his offices; he doth us many good offices, in prayer he is our helper, our assistant, he quickens to the duty, and in the duty, and helps our infirmities, and makes intercession for us in our christian course; he guides us, comforts us, and bears witness to our integrity in us: all these good offices will he cease to do for us, if he be quenched in us, 20 Despise not prophesyings.

Note here, 1. How close this duty is coupled with the former, Quench not the Spirit; despise not prophesyings: plainly intimating to us, that the Spirit is then dangerously quenched, when prophesying, or the preaching of the word is sinfully neglected. Note, 2. That by prophesying here, is not meant foretelling things to come, but the interpretation and application of the holy scriptures, which we call preaching. Note, 3. That by not despising it, we are to understand, that it is our obliged duty to put an high value and esteem upon it, to attend to it, and have a great regard for it, to honor the public ministry as an ordinance of God for instruction, conversion, and edification. Learn, That it is not sufficient that we do not slight the ordinance of preaching, nor declaim against it as vain and useless, (as the manner of some is), but we are to have an honorable esteem of it, and evidence that esteem by a due attendance upon it: more is intended by the Holy Ghost than is here expressed; for though he only forbids the sin, he intends the duty or grace in strict opposition to the sin, namely, That christians ought to be so far from despising that they ought to be very forward in embracing the ministry and preaching of the word; despise not prophesyings.

21 Prove all things: hold fast that which is good.

Observe here, 1. The persons to whom this advice is given, to the church of the Thessalonians, not to the ministers, but to the people, ver. 12 Know them that labor among you, &c. Observe, 2. The advice itself, Prove all things; examine, try, and approve them, with a judgment of private discretion, not of public division. Learn, 1. That it is the duty of all christians to examine the grounds of their faith and religion, and not to take them upon trust; otherwise their embracing the best religion in the world, is rather the result of chance than of judgment and choice. Learn, 2. That although all doctrines and opinions must be tried: yet only that which is good, must be retained. Learn, 3. That nothing is to be held fast, but what is first tried: suppose we hold that which is good, yet if we have not tried and proved it to be good, it is no better to us than that which is evil? to approve before trial is not good, though the thing approved be never so good. Inference, That this is a strong argument for the perspicuity and sufficiency of the holy scriptures, and against the necessity of a living Judge; for he that must try all things, must also try the doctrine of this living Judge; and therefore till he has made this trial, must not admit his doctrine as an article of christian faith; for these words plainly teach, that what we hold fast must be first tried; Try all things, and hold fast that which is good.

22 Abstain from all appearance of evil:

This advice genuinely follows upon the former; after we have tried all things, we must hold fast that which is good, and abstain from evils. Where note, The gradation used by our apostle, we must abstain from evil, from all evil, from all appearance of evil. Yet observe, It is not the apostle's meaning that we abstain from all that which appears evil to others; for that would be to destroy our christian liberty in things indifferent, and create in our minds continual perplexities: there is nothing almost we can do, but may appear evil to some. But St. Paul here enjoins us to abstain from every thing which after trial seems evil to ourselves, and is judged by us so to be; yet it is our duty not to give any just occasion of scandal to any, but to live not only sine crimine, but sine labe, not only without fault, but, if possible, without flaw, that the world may have nothing to spot us withal.

23 And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly: and I pray God your whole spirit, and soul and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. That our apostle having exhorted the Thessalonians to labor after the highest measures of sanctification, breathes out his soul in a most affectionate prayer to God, to sanctify them thoroughly and throughout; teaching us that instruction and supplication should go together; after we have been instant with our people we must be earnest and instant with God for them. Observe, 2. The person whom the apostle directs his prayer for sanctification to, The God of peace: but why doth he not style him the God of grace? Because peace and unity is one very eminent part of that sanctification the apostle had prayed for, and had exhorted them before unto, ver. 13. Be at peace among yourselves. Now this grace being once well rooted, all the other parts of sanctification thrive the better. Observe, 3. How thorough and prevailing a work of sanctification the apostle prays for, namely, that God would sanctify them wholly in spirit, soul, and body. By spirit, understand the superior faculties, the understanding, the will and conscience; by soul, the inferior faculties, the passions, affections, and sensitive appetite; and by body, the outward man, the tabernacle of the soul. Now the apostle prays, that all these may be sanctified, because they are defiled. Blessed be God, regenerating grace is as universal a principle as original sin was; it is in the understanding by illumination, in the will by renovation, in all the affections by sanctification, reducing those rebellious powers under the government and dominion of reason and religion. Observe, 4. Our apostle doth not only pray for their sanctification, but for their preservation also, that they may be preserved blameless to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, that is, preserved in a state of grace and holiness unto the end; all the sanctified are preserved; instability is an argument of insincerity; within a while, all possibilities of falling will be removed; in the mean while, take heed of falling, by thinking it is impossible to fall; for none are so near falling as those who are most confident of their own strength and standing.

24 Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it.

Here our apostle comforts the Thessalonians with the assurance that God, who had called them to the knowledge of christianity, would do what he had prayed for, namely, sanctify them wholly, and preserve them blameless, and this because God is faithful, that is, always the same, true to his word. God will certainly do his part in and towards the work of sanctification and preservation; but in a way of concurrence with our care and industry; he will do nothing without us, as we can do nothing without him; God's faithfulness is a pledge to us of the performance of all his promises, and will most certainly put him upon the performance of them; but his promise to us always supposes, yea, exacts from us, the use of all means, and particularly the exerting of our own endeavours, in order to our preservation in grace, and perseverance in holiness; "Faithful is he that called you who also will do it."

25 Brethren, pray for us,

Observe. Who it is that begs prayer, a great apostle, St. Paul himself; and whom it is he begs prayer from, the brethren, christians, and fellow members of the church at Thessalonica. Those that are most eminent for gifts and graces, are greatly desirous of the saints' prayers; particularly the ministers of the gospel, as they stand most in need of, so are they most importunate for this spiritual alms, which they crave as earnestly as ever beggar did bread at a rich man's gate. See on 2 Thess. iii. 1.

26 Greet all the brethren with an holy kiss.

Our apostle concludes his epistle with salutations to all the brethren and members of the church, without exception, poor and rich, advising them to manifest and testify their affection one to another, by a kiss given to each other, a ceremony of civility much in use in those eastern countries; yet requires, that it should not be a wanton but an holy kiss: intimating to us, that our civil actions should have a relish and savor of holiness. Hence it is, that St. Paul is so careful to give particular directions for the right ordering of our speech and discourse in common conversation, that it be grave and savory, Col. iv. 6. Of our apparel, that it be such as becomes those that profess the gospel; and here, that our courteous salutations of each other should be chaste and holy, Greet one another with an holy kiss: their kiss of love and peace, must truly signify, what it makes show of, that neither treachery, nor cruelty, nor hypocrisy, nor lust, may insinuate itself into such a symbol of holy love.

27 I charge you, by the Lord, that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren.

Our apostle having now finished his epistle, gives a strict charge for the perusal of it. In which, Observe, 1. The duty enjoined, with the matter of it, namely, the reading of this epistle, and for the same reason all the rest, which had the like stamp of divine authority upon them. Observe, 2. The object or parties to whom this epistle is to be read, to the brethren, to all the brethren. Observe, 3. The solemnity of the injunction, I charge you, not I exhort, beseech, or intreat, but charge and enjoin you; yea, the word signifies, I adjure you; it has the force of an oath, and that under a curse: as if he had said, "I oblige you, under the penalty of God's curse, that this epistle be read." Learn thence, 1. That the scriptures ought to be in a known tongue, that they may be read unto, and read by the common people. 2. That to confine the reading of the scriptures to the clergy, and exclude the laity or common people from reading of them, is a very grievous sin, contrary to the intent and design of God in the first penning and composing of them. 3. That it doth in a special manner concern the ministers and spiritual guides to take particular care that the holy scriptures be publicly read to, and privately read by all their people; and in order thereunto, to excite parents to read them daily in their families, Deut. vi. 9. and in their closets, Col. iii. 16. And also it is a great part of the minister's duty, to look after the putting forth the children of poor parents to school, that they may learn to read the scriptures for their instruction and comfort. Lord, what a reproach is it to this christian nation, that in thousands of families the Bible signifies no more than a chip! not a soul amongst them able to read a letter in it! This is a lamentation, the Lord put it into the hearts of ministers and people to use the utmost endeavours to roll away this reproach from us!

28 The Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

Thus concludes our apostle his excellent epistle, with his usual valediction or farewell wish, desiring, that though the Thessalonians had been large partakers of the grace and Spirit of Christ, that yet they might receive fresh, farther and fuller supplies from himself, the fountain of all grace and goodness. From whence note, That so inexhaustible is the fountain of divine grace, and so copious the streams of spiritual blessings flowing from it, that no such measures can be attained, but, as more is wanting, more is had, more is provided, more is allowed, more is to be thirsted after, and labored for. Blessed be God for Jesus Christ, that overflowing, that never-failing fountain of grace and comfort, in whom all fulness dwells, that of his fulness all his members may receive, further receive, grace for grace. Amen.

THE
TO THE THESSALONIANS.

The second epistle to the Thessalonians is believed, very probably, to have been written by St. Paul, soon after the first, because the same persons, Silvanus and Timotheus, were still with him when he writ it, as they were at the writing of the first epistle.

Having in his former epistle, expressed his longing desire to visit them, and finding by the intervention of other affairs, that he was from time to time providentially hindered from coming to them, he sends this second epistle to them, to supply the want of his presence amongst them.

In which, he first congratulates their constancy in the profession of the gospel, exhorting them to growth in grace, and perseverance in religion.

Next he rectifies a mistake which they lay under concerning the coming of Christ to Judgment, as if that day were then at hand, when it was very far off, there being a general and grand apostasy to precede it, comforting the Thessalonians against the dread and terror of it.

Lastly, he commends divers christian duties to them, requiring them to admonish and censure such idle persons amongst them who did not work, but lived upon other men's labor; and so concludes his epistle with particular recommendations of them to the special favor and grace of God.

CHAPTER I.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians, in God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ;
2 Grace unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

These two verses contain the inscription of this epistle in the very same words with the former, in the foregoing epistle. In which observe, 1. The writer of the epistle, St. Paul, joining himself with his two associates, Silvanus or Silas, and Timotheus or Timothy. 2. To whom it was written, To the church of the Thessalonians, in God the Father, that is, established in the knowledge of God the Father, and in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. 3. The usual salutation, Grace and peace, under which are comprehended all spiritual and temporal blessings: and these are (No. 61.)

set forth as flowing to us, first, From their fountain, God the Father: Secondly, From their means of conveyance, Jesus Christ, as Mediator; intimating, that whatever spiritual grace, or temporal blessing we now receive from God, we have it from him, not barely as a Creator, but as a gracious Father in Christ, in and through whom all kinds of blessings are conveyed to us. Now, 1. From St. Paul's using the very same form of words in this epistle, which he had made use of in the former, we may observe, That the holy Spirit of God, in inditing of the scriptures, did not so much regard variety of words and style, as the purpose intended by those words; and accordingly the ministers of Christ, in the expounding and explaining of the scriptures, should rather study solidity of matter, than variety of expression, or elegance of style. It was none of the apostle's business, (God grant that it may be none of ours) to please the wanton wits, and gratify the luxuriant fancies of men, with a pompous sound of words, but solidly to instruct them in the great and necessary duties of the gospel, and to furnish them with the strongest arguments and mo-tires to a good life. Plain truths, without any art or varnish, may be conveyed with more warmth and vigor to the conscience, than all the charms of human eloquence from the most fluent and popular tongue. But though we must come in plainness, yet not in rudeness of speech. Note, 2. From St. Paul's writing this epistle to the Thessalonians, when he was providentially hindered in his purpose of coming to them, and preaching amongst them, we may learn, That as the wisdom of God has appointed several means for the edification of his church, sometimes preaching, at other times writing, so the ministers of Christ are obliged and bound to endeavour the church's edification by all means; when they cannot do it by public preaching, to endeavour it by writing: and when they can by both, their labors from the press and from the pulpit should be jointly employed in the church's service.

3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all towards each other aboundeth.

4 So that we ourselves glory in you in the churches of God, for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

Observe here, 1. The holy wisdom and pious prudence of our apostle, who being about to magnify and extol the graces of the Spirit wrought in the Thessalonians, particularly their faith and charity, instead of commending them for these graces, he breaks forth into praises and thanksgivings unto God for them; we thank God that your faith groweth exceedingly, and that the charity of every one of you aboundeth. His business was not to celebrate the praises and commendations of them, but to admire the special grace of God conferred upon them, and conspicuous in them. Learn hence, That as it is our duty, it will be our great wisdom and prudence, so to speak of the graces of God, which we see and observe in others, as that they may not be puffed up with any conceit of their own excellencies, but see matter of praise and thanksgiving due unto God only; and nothing to themselves. Note, 2. The special and particular graces which St. Paul observed in the Thessalonians, their faith, and their charity, together with the evidence of the sincerity of these graces, namely, that their faith was a growing faith, their love an abounding and overflowing love; "Your faith groweth exceedingly, and your love aboundeth." Learn hence, That as the saving graces of faith and love do admit of degrees, and do not come to their height and perfection at once; so all other graces do either increase or decrease, grow or fade together with these; the vigor or decay of these cardinal graces have an answerable influence upon all our other graces. But how did St. Paul know that their faith did thus grow? Ans. He knew the increase of their faith by their constancy in sufferings. Note, 3. Our apostle doth not barely commend these graces of faith and love, which were found in the Thessalonians, but he makes an holy boast of them, he glories in them, and excites other churches to a praise-worthy imitation of them; We glory in you in the churches of God. But for what? Even for your courage and patience under sufferings, persecutions, and tribulations for the sake of christianity, and for your constancy in the faith of Christ. Learn hence, 1. That persecutions, afflictions, and tribulations, for the sake of christianity, (when maintained especially in the power of it) are the common lot of God's faithful children and servants. Learn, 2. That it is the highest glory of a christian to bear afflictions, and undergo persecutions for the sake of the gospel, with an undaunted courage, and an invincible patience. Learn, 3. That it is not unlawful, but sometimes necessary and expedient, for a minister to glory in his people; not in their multitude, not in their riches, not in their greatness, not in their high estimation of his person and abilities, but in the eminent graces of God's holy spirit in them, and in the great services and sufferings undergone by them: "We glory in you for your patience and faith, in and under all the persecutions and tribulations that ye endure."

5 Which is a manifest token of the righteous judgment of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God for which ye also suffer:

As if he had said, "Which tribulations and persecutions, or, which patience under your present persecutions, is a sign and token, yea, an evidence and manifestation, that God, the righteous judge, will reward you with a part and share in that kingdom for which you suffer, being in his account, worthy of it; not with a worthiness of merit, but with a worthiness of meanness, they being made meet and fit for heaven hereafter by their patience and constancy under sufferings and persecutions here." Learn hence, That as none can enjoy the kingdom of heaven by meriting heaven, but by being made meet for heaven; so patience under sufferings and reproaches, under persecutions and sharp trials, is a special qualification to make us meet for the enjoyment of that glorious kingdom; "that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer."

6 Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulations to them that trouble you:

7 And to you who are troubled, rest with us—

Our apostle had shown in the foregoing verse, that their patience under persecution was a manifest evidence of God's intending them a portion in that kingdom, for which they suffered persecution: now, in this verse he denounces the persecutors' doom upon them, namely, That the righteous nature of God did oblige him to recompense tribulation, and to repay trouble to all such as did trouble them, and unkindly persecute them for righteousness' sake. Learn thence, That as persecutors generally do continue finally impenitent, so the heaviest stroke of divine vengeance shall fall on such, in the day of God's most righteous judgment: "It is a righteous thing with God to render tribulation to them that trouble you."

—And to you who are troubled, rest with us—

That is, "As God will certainly punish your persecutors, so he will, ere long, give rest to you his sufferers, together with us who are companions with you in the same sufferings: you that are troubled shall have rest with us, his persecuted apostles, you shall have rest as well as we, and you shall have rest together with us." Blessed be God, that there is a day undoubtedly coming, when all the troubles of his people shall be ended indeed, and all his suffering saints shall be fully and finally rewarded for all their services and sufferings; and this distribution of rewards and punishments, shall be in the presence of the whole world, at the great day, for the glory of divine justice. Then all those who doubt or complain of God's justice, shall awfully admire and adore it: to you that are troubled, rest with us. Where note, 1. That the present time, is a time of trouble to the people of God: their time of rest is hereafter. 2. That Almighty God alloweth his troubled saints a liberty to comfort themselves with the expectation and hope, that their troubles shall shortly end, and their everlasting rest begin. 3. That it addeth much to the excellency of that rest which the troubled saints expect, that it shall be enjoyed, not by a few of the most eminent sufferers, but by all of them: All you that are troubled shall rest with us; with us apostles, with all the prophets and faithful servants of God. Hail, happy day! when all the saints shall sing and rejoice together; when there shall not be one wicked person among them to damp their mirth, or diminish their joy. How desirable is the communion of saints here! How happy do they esteem themselves when they can get together by themselves! But how joyful will the time and place be, when they get to heaven, where none shall interrupt their quiet, nothing shall disturb their rest! "God will recompense tribulation to them that trouble you, and to you who are troubled, rest with us."

—When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels.

8 In flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

In these words we have an awful description of the day of judgment, and of the process of that solemn day. Where observe, 1. The Judge described, The Lord Jesus, he shall be revealed from heaven; since his ascension the heavens have contained him, and concealed him also from our sight and senses; but he shall then visibly appear, and locally descend from the highest heavens, into the regions of the air, He shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him. Observe, 2. His noble attendants, the mighty angels, every one stronger than an host of armed men. As the work of Christ comes about, is a great and mighty work, so he will have instruments strong and mighty, sufficient for that work; yet doth Christ make use of the angels, not for necessity, but for majesty; he can do his work without them. Observe, 3. The manner of his coming, In flaming fire, by which the heavens and the earth shall be burnt up, and in which the damned shall be eternally tormented. Observe, 4. The end of his coming, To take vengeance on the ignorant, and on the disobedient, on such as know not God, and on them that do know, but obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus. Learn hence, 1. That it greatly tends to the comfort and support of persecuted christians, that Christ their righteous Judge will come: He shall be revealed, and nobly attended; he shall come as an exalted king, accompanied with a glorious train of mighty angels. Learn, 2. That the dread and terror of the day of judgment, will be matter of comfort to the godly, no ways terrifying. Those very flames which shall set the heavens and the earth in a blaze, and occasion dreadful consternation and fear to the wicked and impenitent world, shall be a comfortable sight to the godly, and the forethoughts of them may, and should yield comfort to them under their present troubles. Learn, 3. That ignorance whether in pagans or in christians, doth very much, but disobedience to the gospel, doth very much more, expose persons, and lay them open to the vengeance of the great day: if Christ will render vengeance to them that know him not, much more to them that do know, but obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus.

9 Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power;

Observe here, The tremendous dreadfulness of that wrath and vengeance which at the great day will be inflicted on the ignorant and disobedient part of mankind; to denote the greatness of it, it is called destruction, not as if it were an abolishing of their nature, and utter extinction of their being, as the destruction of beasts is; but a loss of their happiness and well-being, as the destruction of the fallen angels was; and to set forth the duration of it, it is called everlasting destruction, a dying life, and a living death; their debt will never be paid, they shall never come out of prison; they will always be satisfying but never able fully to satisfy divine justice. And observe farther, As their punishment of sense is here described, so we have their punishment of loss declared: they shall be banished from the presence of the Lord, that is for ever excluded from the sight of his blessed face, and the enjoyment of his gracious presence; the presence of his favor they shall never find, the presence of his fury they shall ever feel. Lord! how is thy presence here on earth, life, light, and joy to thine own people! How much more will it be so in heaven! But how terrible and dreadful will thy presence be to the wicked at the great day, even everlasting destruction! Lord, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear, when thou appearest! Thy very presence shall punish and torment them, and thy glorious power drive them away to the place of torment prepared for them: they shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power; that is, destruction shall come forth immediately from the presence and glorious power of Christ upon them, and that without any measure or mitigation; the sentence denounced will be instantly executed, and the sinner that is banished from Christ's presence shall be everlastingly tormented by his power.

10 When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day.

The former verses represented to us the great end of Christ's appearance to judgment, with respect to the wicked, it was for punishment, "They shall be punished with everlasting destruction, &c." Now here we have assigned the gracious design of Christ's coming, with relation to the godly; "He shall come to be glorified in his saints." Where note, 1. The character of Christ's saved ones, they are saints, all such, and only such; not by visible profession barely, but by inward sanctification, and holiness of conversation also: and called also believers, who are endued with the grace of saving faith. Note, 2. The end of Christ's coming, with reference to his own children. 1. To be glorified in his saints; mark, not to be glorified by them, but to be glorified in them; the Head will not only be glorious in himself, but glorified in his members; the glory God gave the Son, he hath given the saints, and will put such a glory upon them in soul and body, as he himself shall be thereby glorified. 2. Admired in all them that believe, that is, he will do such things for believers, as will be to their own and others admiration; things that will not only exceed their unbelief, but their faith too. Plainly thus, the Lord Jesus, at the great day, will put such glory upon believers, as never was expected, either by themselves or others, and consequently, shall be admired, greatly admired, eternally admired by all beholders. But, Lord, if the glory put upon thy saints shall be thus admired, how much more shall thyself be admired, the bestower of that rich and transcendent glory! The glory of thy justice in the damnation of the will be wicked admired, but not comparably with the glory of thy mercy in the salvation of believers. Oh! how will this strike the adoring angels into an ecstasy of holy admiration, and transport thy admiring saints into an eternal rapture, when thou shalt come to "be glorified in thy saints, and admired in all them that believe!"

11 Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our God would count you worthy of this calling, and fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power:

In these words, St. Paul assures the Thessalonians, that although he could not come to them, that yet he prayed fervently for them: We pray always for you; the faithful ministers of Christ can as soon forget themselves as their people in their prayers to God. Observe next, What he prayed for, on their behalf. 1. That God would count them worthy, that is, fit and meet for this calling; that is, for the forementioned glory which they were called to the expectation of, for they were already called; and therefore calling, here, must denote that unto which they were called, even the kingdom of glory. 2. That in order to this, God would fulfil, fully perform and accomplish his whole purpose, here called his pleasure, and the pleasure of his goodness, to show that nothing but his own goodness was the cause of his own purpose. 3. He prays that God, by his own power, would strengthen the work of faith in them: and the work of faith with power. Where note, That we are not only saved by God's good pleasure, but by faith. 2. That there is no saving faith, but is a working faith. 3. That faith is wrought by a wonderful power, which doth produce wonderful effects.

12 That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Our apostle declared, at ver. 10. how Christ should be glorified in his saints hereafter; now he prays that the name of Christ may be glorified in them here. Where note, That sanctifying grace maketh christians a glory to the name of Christ, not by adding any glory to him, which before he had not, but by setting forth that glory which he already hath. Note, also, That as the name of Christ is glorified in the saints now, so they shall be glorified in him then, and glorified with him and by him. The same glory, for kind, shall be put upon the head and members: grace is the only way to glory, and glory will be the certain reward of grace.

CHAPTER II.

The former chapter was spent in a consolation against trouble, this in a caution against errors, or to rectify their judgments concerning the time of Christ's second coming. An error had crept in among the Thessalonians, concerning the speedy and immediate coming of Christ to judgment whilst they were yet alive; which error satan had set on foot to subvert their faith, and expose the whole christian doctrine to contempt: therefore, to guard them against this fabulous error, he thus bespeaks them:

NOW we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him,

As if the apostle had said, "Brethren, we beseech you as you assuredly expect the coming of Christ, and do love, look, and long for that day when it shall go well with you, and Christ will appear to your glory, that you be not troubled, &c. Learn hence, That the coming of Christ to judgment is a truth well known, firmly believed, and earnestly desired by all true christians; well known, because the apostles, when they went abroad to proselyte the world, usually began with this point: firmly believed, for a day of judgment was never denied by any, but those whose interest it was that there should be none; and earnestly desired, in respect of Christ our Judge and Saviour, and in respect of ourselves, who shall be sharers in the happiness of that day. Observe, 2. The apostle calls the coming of Christ a gathering together unto him; intimating, that when Christ shall come, all the saints shall be gathered together unto him; at the day of judgment there shall be both a congregation and a segregation, a congregation of all believers, to make up the number of Christ's train and attendants, and that in one troop they may be brought into the heavenly kingdom: and a segregation, he shall separate the sheep from the goats, and sever the wicked from among the just, Mat. xiii. 44.

2 That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand.

Note here, 1. The error which the apostle disapproves, namely, that the day of Christ, that is, the day of judgment, was then at hand, to come in a few years, which was very true with respect to his coming to destroy Jerusalem, but not as to the final judgment. Learn hence, That the time of Christ's coming to judgment must be patiently expected, but not positively determined. Note, 2. The effect which this error might produce, namely, trouble and unsettledness of mind; "That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or troubled;" implying, 1. That errors breed trouble and disquietude of mind. 2. That christians should be so established, and have such a constancy of mind, that they should not be easily shaken and moved from the faith. Note, 3. A removal of all the supposed foundations of this error, or the means which these impostors used to entice the Thessalonians to embrace it: and they are three; namely, spirit, word, and letter; not by spirit, that is, be not shaken in mind by any pretence of spiritual or divine revelation; nor by word, by any pretended message or word from us; nor by letter, that is, not by any thing contained in our former epistle, or in any spurious and counterfeit writings, passing under the apostle's name, mentioning as if Christ should come in that age wherein they lived. We need not wonder that St. Paul is so careful to obviate this error of the present coming and appearance of Christ, because, should the Thessalonians have depended upon it, and found themselves deceived in their expectation of it, it might have caused great trouble to them, and even shaken their steadfastness in the faith.

3 Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition :

*As if the apostle had said, "Let no man deceive you in this article of your faith, by any pretence whatsoever; for before Christ's coming, there shall come a great falling away from the catholic faith, and by that means the man of sin will be revealed, who is the son of perdition." Note here, 1. Such a proneness there is in the nature and mind of man to embrace and entertain error, when once vented, that there is need of repeated dissuaves from it, and to guard persons against the poison and infatuation of it; "Let no man deceive you by any means." Note, 2. A general apostasy or defection of the visible church from the faith of christianity, must be before Christ's coming to judgment; "Except there come a falling away first;" it is foretold as a thing that would certainly come to pass. Note, 3. The revelation of antichrist declared, "That man of sin shall be revealed, the son of perdition: where, by the man of sin, understand not a particular and individual person, but a society and succession of men, such as is found in and amongst the papacy, where the sodomy, blasphemy, incest, adulteries, sorceries, murders, treasons, which are not only committed, but countenanced, and not only acted, but authorized, do most evidently declare that there never was such an apostasy from christianity since it had a being in the world, as is found amongst them." Note, 4. This man of sin is also styled the son of perdition. 1. Actively a destroying son, one that brings others to destruction. 2. Passively a son that shall be destroyed, antichrist and all his adherents shall be destroyed, utterly destroyed by Jesus Christ, and his kingdom shall perish without any hope of recovery; first destroying, and at last destroyed. Where note, That our apostle at the first, the very first mentioning antichrist, doth declare his destiny: at his first rise he declares his fall and ruin.

4 Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped: so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.

Our apostle proceeds in the farther description of this man of sin, by a twofold note of distinction, namely, by his enmity and opposition, and by his dignity and exaltation. Observe, 1. His enmity and opposition; "he opposeth himself," that is against Christ, as his name, antichrist, signifies; opposing him in his doctrine, in his offices, in his members, corrupting his doctrine, debasing his offices, persecuting his members. Observe, 2. His dignity and exaltation, which consists of two parts, 1. "He exalteth himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped;" that is, he exalteth himself above all magistrates, emperors, kings and princes, who are called gods, because representing his person, as his vicegerents, usurping a power over all civil authority, enthroning and dethroning princes at his pleasure. 2. His arrogance is set forth in relation to God himself, that "as God he sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." By the temple of God, understand the church of God, the external visible church, which professeth the faith of Christ, and bears his name; in this temple of God he sitteth as an officer or bishop; and sits as God, that is, as a god upon earth, whom all must adore; kings kissing his feet, emperors holding his stirrups, and claiming the same power that Christ hath in and over the church, namely, an universal supremacy; an absolute authority, and an unerring infallibility. And the usurped titles given to him, declare that he showeth himself that he is a God, he is called supremum nomen in terris: The chief God upon earth; and that from him it is affirmed, that no appeals are to be made; no, not to God himself; that he can change the sacraments delivered by Christ, and decree contrary to scripture. Now to accept of these flattering titles, and to pretend to such an unlimited power, is to show himself that he is God.

5 Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you I told you these things?

Observe here, That the doctrine of the rise and ruin of antichrist is necessary to be made known; for though these things were not to come to pass in their days, yet St. Paul taught them before when present, and now repeateth it again when absent, to fasten it upon their mind and memories; it is necessary to deliver this doctrine, both to warn the faithful against delusion, and to fortify the faithful against persecution, and to keep them patient under it; for when antichrist is discovered, christians under his tyranny submit to sufferings more cheerfully; suffering under anti-christian persecutors is martyrdom, and suffering for Christ, as well as under pagan persecutors.

6 And now ye know what withholdeth, that he might be revealed in his time.

Observe here, 1. How our apostle intimated to the Thessalonians, that antichrist was not then revealed, and consequently that they were not then to expect the coming of Christ to judgment. Observe, 2. The impediment that then hindered his revelation; "Now ye know what withholdeth;" by which the Roman empire is generally understood; the man of sin could not rise to his greatness, so long as the Roman empire stood in its grandeur; for this seat could not be filled with two imperial powers at once: whilst the Roman emperor possessed Rome, the seat was full, and till it was void it could not be the seat of antichrist. But why did not the apostle name it then? Ans. That he might not incense the Roman emperors against the christians, as he must have done had he openly said, "Antichrist shall not come till the Roman empire is destroyed; he therefore covertly says, "Ye know what withholdeth."

7 For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way.

That is, the beginnings of antichristianity are secretly and mysteriously already working, which will bring antichrist himself forth in time, even antichristian doctrines, and the affecting of antichristian dominion; only the empire that now hindereth must be removed and taken out of the way. Note here, So great an enemy is satan to the salvation of mankind, that no sooner did Christ erect a kingdom in the world for saving sinners, but the devil sets up his esign in opposition thereunto. Antichristianism is almost as old as christianity: the mystery of iniquity soon appeared after the revelation of the mystery of godliness; though truth be error's elder, yet error is not much truth's younger; "The mystery of iniquity doth already work." And from these words, "He that letteth will let, till taken out of the way." Learn, That the greatest empire and monarchies upon earth have their final and fatal periods determined by God, beyond which they shall not stand; the Roman empire that letteth, shall be taken out of the way.

8 And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.

These words contain both the rise and ruin of antichrist, his revelation and destruction. Observe, 1. The title given to him, ὁ Ἀντισυμμεν, The lawless one; he that boasts himself to be above all law, and assumes to himself a power to dispense with all the laws of God, as we well know who does. Observe, 2. His revelation, Then shall that Wicked be revealed. God has revealed antichrist to the world, let none wilfully shut their eyes against him, but let him be shunned, and abhorred; if his adherents will not fall off from him, but be partakers with him in his sins, let them expect to be partakers also with him in his plagues; to continue his adherents is dangerous, but to turn his disciples is more dangerous; for that is a downright apostasy, and flat revolt from Christ to antichrist. How Almighty God may dispense mercifully with errors imbibed in our education, we know not, but to turn our back on the truth wherein we have been educated and instructed, makes it more dangerous to our salvation. Observe, 3. Antichrist's ruin, "Whom the Lord shall consume and destroy." Here note, That the apostle had no sooner discovered antichrist's rise, but he presently declares his ruin; the Lord shall destroy him; that is, the Lord Jesus Christ shall destroy him gradually, he shall waste away by little and little; as his rise was, such shall his ruin be; destroyed and consumed he shall be, but not presently, because God has an use for him, work to do for him, to scourge his people, to try his people, to unite his people. Observe, 4. How antichrist's ruin is accomplished; 1. With the spirit of his mouth, or the breath of his mouth: the expression denotes, 1. The facility and easiness of his destruction: it is done with a breath; the breath of God will leave him breathless: as he hath stood by the flat ering breath of men, so he shall fall by the consuming breath of God. The breath of God here denotes the preaching of the gospel, and intimates, that antichrist's destruction shall be by the ministry of the word, and the victorious evidence of truth; but besides this ministerial word, there will be a providential word, which God will make use of for antichrist's destruction: the former means we are to use, the latter God is to make use of. Again, 2. The destruction of antichrist shall be by the brightness of Christ's coming; at Christ's coming to judgment, the final ruin and utter destruction of antichrist shall be accomplished; let not the church then be discouraged, though antichrist remains, after all endeavour used for his ruin, it is sufficient we are assured that antichristians shall be finally destroyed; for the time, leave we that to God; if it be not till the day of judgment, or Christ's final conquest over all his adversaries, why should not we be contented to tarry for it, seeing infinite wisdom determines the time, as well as the thing itself.

9 Even him, whose coming is after the working of satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders.

An account is here given how antichrist doth acquire and keep up his power in the world: the first and great instrument is satan; after the working of satan, is as much as by the working of satan, denoting not only his pattern but his influence. The devil has a great hand over wicked men in the world, his way of dealing with them is most efficacious and powerful, he is certainly the first founder and main supporter of the antichristian state. Observe, 2. The subordinate instrumental means, by which antichrist gained his power in the world; namely, by pretended miracles; with all power, and signs, and lying wonders; miracles are called powers, because the effects of extraordinary powers; signs, for their use, because they sealed the doctrine to which they are applied; wonders, because they breed astonishment in the minds of beholders: now antichrist pretends to all these, but his are lying powers, lying signs, and lying wonders; because the greatest of his pretended miracles are fables, forgeries, impostures, diabolical delusions. Learn hence, That antichrist doth uphold and support his kingdom by a false show of signs, wonders, and mighty deeds; they are mira, but not miracula; what we cannot prove by the oracles of God, he endeavours to prove by the miracles of satan.

10 And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish: because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved.

Here we have a threefold description given of the subjects of antichrist's kingdom, they are described, 1. By the ways and means how they are drawn into this apostasy and defection, and that is, "with all deceivableness of unrighteousness:" where, by unrighteousness, understand his false doctrine and wicked laws, which tend to the making his disciples and followers injurious to God, unjust to men, and cruel to themselves; and by deceivableness is meant all manner of deceits and wiles, tricks and cunning persuasions, to make the world believe his unrighteous errors to be pure and innocent truths. Learn, That such as are ring-leaders to error, are men of no conscience, but find out all unrighteous ways and means to make their tenets plausible, and pass for truth; they come "with all deceivableness of unrighteousness." Again, 2. They are described by their doom and misery which doth wait them, they are such as perish; that is, such as are in an actual state of perdition, and without hastening out of it, are undone for ever. Learn hence, That the subjects of antichrist's power and seduction are those that perish. And, 3. They are described by their sin, which is the cause and reason of this doom: "because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved." Where mark, It is not enough to receive the truth in the light of it, but we must also receive it in the love of it, or it will do us no good; to make truth operative, there is required besides knowledge, faith and love; there may be knowledge without faith, and there may be faith without love, that is, without any affection to the truth believed; it was therefore a pious prayer of St. Austin, Fac me, domine, &c. "Lord make me taste that by love, which I taste by knowledge." As the certainty of truth calls for faith, so the amiableness of truth calls for love; if truth be not received into the heart as well as the head, it will not secure apostasy, nor prevent perishing.

11 And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie:

12 That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness.

The sin of those who are seduced by antichrist was mentioned in the foregoing verse; the judgment of such is here declared, in these verses, which is twofold, delusion in this world, and damnation in the next. 1. Delusion in this world. Here note, 1. The author of this judgment, "God shall send them strong delusion;" as it is a sin, God has no hand in it, but as it is a punishment, God has to do in it; there is a judicial tradition or delivering them up to a spirit of error who do not receive the truth in the love of it, and this without the least shadow of unrighteousness, punishing sin with sin. Note, 2. The degree or nature of the punishment, delusions, strong delusions; given up to the efficacy of error, which is discovered by the absurdity of those errors which they cleave unto, and by the obstinacy wherewith they cleave unto them. Learn hence, 1. The strong delusions may be, and sometimes are by God's own sending, 2. That by God's just judgment there is an infatuation upon the followers and abettors of antichrist, that they swallow the grossest errors, and believe the strongest delusions, to their own destruction. Note, 3. The issue and result of this punishment, that they should believe a lie; false doctrines are often called a lie in scripture: all the doctrine of the man of sin, with which he hath deceived the world, under the notion of truth, is one great lie; but besides this, he approves and applauds the doctrine of equivocation, and teaches that in many cases it is necessary, and in some very lawful to lie; these they call pious frauds, but they are indeed diabolical forgeries. Note, 4. Their dreadful punishment in the other world, "That they all might be damned, &c." Where mark, The punishment itself, damnation, for filling up the measure of their obduration, together with the justice and equity of it; expressed negatively, they believed not the truth, received it not with simplicity of mind, to be instructed and directed by it; positively, they had pleasure in unrighteousness, in unrighteous doctrines and practices. Learn hence, 1. That errors in judgment, as well as sins in practice, may bring damnation upon the souls of men. Error is as damnable as vice, for it is as contrary to the law of God as vice is. Learn, 2. That though all errors may bring damnation upon men's souls, yet some may be said more especially than others to be damning errors, such are the errors of antichrist, the man of sin. O! How dangerous then is it to be found amongst his followers? To be sharers with them in their sins, will render us partakers of their plagues.

13 But we are bound to give thanks alway to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, set forth a fatal apostasy from the sincerity of the christian faith and worship, here in this verse exempts the Thessalonians from the number of those that were endangered by it, and this he makes mention of, to their great comfort, and with thanksgivings to God; We are bound to give thanks, &c. Observe, here 1. The titles given to the Thessalonians by our apostle, brethren, and beloved of the Lord; not beloved of the apostle only, but of the Lord also, both with an antecedent love, bestowing grace upon them, and with a consequent love, believing in his name, and suffering for his sake. Observe, 2. His obligation to bless God on their behalf, he gave thanks; this showed his esteem of the blessing, he gave thanks always, which showed how deeply he was affected with the blessing, and he owns it as a debt which was due unto them; we are bound to give thanks, &c. Observe, 3. The matter of his thanksgiving, or the mercy which he was thus thankful for, and that was their election to salvation; "We are bound to give thanks, because God hath chosen you." Whence learn, That God's election either of ourselves or others to salvation, is, and ought to be great matter of thanksgiving unto God. Observe, 4. Their election is amplified, 1. By the antiquity of it, from the beginning, that is, from all eternity, John i. 1. "In the beginning was the word," that is, before the beginning, before God began to create any thing, the word was. 2. From the means of its accomplishment; and they are two, one on God's part, the sanctification of the Spirit; the other on their part, the belief of the truth. Where note, That election is to the means as well as to the end; and without the means, can the end never be attained: he that hath chosen us to salvation, hath chosen us to be holy, and to believe the truth, in order to salvation. Note, 2. That sanctification and holiness is not the cause of our election, but the effect and fruit of it. Note, 3. That sanctification being the fruit, it is also the evidence of our election: Sic se aperit decretum, thus the decree of God is made evident to us, the election of God is a secret in the bosom of God, it is only manifested to us by the effects, which are sanctification by the Spirit, and a sound belief of the gospel: where mark, a bare belief of the doctrine of the gospel saves none, unless accompanied with the sanctification of the Spirit. Note, 4. The necessary connexion between the sanctification of the Spirit, and the belief of the truth, even as between the cause and the effect, and they do also accompany one another; the gospel was a supernatural doctrine, and it was fit that it should be accompanied with a supernatural operation, how else should it be known to be of God? The gospel and the Spirit are inseparable companions; where the gospel is little known, there is little of the Spirit found; "He hath chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth."

14 Whereunto he called you by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The apostle comforted the Thessalonians in the former verse from their election, in this from their vocation; whereunto, that is, to which salvation, sanctification, and belief of the gospel, God hath called you, by our preaching of the word, to the obtaining of the glory purchased, and conferred by our Lord Jesus Christ. Note here, 1. The author of the Thessalonians' vocation, God the Father, he calleth you, that is, God, who from the beginning chose you to salvation. None but God, 1. Hath authority to call; he only is our proper Lord, and rightful Sovereign, our Creator, and our owner; therefore he has a right to call us to duty, and to require a duty from us, Jam. iv. 12. "There is one law-giver, who is able to save and to destroy." None but God, 2. Hath power to call; for to effectual call there is required not only the invitation of the word, but also the effectual operation of the Spirit; it is a word of divine power to give grace to graceless souls. Note, 2. The means, that is, the external and outward means, by which they were called; by our gospel, that is, by our preaching of the gospel to you. The ministry of the word is the great instrument in the hand of the Spirit for a sinner's effectual vocation, and bringing home to God. But why doth our apostle call it our gospel? Doth not that derogate from the authority of it, to appropriate it to any man? No: He calls it not his gospel by way of revelation, but in regard of dispensation only; and his gospel imported the great pains which he took in preaching of the gospel, and the hazard he ran in dispensing of the gospel to them. It is also a word of esteem, love and affection, what we love we call ours. Note, 3. The end of this calling, which is twofold, 1. Ultimate, to obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ: that is, the glory of heaven, and of the whole man, soul and body in heaven, called the glory of Christ, because purchased by him, promised by him, prayed for by him, conferred by him, and enjoyed eternally with him. 2. Subordinate, they are called to faith and holiness, in order to salvation; for there must be a likeness between the person calling, and the persons called, without likeness to him, we can never love him; and without loving of him, must never expect to live with him. From the whole, learn, That such as are elected and chosen of God, are in time effectually called by faith and holiness to obtain eternal glory and happiness.

15 Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle.

Our apostle having abundantly comforted the Thessalonians in the former verses from their election and vocation, he closed the chapter with an exhortation to them to perseverance and constancy in the truth: Therefore, brethren, stand fast. Observe, 1. The relative particle, therefore, that is, because God hath chosen and called you, and given you such assurance of his favor, and such advantages against error and seduction, therefore let it be your care to persevere; assurance of salvation doth not encourage negligence, but engage to greater diligence. Observe, 2. The duty inferred, Stand fast: it is a military word, used by captains to their soldiers, to prevent a cowardly and treacherous revolt; he had been describing a great apostasy that would come, now bids them be upon their guard and stand fast. Observe, 3. The means directed to, in order to their steadfastness and perseverance, namely, to hold the traditions which they had been taught, either by word or by epistle. Here note, 1. The act, Hold with a strong hand, hold against all assaults, whether of error or persecution. 2. The object. The traditions taught, either by word or by epistle. Where mark, that all the apostle's doctrine, whether preached when amongst them, or written to them in his absence from them, he calls traditions; so that holding the traditions here, is nothing else but perseverance in apostolical doctrine. From the whole note, 1. That what assurance soever we have of God's preserving us in the truth, yet are we bound to use all possible care and caution, in order to our own preservation. Note, 2. That it is our duty to stand fast in the faith of Christ, and profession of godliness, whatsoever dangers or temptations we may be exposed to. Note, 3. That the doctrine of christianity, taught by the apostles, is a tradition, and that holding this tradition, is the best means for standing fast in the faith of Christ. Note, 4. That whilst the apostles were in being, there were two ways of delivering the truth, namely, by word of mouth and writing: Whether by word or our epistle. Note, 5. That now, when they are long since dead, and we cannot receive the doctrine of life from them by word of mouth, we must stick to the scriptures and written word, against all pretences to unwritten traditions, or pretended revelations, because the scriptures are a perfect rule both for our faith and practice.

16 Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself and God even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace, 17 Comfort your hearts, and stablish you in every good word and work.

Our apostle having abundantly comforted, and affectionately exhorted the Thessalonians in the former verses, now concludes with fervent prayer for them. Where observe, 1. The person prayed to, our Lord Jesus Christ, and God our Father. Where note, 1. That prayer must be made to God alone, he only knows all our wants, and he alone is capable of hearing and helping us. Note, 2. That Jesus Christ is here invoked together with God the Father; surely his Godhead is hereby proved, for he that is the object both of internal and external worship, is God, our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God even our Father, &c. Observe, 2. The ground of audience and success in prayer, which hath loved us, and given us everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace. Where note, 1. That God's love to sinners, manifested in their redemption by Jesus Christ, giveth great boldness and encouragement in the duty of prayer. Note, 2. That God hath given all believers solid ground of substantial and perpetual consolation, he hath given us everlasting consolation. Note, 3. That God hath given all believers hope, a good or well grounded hope of eternal life, and this hope is a great encouragement to the duty of prayer. Observe, 2. The blessings prayed for; increase of comfort, and perseverance or establishment. 1. The apostle prays for increase of comfort: "Our Lord Jesus Christ, and God our Father comfort your hearts." Where note, That all true comfort flows from God, and that the heart is the proper seat of spiritual comfort: Ps. iv. 7. "Thou hast put gladness into my heart." 2. For establishment and perseverance; "and stablish you in every good word and work:" by every good word, is meant sound doctrine; by every good work, holiness of life. Learn hence, That establishment in faith and holiness is a great and necessary blessing, earnestly to be sought of God in prayer; as at all times this blessing is to be sought, so especially in unsettled times, that when we are most in danger of falling by temptation, we may be kept by the mighty power of God through faith unto salvation.

CHAPTER III.

Our apostle closed the foregoing chapter with a fervent prayer for the Thessalonians: he begins this chapter with requesting their prayers for him. It is a mutual duty which ministers and people owe to each other, to pray one for, as well as one with another: though St. Paul was an apostle, and one that gave himself unto prayer, yet he found need of the help and benefit of the Thessalonians' prayers; and accordingly thus he speaks them.

FINALLY, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free (No. 62.)

course, and be glorified, even as it is with you;

Observe here, 1. A courteous and loving compellation, brethren. There is a threefold brotherhood, which the scripture takes notice of betwixt Christ and believers, betwixt believers themselves, and betwixt the ministers of Christ and their beloved people. Observe, 2. St. Paul's passionate request and supplication, Brethren pray for us. Learn hence, That an interest in the prayers of all those that have an interest in God, is the passionate desire and earnest request of all the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ; there is nothing that the ministers of Christ do more want or need, nothing that they so much desire and crave, as the spiritual alms of their people's prayers; their work is a work of the greatest weight, of the greatest labor, of the greatest difficulty and opposition; and, alas, their shoulders are no stronger than other men's, to stand under the weight of this burden; wonder not then they cry out so importunately for the help and benefit of their people's prayers. Observe, 3. The subject matter which he desires them to pray for, "that the word of the Lord may have a free course, and be glorified;" in the original, that the word may run and be glorified; a metaphor taken from a water-course, where the current flows freely without interruption, or obstruction. Quest. When may the word be said to have free course? Ans. When it is freely preached, and successfully preached; when it is preached without external opposition, and accompanied with the Spirit's internal operation. Learn hence, That it is the standing duty of the people of God to wrestle with God at the throne of grace, for the free course of the word in the labors of his ministers; "pray that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified." But when may the word be said to be glorified? When God is glorified in and by the word, by the conversion of sinners, by the exemplary conversation of believers: then is God glorified when his word is entertained. Observe, 4. The argument to excite the Thessalonians to pray for the success of the word amongst others, namely, the great and good success which God had given it amongst them that it may be glorified, as it is with you. Thence learn, That such as have felt the power of the gospel themselves, to their conversion and salvation, should pray, that others may partake of the same benefits, by it and from it, together with themselves; herein they show their love to God, and charity to the souls of men.

2 And that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men; for all men have not faith.

In the former verse, St. Paul desired the Thessalonians' prayers with reference to the word; here he requests it with relation to himself, that his person might be preserved, as well as his preaching prosper; that so long as God had any work for him to do, he might be preserved from the rage and fury of the unbelieving Jews, and persecuting Gentiles, who followed him from place to place, to give him trouble; "that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men." Where note, The odious character with which the apostle brands the enemies of his ministry, he calls them unreasonable men, whom no reason or argument could convince and satisfy; and wicked men, of vicious lives and debauched practices: they are usually the vilest and worst of men, the very dregs of mankind, who set themselves to persecute the preachers, and oppose the preaching of the gospel. Next, he subjoins a reason why he did so earnestly desire their prayers for deliverance from dangers, because all men have not faith, neither fidelity, nor faithfulness, much less, sincere faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; for then they would not oppose his gospel, nor persecute us from place to place, for the plain and persuasive preaching of it. Where note, That what profession soever a person makes of godliness and religion, and how high soever his pretences are for external devotion, yet if he opposes the gospel, in the power, purity, and progress of it, he is, and may be deservedly styled, an unreasonable and wicked man, who wants fidelity, moral honesty, and real virtue, and acts only for his own interest, and to please a party.

3 But the Lord is faithful, who shall establish you, and keep you from evil.

Our apostle had prayed for the Thessalonians' establishment before, chap. ii. 17. he assures them of it now; God will establish you, and keep you from evil; from all evil, and particularly from the evil of apostasy; and the argument for assurance is drawn from the fidelity of God, and his faithfulness in all his promises: The Lord is faithful, who shall establish you. Learn hence, That the christian's establishment in grace, his perseverance in holiness, and preservation from sin, depend upon the power and faithfulness of God, in concurrence with their own united endeavours to establish and preserve themselves from falling; The Lord is faithful, &c.

4 And we have confidence in the Lord touching you, that ye both do, and will do the things which we command you.

As if the apostle had said, "Although I gave you the assurance of God's faithful readiness, according to his promise, to do every thing that is requisite on his part, in order to your establishment in holiness, and preservation from sin, yet you must not, you cannot expect the assistance of God, except you also add your own endeavours, as I have commanded; and accordingly I have good confidence, that what I command you in the Lord, or by the authority of the Lord, both now and hereafter, at all times, shall be performed by you. Where note, The character of that obedience which the gospel directs; it must be universal and perpetual; ye do all things that I command you, and I have confidence that ye will do."

5 And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ.

As if he had said, "That we may not be mistaken in this our confidence, we pray, that the Lord will direct your hearts into the love of God, which will constrain you to this obedience." Where note, That to direct man's heart right into the love of God, is the work of God: The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God. Note farther, That these Thessalonians did love God already; for the apostle had before commended their work of faith, their labor of love, and yet here he prays, that their hearts may be directed into the love of God, &c. Learn thence, That the hearts of the holiest and best of saints do stand in need of a more perfect and constant direction into the love of God; as ships that are best rigged need a pilot, so they that love God most, need to have their love ordered and directed to the best advantage of his glory. Observe farther, From the phrase here used (direct) that God works upon man as a rational creature; he changeth the heart indeed, but he doth it by direction, not by violence and compulsion! The Spirit's conduct is sweet, yet powerful; it changes the will, but without offering violence to the freedom and liberty of the will; we are not forced, but directed; the Lord direct your hearts.—Again, the Lord direct your hearts; it implies, there are many things that would wreath and bend, crook and turn our hearts another way, and divert our love to a contrary object, to the world and the flesh; therefore we had need pray with earnestness, The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God; it follows—and into the patient waiting for Christ. Note here, 1. The true character of a sincere christian: he waits for the coming of Christ: such as love Christ fervently, long for his coming greatly. Note, 2. How patience qualifies these holy ardors, and longing desires which the saints have to be with Christ; though love sets us upon the wing to be gone, yet patience commands us to wait Christ's own time of going: vehement love needs the allay of patience: most need much patience to die, but some need as much patience to live: therefore says the apostle, "The Lord direct your hearts into a patient waiting for Christ;" intimating that the saints of God have great need of patience, to enable them to endure that state of distance and separation from Christ so long as they must endure it in this world: well then might the apostle pray on behalf of the Thessalonians, "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and patient waiting for Christ."

6 Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us.

Our apostle here enters upon a new subject, namely, that of church discipline; not only exhorting, but commanding and requiring them to excommunicate from their society every brother or christian professor walking disorderly, and not after the tradition or doctrine delivered by him against such persons. Note here, 1. That though the apostle did often-times entreat and beseech, yet he had authority to enjoin and command; We command you, brethren. Note, 2. That this authority to command he had not of himself, but from Christ; We command you in the name of the Lord Jesus. A minister must look that his commands be grounded upon the authority of Christ, or else they will lie with small weight upon the consciences of his people. Note, 3. The special duty he commanded them to the practice and performance of, namely, to excommunicate scandalous and disorderly persons from their communion and familiar society; that ye withdraw yourselves. A man that is guilty of a notorious scandalous sin, ought to be suspended from familiar converse and society with the saints, to shame him into repentance, before a public declarative excommunication casts him out of the church; "We command you to withdraw yourselves from every brother." Note, 4. The offender described, a brother; that is a professor of christianity, be he who he will, and let his rank and station be what it will,

if he walks disorderly, like a soldier that keeps not rank and file, as the word signifies, if he walks not after the tradition which he has received of us, that is plainly according to the rule and direction of the gospel, let him be avoided. Hence learn, That there is no church-member, whose rank and station, whose quality and condition, doth exempt his disorderly scandalous walking from ecclesiastical censure; "Withdraw from every brother that walketh disorderly."

7 For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us: for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you.

8 Neither did we eat any man's bread for naught: but wrought with labor and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you:

9 Not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an ensample unto you, to follow us.

In these verses, the apostle plainly intimates, whom he meant by the disorderly brother mentioned in the foregoing verse: it is the idle person, called disorderly, for this reason, because almighty God having fitted man for, and ordained him to labor, he that will not do so, deserts the order in which God has placed him, and thus renders himself disorderly. To condemn which practice, St. Paul propounds his own example to their consideration and imitation; declaring, that he did not eat any man's bread before he earned it, but wrought with his own hands in the day-time, and sometimes in the night, at his trade of tent-making, that he might not be chargeable to any of them; not but that he had power to demand maintenance for his ministry, but he chose rather to depart from his right, and to labor in his calling, to excite others to do the like. Note here, 1. That had not St. Paul labored in his calling of tent-making, he had not been a disorderly person; but, lest any should think so he takes away, and cuts off all occasion of suspicion, by working with his hands; his ministerial office would have freed him from the charge and imputation of idleness, and made maintenance from the church his due; but idleness the apostle observed, was a growing sin, which needed an example as well as doctrine to subdue it; and accordingly the apostle sets one; "I have behaved myself not disorderly or idle amongst you, but wrought with labor and travail night and day." Note, 2. It is commendable to follow good examples, but much more to set a good example: as ministers ought to be patterns, so people ought to be followers; and their sin will be much the greater, and their punishment much the sorer, who do not follow their ministers' doctrine, when they have seen it exemplified in their conversation. Note, 3. There have all along been some persons in the world who have looked upon the work of the ministry as a very easy calling, yea, as an idle calling, that a little time, a little pains and labor is enough for it, whereas the labor of the ministry, in the exercise of the mind, may justly be esteemed the greatest of labors; yet we see people all along have not judged it so, but the ministers of Christ find it so, Note, 4. From the poverty of St. Paul's condition, that he had nothing before-hand, but was forced to earn his bread before he eat it. Learn, That it pleases God sometimes to measure out a very hard lot to his own children, and to give but little of earth to those who glorify him most upon earth; and those upon whom he intends to bestow extraordinary measures of glory in heaven, are cut short, very short of these outward comforts. Here behold, St. Paul, a chosen vessel, one of the holiest men, and the most serviceable men that lived in the world in his time, yet without a penny in his purse, but what he wrought for with his hands, nay, working night and day for bread! Lord! how endearing are thy children's obligations to thy goodness, for their easy and plentiful circumstances in the world! What a favor it is to have fulness upon earth whilst we live, and the assurance of thy everlasting fruition when we die?

10 For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat.

11 For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy-bodies.

12 Now them that are such, we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread.

Observe here, 1. The solemn charge given by the apostle for every man to follow some lawful calling, and to be found, in the way of an industrious diligence; if any (being able) will not work, let him not eat (any part of the church's charity) so that the sin of idleness was directed contrary to the apostle's command, and to the apostle's example. Mark, It is not those that cannot work, but those that will not, whom the apostle excludes from the church's charity; poor men that will not work when they can, do forfeit the bread of charity from men: the rich men that live idly, do by that sin forfeit their food to God, yea, even their lives and their souls too; "If any man would not work, neither should he eat." Observe, 2. The apostle exhorts every man to eat his own bread; implying that the bread of idleness is stolen bread; idle persons shall be judged as thieves, though they eat that which was freely given them: drones deserve no honey, what they eat is stolen from the industrious bee; that is truly our bread which we labor for ourselves, or recompense those who get it for us by their labor: God has sent no man into the world to be idle; but as the providence of God disposes of every man, though he has never so much worldly wealth, yet he must be some way useful and serviceable in his generation. Observe, 3. One of the bad effects of idleness pointed at by our apostle; namely, an intermeddling (as busy-bodies) in other men's matters; an idle person that doth nothing to any good purpose, yet has a deal of business to answer for, done to very bad purpose; not for laboring, but busy trifling; the busy-body's business is very unprofitable business; the mind of man cannot be wholly idle, but must be employed in something, if not in doing good, of necessity in contriving evil; usually none are so busy in other men's matters, as they that neglect their own; those disorderly persons, who did not work at all, yet were busy-bodies, and, as such, censured by our apostle; "I hear there are some among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy-bodies."

13 But ye, brethren, be not weary in well-doing.

14 And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed.

15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.

Observe here, 1. How far St. Paul was from the censoriousness and uncharitableness of those men, who condemn a whole society, a communion, a church in general, for the misdoings of some particular persons in it, I hear, says he, there are some that walk disorderly; but ye, brethren, are free from these misdemeanors; you are painful in your employments, diligent in your callings, charitable in your distributions, be not weary in these instances, of your duty, but persevere in well-doing; when the ministers of Christ reprove the stubborn and disobedient for the neglect of their duty, they forget not to encourage and exhort the faithful and obedient to a persevering diligence in their known duty. Observe, 2. He directs them how to manage refractory persons, such as remained contumacious and disobedient to the admonitions given by this epistle: continuing disorderly, and refusing to labor; his advice is two-fold; he tells them what he would have them not do, and what he would have them do to such. 1. Negatively, What they should not do; namely, not to cut them off from the church by excommunication, despairing of their repentance and reformation; extreme rigor is offensive to God, and injurious to the church, as well as too much lenity and forbearance. 2. Positively, He exhorts that they consider them as lapsed brethren, and treat them accordingly, as those that desire and endeavour to reduce and reform them; in order to which he directs, first, to note or mark the disorderly persons; that is set a note of shame upon them. Next, To avoid all intimacy and familiarity with them. Lastly, To admonish them of their duty, that they may be brought, if possible, to repentance.

16 Now the Lord of peace himself give you peace always, by all means.

Our apostle being now to take his leave of the Thessalonians, closes his epistle with prayer. Where note, 1. The mercy prayed for, Peace; peace with God, peace with conscience, peace and unity among themselves as christians, peace with the men of the world, strangers, yea, enemies to christianity. Note, 2 The person prayed to, the Lord of peace; understand Jesus Christ, the prince of peace, the purchaser of peace, the procurer of peace, the preserver of peace. Note, 3. The perpetuity of the mercy prayed for, The Lord give you peace, not for a short time, but for continuance always, that is, at all times, and in all places, and with all persons. Note, The way and manner of obtaining this and all other blessings, it must be in the use of means; the Lord give you peace by all means, that is, in the use of all lawful and laudable means. Learn hence, 1, That the Lord himself is the author, procurer, and preserver of all that peace which his people enjoy; and therefore his people may boldly trust him for peace and safety, who is and will be styled, The Lord of Peace. Learn, 2. That such as will obtain this blessing of peace, must pray for it, and endeavour after it in a diligent use of all lawful means, which is the usual way and method in which God dispenses it. Learn, 3. That it is a lasting peace, a peace always amongst all persons and at all times, that a christian should pray for and endeavour after, that it may be enjoyed without cessation, and without interruption; "The Lord of peace himself give you peace always, by all means."

—The Lord be with you all.

17 The salutation of me Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle; so I write:

18 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

Observe here, 1. That in the former part of the verse he had prayed for peace on behalf of these Thessalonians, and this prayer was put up to Jesus Christ; The Lord of peace give you peace, which by the way is, a strong argument for the divinity of Christ; for none but God is to be prayed to, none but God can give peace, Isa. lviii. 19. "I create the fruit of the lips, peace, peace." Our apostle now having prayed for peace, next prays for the presence of God; "The Lord give you peace, the Lord be with you all." Learn thence, That God's gracious presence with his people in any plentiful measure, is annexed to their peaceable frame of spirit, and to their serious endeavours after peace and love, after unity and concord amongst themselves; and the contrary spirit and temper grieves the good Spirit of God, and provokes him to withdraw his quickening and comforting presence from his people; for these two petitions seem to have mutual dependency upon each other, "The Lord give you peace, and the Lord be with you all." Observe, 2. That the salutation written with his own hand respects his own writing, which did serve as a token or certain mark whereby his own epistles were distinguished from all counterfeits. The sending of salutations, either by word or writing, that we may thereby testify our sincere affection to absent friends, is not a matter of decency only, but of duty; not of compliment barely, but of conscience. "The salutation of me, Paul, with mine own hand." Observe, 3. His usual valediction and farewell wish, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen. As if he had said, "May the gracious and undeserved favor of God in Christ, with all the fruits and effects, the benefits and advantages of it be conveyed to you all without exception, and be the portion and privilege of every soul of you; and in testimony both of my affectionate desire and assured confidence, I say, Amen, so be it, so let it be." Learn hence, That there is an inexhaustible fountain of rich grace in Christ, and so copious are the streams of spiritual blessings which flow from it, that wish we never so much to others, yet there still remaineth enough for ourselves. St. Paul, who wisheth all grace to the Thessalonians, knew very well there was enough both for himself and them; and that how large a measure soever was bestowed upon them, there would not be the less remaining for himself; therefore doth he thus close and conclude his epistle, saying, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." Amen.

THE

TIMOTHY.

Timotheus or Timothy is the name of the person to whom St. Paul directs this and the following epistle; a name given him by his parents, to testify their pious desire that this their son should fear and honor God, according to the signification of his name.

His grandmother Lois, and his mother Eunice, bred him up in the knowledge of the scriptures from a child; he became first the disciple, and then the companion of St. Paul; was ordained by him, was very assisting to him, and inexpressibly dear to this great apostle, who knew how to value true worth in what age soever he found it; insomuch that St. Paul seldom mentions his name but with a mark of honor and esteem, calling him his son, his dearly beloved son, his faithful fellow-laborer, &c. He was a person of eminent gifts, and of a gracious disposition, but of a sick and weakly constitution, and being entered very young into the work of the ministry, St. Paul thought fit in his absence from him, to write two epistles to him, and to all succeeding ministers of the gospel after him, directing how to demean and behave themselves in their ministerial function.

In these two epistles, and that to Titus, we have a collection of canons truly apostolical, directing all bishops and pastors of the church how to govern themselves, and how to guide their people.

CHAPTER I.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Lord Jesus Christ, which is our hope;

Observe here 1. St. Paul asserts his apostolical authority, calling himself an apostle; not that Timothy questioned it, but he writes it for their sakes, over whom he was now presiding at Ephesus, that neither ministers nor people might despise what Timothy did, it being enjoined both him and them by so great an authority as was that of an apostle, Paul an apostle of Jesus Christ. Observe, 2. What authority St. Paul had for executing this office of an apostle, it was by the commandment of God and our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, by the appointment, injunction, ordination, and immediate commission of the Father and of Christ, by his voice from heaven, as the rest of his apostles were called by a voice from Christ on earth: in 1. Cor. i. he is said to be called by the will of God; not by his permissive will barely, but by his preceptive will particularly. Observe, 4. The title given to our Lord Jesus Christ, he is styled our hope, that is, the author of our hope, the object of our hope, the purchaser of what we hope for, the declarer to us of the hopes of glory expected by us. Where note; That our Lord Jesus Christ is undoubtedly and undeniably God, because he is our hope and trust: now, if he were no more than a man, though never so excelling, to make him our hope, would be to make ourselves miserable: for cursed is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh man his hope, Jer. xvii. 5.

(No. 62)

2 Unto Timothy, my own son in the faith; Grace, mercy and peace from God our Father, and Jesus Christ our Lord.

Observe here, 1. That endearing title which our apostle gives to Timothy, he calls him his son, his own son, his own son in the faith; because as some think, converted by him to the christian faith; others, that he was more thoroughly instructed, edified and encouraged by St. Paul, but converted before; possibly also, he may call him his son, because he was as assisting to him, as obsequious and observing of him, as a son is to a father, he being a young man, and the apostle now aged; or it may be he calls him his son, because he resembles him in his faith and doctrine, preaching and conversation, as a son resembles a father in face and manners. Consider Timothy as a spiritual son to St. Paul, begotten to the faith by him, and then the note is this, That the ministers of Christ cannot but bear a fervent and an affectionate love to those that are their spiritual children, their sons in the faith, and converted to Christ by their ministry; consider him as an assistant to St. Paul, a co-worker and fellow-laborer with him in the work of the gospel, and thus affectionately beloved by him; and we may learn for our instruction, how fervently the ministers of Christ should love one another, speak respectfully of each other, secure the reputation one of another, strengthen each other's hands, encourage each other's hearts in the work of God: we have little, God knows, very little love from the world: Lord! how sad is it that we should yet have less one for another: see how the heart of St. Paul and his assistant Timothy were knit together in love, like father and son to the great reputation, as well as the successful furtherance of the gospel!

3 As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, when I went into Macedonia, that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine.

4 Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions, rather than godly edifying, which is in faith; so do.

Note here, 1. The tender care which St. Paul took of the new planted church at Ephesus; when his office called him into Macedonia, he leaves Timothy behind him at Ephesus, to water what he had planted, and to build upon that foundation which he had laid; when I went into Macedonia, I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus. Note, 2. The charge and command which St. Paul left with Timothy at his departure from him, to take care that no new or strange doctrine be taught, or any other doctrine received by the church, than what was delivered by him; charge some that they teach no other doctrine. But who were these? Very probably they were the judaizing teachers, who strenuously endeavoured to corrupt the purity, and deprave the simplicity of the gospel. Thence learn, 1. That though the doctrine of Christ and his apostles was abundantly sufficient to salvation, yet the church of Christ, even the earliest days of christianity, were in very great danger of being corrupted early by other doctrines than those delivered by them. Learn, 2. That it is the great duty, and ought to be the special care of the ministers of God, that no new or strange doctrine be broached in the church of Christ; I besought thee—that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine. But a farther and more particular charge is given, ver. 4. That the church at Ephesus give no heed to fables or endless genealogies, which rather occasion wrangling disputes, than tend to edification in faith and holiness: by fables, we may understand vain and idle speculations, jewish scruples, frivolous observances; whatsoever in preaching is delivered by us, which doth not answer the great end of preaching, namely, to build up men in faith and holiness, is trifling, and not preaching; what we deliver signifies no more than a fable or an imaginary tale that is told. But what were these endless genealogies here spoken of? Ans. Not scripture genealogies, for those are not vain, but useful; not endless but determinate; but these were endeavours of some particular persons, who that they might have a pretence to claim kindred with Christ, did make their genealogies endless, drawing down their line of descent from David, &c. or else endeavours to prove themselves sons of Abraham and Isaac, privileges which they highly valued themselves upon, and rested in, saying, We have Abraham to our Father. Whatever they were, our apostle charges Timothy, that the church at Ephesus give no heed to them, nor to the preachers of them, and the reason is given, because they only occasion disputes and tend not to edification.

5 Now the end of the commandment is charity, out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned:

6 From which some having swerved, have turned aside unto vain jangling;

7 Desiring to be teachers of the law, understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm.

In these words our apostle smartly reflects upon the judaizing teachers, who were so zealous for the ceremonial law; that they mingled works with faith in the point of justification; the apostle tells them, that the end of the law, aye, and of the gospel too, is love; the end, that is, the aim, the scope, the design, the perfection and consummation, the perfecting end; the sense is, that all the duties which the law of God and the gospel of Christ doth enjoin, are designed only as means to advance and perfect our love both to God and man; the end of all Christ's doctrine is charity, or the bringing of men to love God and their neighbour. Observe next, the apostle describes the nature and quality of that love which is the end and design, the intention and perfection of the law, and the fountain from whence this love must spring and flow, namely, from a pure heart, or a heart purified by the Spirit of Christ from a good conscience, or a conscience purified by the blood of Christ, and from a faith unfeigned: implying, that love either to God or men, is not sincere, unless it proceed from a clean heart, and is accompanied with an holy and innocent life, and has faith for the root and principle from which it flows. Observe lastly, How he taxes these judaizing, and false teachers, with swerving from charity, purity, and faith, and turning aside to vain-jangling; and that whilst they affect to be thought learned teachers, and expounders of the law, they betray their own ignorance, not understanding either what they say, or whereof they affirm.

8 But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully.

Lest any should have apprehended, from the reflection he made upon the teachers of the law in the foregoing verse, that he did disparage and undervalue the law itself, our apostle in this verse declares, that the law rightly understood and preached was very good, given for, and serves unto excellent purposes, if we use it lawfully; that is, as we ought to use it, as God intended it, namely, as a perfect rule of life, to direct us in our obedience to God; but not so good as to expect justification by it; not good in opposition to the gospel, but in subserviency to the gospel; the law is good if used lawfully. Observe here, 1. Something implied, namely, that the law of God may be used unlawfully: but how and when may it be said so to be? Ans. When it is converted to unprofitable disputes, as was the case here, when men oppose it to Christ, when they seek justification by it, and the like. Observe, 2. Something expressed, namely, That the law of God, considered in itself, is good and excellent: it is good in regard of its author, it hath the authority of God stamped upon it; good in regard of the matter contained in it; good in regard of the end of it, to lead us unto Christ, Rom. x 4. Christ is the end of the law; good in regard of the use of it, and that, 1. To the ungodly, to restrain them from sin, to convince them of sin, to condemn them for sin. 2. To the godly, to discover sin more clearly and more fully, to drive them out of themselves, and from all expectation of righteousness and justification by any thing in themselves, or done by themselves; to cause them to put the higher value, esteem, and price upon Jesus Christ, and the benefits received by him. Thus the law is good; and if so, woe to the Antinomians, who deny the use and excellency of the holy law of God, who vilify it, trample upon it, and because it is not good for justification, affirm it is not good at all: What! is not gold good, because you cannot eat it for food? It was never intended for that purpose: is not obedience to the law as an eternal rule of holy living, and good works, agreeable to the demands of the law, necessary and good, though they never had the impress of God's ordination for our justification in his sight, he having provided a perfect and spotless righteousness for that purpose, which is highly pleasing to him? Lord! in the day when thou shalt come to plead with the world for transgressing thy law, how shall these men, who with tongue and pen have cried down the use and excellencies of thy law, show their heads before thee?

9 Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers,

10 For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for men-stealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine.

Our apostle here declares the persons, 1. Whom the law was not made for, and them for whom it was made: it was not made for a righteous man; that is, say some, it was not made for him as a burden, to be an uneasiness to him, because he has a love to it, a delight in it, and does voluntarily conform himself to the observations of it: others say thus, The law was not made for a righteous man, that is, the righteous man is not under the coercive or vindictive, but directive power of the law only; he is not under the curse of the law actually, though all are under it meritoriously; and accordingly the law was never made to terrify, and affrighten, and condemn them. Next the apostle declares for whom, for what persons, and for what purposes, the law was made, intended and designed; namely, for restraining and condemning, first, in general all lawless persons, sons of Belial, as the scripture calls them, that is, men without yoke; the moral law in general is a rule of holy living, and the gospel in particular is Christ's yoke: now such as will not wear the yoke of Christ, must expect no benefit by the cross of Christ: then he instances in particular, what and whom the law was made for, namely, to deter and restrain persons from all impiety and profaneness, from all disobedience and stubbornness, from murder and manslaughter, from sodomy, from whoredom, and all manner of uncleanness, either natural or unnatural, from theft, from perjury, from lying and falsehood, and summarily, to curb and restrain wicked men from the practice of every thing which is contrary to the pure and holy nature of God. Learn hence, That there is such a propensity and inclination in the corrupt and depraved nature of man to the practice of all sin, even the greatest, the vilest and the worst of sins, that the law of God with all its threatened punishments, is not sufficient to deter, to terrify, or restrain sinners from the commission of them; but such as will not be under the restraining, must lie under the condemning power of the law.

11 According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust.

12 And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry;

Note here, 1. The title given to the gospel, it is called, the glorious gospel of the blessed God: partly, because the glorious attributes and excellencies of God are more resplendent in the gospel, than in the law of God: as also, because the gospel brings more honor and glory to God than all the works of creation put together. Note, 2. He styles God, the giver of this gospel, The blessed God, to signify thereby unto us, his transcendent mercy and excelling goodness, in that being infinitely happy in the enjoyment of himself and his divine perfections, and incapable of any profit from, or advantage by, his creatures, he was yet pleased to give us his Son, his gospel, his Holy Spirit, to qualify us for, and bring us to the enjoyment of himself; According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God. Note, 3. What humble and thankful returns St. Paul makes to Christ, for the high honor, the rich and special favor conferred upon him, in calling him to dispense this glorious gospel, in calling him to it, in enabling him for it, and rendering him faithful and successful in it; "I thank Christ Jesus who enabled me, and counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry." Where note, That all the fidelity, ability, zeal, and courage, which the apostle had exercised in the whole course of his ministry, is attributed and ascribed unto Christ, and not to himself; his faithfulness was not the cause or motive, but the effect and fruit of the grace of God in calling him to the ministry, 1 Cor. vii. 25. having obtained mercy to be faithful: had our Saviour only discovered this faithfulness in him, and not conferred it upon him, there had not been such reason for this affectionate thanksgiving which here we find from our apostle; "I thank Christ, who hath enabled me, counting me faithful."

13 Who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious. But I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.

Note here, 1. What a prodigious sinner St. Paul represents himself before conversion. I was a blasphemer, persecutor, and injurious: a blasphemer, the highest sin he could commit against God: a persecutor, the highest sin he could commit against the saints: injurious, the highest wickedness towards mankind; sins of such an aggravated and accumulated guilt, that they wanted but one ingredient, namely, sufficient knowledge, to render them the sin against the Holy Ghost. Be astonished, O heavens, at the great and infinite mercy of God towards great sinners! Even persecutors and blasphemers may be, and sometimes are converted, and brought home to God. Note, 2. The reason assigned by him, why such distinguishing mercy was dispensed to him: he obtained mercy, because he did it ignorantly in unbelief. The word because, doth not import or imply, that ignorance in the apostle was the proper cause of mercy in God, but that it made St. Paul a more capable subject for receiving mercy, than he should have been, if he had maliciously sinned against knowledge; not that St. Paul by less sinning did merit the mercy of God; but his ignorance and unbelief being in a sort invincible, through the prejudices of education, they did much abate the malignity of his sin; for he was bred a pharisee, which was a sect that had an implacable enmity against Christ and his holy religion. Observe lastly, The end and design of St. Paul in relating that his bitter persecution of christianity was in the time of his ignorance, and not done deliberately, knowingly and maliciously; partly to justify the divine mercy and free grace of God which pardoned his fury, his rage and madness against Christ and his saints: for, had he done thus deliberately and maliciously, for secular ends and worldly advantages, it had been the sin against the Holy Ghost which was unpardonable: and partly, he mentions his ignorance, to prevent the abuse of divine mercy in men, and to let the world know that none might, or ought to take encouragement from his example, to be of a persecuting spirit, and yet hope for mercy, when at the same time they sin against light and knowledge, I would to God the persecuting spirit amongst us would consider this, which is as bitter as ever in the breasts of some against their protestant brethren: but blessed be God, legally restrained: they cannot now afflict those whom they do not affect; yet it is evident, they do not rejoice, and are not so thankful for their own liberty as they should, because those whom they hate enjoy theirs: their case is vastly different from our apostle's, they cannot pretend to do it ignorantly, though through infidelity in some sort they may.

14 And the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant, with faith, and love which is in Christ Jesus.

Still our apostle goes on magnifying the transcendent mercy and abundant grace of God, that called him first to be a christian, and then an apostle: and he shows, that this great mercy of God had great effects in him of faith and love, both towards God and his saints. Where note, How St. Paul, after his conversion, abounded and excelled in those graces which were opposite and contrary to the sins committed in his carnal and unregenerate state: he abounds in faith, in opposition to his former unbelief: and in love, in opposition to his former rage and cruelty. A christian's fruitfulness in grace and holiness after his conversion, ought to bear some proportion to his unfruitfulness in a sinful state before conversion; the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith and love; he now glorifies God by excelling in those graces which were opposite to his former sins.

15 This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief.

Observe here, 1. What an humble apprehension this great apostle had of himself: though then the greatest of saints in the esteem of others, yet the chiefest of sinners in his own account: for he doth not say, I was the chief of sinners, but, I am so: notwithstanding his repentance and remission, still he reflects upon his former unregenerate state and sinful condition. Learn hence, That when sin is mercifully pardoned, and cast behind God's back, the penitent sinner will and ought to set it continually before his own face to keep him humble, sensible of, and thankful for the rich grace of God dispensed to him, and received by him; Sinners of whom I am chief. Observe, 2. A most comfortable revelation made by the gospel concerning the redemption and salvation of a lost world, by our Lord Jesus Christ; He came into the world to save sinners. Where note, That the promised Messiah is come into the world; that Jesus Christ is that promised Messiah: therefore he was before he came, his divine nature pre-existing from all eternity; and in the fulness of time he assumed the human nature into an union with his God-head. Note farther, That the design of his coming was to save sinners, therefore, if man had not sinned, Christ had not come into the world: what need of a Mediator, had there been no breach? No need of a physician, had there been no disease. Farther, it was not absolutely necessary that Christ should come into the world to save sinners; but supposing God's purpose of saving sinners by way of a price and satisfaction, Christ coming into the world was indispensably necessary; for no mere creature could lay down a price satisfactory for the salvation of lost man. Observe, 3. The truth and certainty, together with the worth and excellency of the gospel revelation; This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation: for, what is the gospel but a revelation of pardon to condemned male-factors, a declaration of peace to proclaimed enemies, a proclamation of liberty to enslaved captives, an offer of cure to diseased persons? Oh! with what fervent zeal should this acceptable doctrine be preached by us, and embraced by our people, "That Jesus Christ is come into the world to save sinners!"

16 Howbeit, for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might show forth all longsuffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting.

Note here, That God is pleased sometimes to magnify his mercy in the conversion and salvation of the most notorious sinners, that so the greatest of sinners may take encouragement from thence to hope and trust in our Lord Jesus Christ for pardoning mercy: thus here this great blasphemer and persecutor was received to mercy, for a pattern and example to all such sinners as should hereafter forsake their evil and wicked ways, and give up themselves sincerely to the obedience of the gospel; "For this cause I obtained mercy." Such a conspicuous example of Christ's clemency and grace towards so great a sinner, whom he not only pardoned, but preferred to the dignity of an apostle, and sent forth to preach the gospel to the gentiles, would be a strong motive to all such sinners to receive the gospel with faith and obedience; there could be no reason for any of them to despair of mercy, when they saw such a pattern, such an illustrious instance of pardoning mercy before their eyes; "In me first Jesus Christ showed forth all longsuffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him."

17 Now, unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible; the only wise God, be honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Our apostle being ravished with a sweet sense of the greatness of God's pardoning mercy towards himself, concludes this whole matter with a pathetic doxology, and an affectionate thanksgiving unto God. As if he had thus said, The sense of the aforementioned unspeakable mercy calleth up my soul to speak with joy the praises of our God, who is eternal, immortal, invisible, the only God, absolutely wise, over angels and all creatures, to him be honor and glory for ever and ever."

18 This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy,—

What charge? To stay at Ephesus, say some, for the benefit of the church there; to charge the false teachers not to give heed to fables, say others; to keep the doctrine committed to him by St. Paul, as a faithful minister and soldier of Jesus Christ, against all opposition: these were the charges given.

—According to the prophecies which went before on thee, that thou by them mightest war a good warfare;

(No. 62.)

Here St. Paul encourages Timothy to go on in the course of his ministry with courage and faithfulness, according as it had been foretold or prophesied he should do. Here note, That amongst the gifts of prophecy, which were found in the apostle's time, and the discerning of spirits, this was one, to foretell and choose out persons meet and fit to do God service in the ministry. Timothy was thus chosen by prophecy, that is, by the direction of the spirit of God; he was designed and notified by the spirit of prophecy, and therefore the apostle bids him, as it had been foretold he should be a faithful minister, to approve himself to be such; "According to the prophecies which went before on thee, war a good warfare." Learn hence, That young ministers ought to take heed, that what hopes, expectations, and good opinions others have had of them, and what prayers, promises, and engagements have been made for them, may not be made void, but made good by them, in the future course of their ministry.

19 Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away, concerning faith have made shipwreck:

St. Paul had exhorted Timothy in the foregoing verse, "to war a good warfare;" here he directs him to two weapons which he would have him use in that warfare, namely, "faith and a good conscience;" neither will do alone: not faith without a good conscience, nor a good conscience without faith; hold both, faith in thy teaching, and a good conscience in thy practice; hold them fast; for faith stands with a good conscience, and falls with a bad one. Learn hence, That in the most perilous times, when some lose their graces and comforts, their present peace and future hopes, that we may not lose what we have on earth, and what we look for in heaven, our continual care must be, to get and keep, to have and hold, faith and a good conscience. And mark the encouragement given to exercise this care; some through the neglect of it, "concerning faith have made shipwreck." Our life is a sea-faring condition; a good conscience is the ark in which we are secure, made by God's own direction, as was that of Noah, and pitched within and without, as was his; a window it has in the top, to let in the light of heaven, but not the least crack or crevice below, to let in a drop of guilt, or endanger its own safety; it shoots off all the showers that fall downwards, and all the floods that rage upwards. Such a security is an innocent mind and a clear conscience; but if we do not hold fast a good conscience, but let it go, we have seen the last of faith, it sinks, it shipwrecks presently; "concerning faith have made shipwreck,"

20 Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander;

That is, of the number of those who have made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, are these two men. They made shipwreck of faith; but how? By renouncing christianity expressly? No: but implicitly, by denying the resurrection, and maintaining such doctrines as utterly subverted and totally overthrew the faith.

—Whom I have delivered unto satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme.

11 R

That is, whom I have inflicted the church's censure of excommunication upon, cast them out of the church, and delivered to satan, as God's executioner, who oft-times tormented the person with grievous diseases and bodily pains, called elsewhere, "The destruction of the flesh," 1 Cor. v. 5. Learn thence, That excommunication rightly administered, is a very solemn ordinance; a shutting out of heaven him who is justly cast out of the church's communion here on earth. But observe, the charitable intention of the apostle in denouncing this sentence of excommunication; it was, "That they might learn not to blaspheme." Mark. It was none of satan's desire, but the apostle's, that they might learn not to blaspheme: satan was then God's executioner, when the church wanted the countenance of the christian magistrate, and his design was destruction, but the apostle's was reformation; not to ruin, but reclaim. Learn, That the end of the church's censure, in particular of excommunication, is not to serve to the destruction of the censured, much less to the private revenge of the censurer, but to reform and reclaim the offender, that others may be warned, and the infection stayed: "Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander, whom I have delivered unto satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme,"

CHAPTER II.

The first chapter of this epistle acquainted us, that Timothy was left by St. Paul at Ephesus, to manage and superintend the affairs of the church in that city, whilst the apostle was absent from them, planting and propagating the gospel in other places; this second chapter directs Timothy to the management of his duty; and first, he exhorts him to take special care that prayers and supplications be publicly made, and so far as it was in his power, privately also, for all men. Whence we may learn, That religious and constant performance of the duty of prayer by all persons, publicly and privately, ought to be a special part of a minister's care and concern. His endeavour must be to bring his people to a great sense of this part of their duty to God their Maker, to bow their knees in public, private, and secret before him: for to live without prayer, is to live without God in the world.

I EXHORT, therefore, that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; 2 For kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty:

Observe here, 1. The duty which Timothy is exhorted to take care of, and that is, of the duty of public prayer; I exhort thee, that supplications, prayers, and intercessions, with thanksgivings, be publicly made; prayer being a special and principal part of public worship, the minister of God must be assiduous and constant in it; deprecating evils threatened, supplicating for mercies wanted, interceding on the behalf of others, and giving thanks for blessings received. Observe, 2. For whom we are to pray in general, for all men; because we cannot pray acceptably for ourselves, if we pray only for ourselves: this is the noblest exercise of charity, and which God has put in the power of the poorest man upon earth to exercise; "Let supplications and prayers be made for all men." Observe, 3. For whom we are more especially, and in the first place to pray; for kings, and all in authority, who were then Pagans and persecutors. Mark, He says not for lawful and rightful kings, but for such as have the pre-eminence and power in their hands, for all power is of God; "And the powers that be, are ordained of God." Rom. xiii. 2. But why first for kings? Because they are such great instruments of good to mankind, because they most want our prayers, as they encounter with more difficulties, are exposed to more dangers, and are liable to greater temptations than other men. Observe, 4. The arguments which the apostle offers, to engage us to this duty. "That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty;" that is, that we may be secured in the quiet and peaceable possession of our civil rights, and interests, and that we may be protected in the free exercise of our religion, and in the practice of godliness: for though no prince can take our religion from us, if we resolve to keep it, yet they may disturb us in the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of it: and therefore, it is our interest, as well as our duty, to pray for "kings, and all that are in authority."

3 For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour;

4 Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.

Our apostle subjoins his reasons for our praying for all men, because Christ came into the world to save all men, chap. i. 16. Because it is the desire of God, as well as the design of Christ, that all men should be saved, and because such prayers are good and acceptable in the sight of God. Learn hence, 1. That to pray for all men, as well enemies as friends, especially and particularly for rulers and magistrates, is good, acceptable, and agreeable to Almighty God, as all acts of obedience to his commanding will are: "This is good and acceptable in the sight of God." Learn, 2. That it is not only all sorts of men that God and Christ desire should be saved, but our Lord willed, together with his Father, the salvation of all men in general, so far as to make a sacrifice sufficient for all, if they repent and believe, and to offer a general pardon to all on condition of acceptance, and to send his ministers amongst all with the word of reconciliation, accompanying it with an hearty desire that all would accept of it; in short, what Christ offereth to all, he undoubtedly purchased for all; but he offers to all pardon and life upon condition of acceptance; therefore, he is so far willing that all men should be saved. Learn, 3. The means and method by which, and in which, God would have all men to be saved, namely, by coming to the knowledge of the truth. It is evidently false then, which some confidently affirm, That a man may be saved in any religion: no, he cannot come to salvation but by the knowledge of the truth; without the knowledge of God, without faith in Christ, where he has been revealed, and without obedience to the gospel, where it has been made known, there is no possibility of salvation; God would have all men to be saved, by coming to the "knowledge of the truth."

5 For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus;

6 Who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.

The apostle's argument runs thus, "We ought to pray for all, because there is one God, who is good to all, and one Mediator between God and mankind, who took upon him the common nature of all men, and gave himself a satisfactory and sufficient ransom for all, which was in due time testified and born witness to us by his apostles. Learn hence, 1. That the only way of friendly intercourse between God and fallen man, is by and through a mediator; God cannot look upon fallen men, out of a mediator, but as rebels, traitors, and objects of his vindictive wrath: nor can fallen man, without a mediator, look up to God, but as a provoked majesty, an angry judge, and a consuming fire. Learn, 2. That there is no other mediator between God and man but Jesus Christ, who was born God and man; for though the apostle calls him the man Christ Jesus, this is not added to exclude the divine nature, from the Mediatorship, but emphatically to declare that nature, in which he gave himself a ransom for us; the human nature is the matter of our ransom, the divine nature gave worth and value to it; Christ suffered being man, and satisfied being God. Learn, 3. That this one mediator, Jesus Christ, gave himself a ransom for all; whoever perishes under the gospel, it is not because no ransom was paid for him, nor because it was not sufficient for him, for it is most notorious that God had issued forth an universal act of grace, offering pardon of sin, and eternal salvation to all men without exception, living under the gospel, upon condition of their believing acceptance; if they reject and refuse it, it is to their unutterable and inevitable condemnation. Learn, 4. That Christ's mediation and intercession is founded upon redemption: because he gave himself a ransom for all, therefore is he, and he only qualified to intercede for all, in virtue of that sacrifice which he offered for the salvation of mankind: therefore the distinction of the church of Rome, between a mediator of redemption, and a mediator of intercession, is groundless; for who dares plead with an offended God, as an intercessor on the behalf of sinners, that has not first, as a redeemer, satisfied the justice of God for sin? As there was no redemption wrought by any, so there is no intercession to be made by any, but by Christ; as there is but one God, so but one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus.

7 Whereunto I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity.

8 I will therefore, that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting.

Observe here, 1. Our apostle declares his authority to publish the gospel to the Gentiles, and his integrity in the publication of it; I was ordained an apostle, a teacher of the Gentiles, in faith and verity. Observe, 2. That according to St. Paul's commission, he gave directions to all sorts of persons for the regular performance of their duty. And, first, concerning the duty of prayer; I will, that is, God by me declares his will, that "all men pray," that they pray "every where" in the public assemblies, in their private families and apartments; "lifting up the hands," in token of expecting to receive an answer from heaven; lifting up holy hands; let their prayers be holy, accompanied with faith and charity; "without wrath and doubting;" a peaceable heart is as necessary in prayer, as a pure hand; it is in vain to ask in prayer the favor of God with anger and revenge in our heart against man; to pray with doubting, is opposed to faith, to pray in wrath is opposed to charity; as if the apostle had said, pray both in actual faith and love; there must be faith in prayer, otherwise we cannot lift up holy hands without doubting; there must be love, otherwise we cannot lift up holy hands without wrath; "Therefore" says the apostle, "I will that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting;" he and his service must be holy, that will serve God acceptably.

9 In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array;

10 But (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works.

The next apostolical precept here given, is to women concerning their apparel and attire, that at all times, but especially in public worship, they use such apparel as becometh modest and chaste women, expressing by their outward garb the inward gravity and modesty of their minds; not like proud and alluring persons, with embroidered hair, gold and pearl, to attract the eyes and hearts of the simple. Note 1. That the attire which all persons wear ought to be such as may answer the end for which apparel was appointed; which was to hide and shroud our nakedness, for differing and distinction of sexes; as also, for distinguishing between the qualities and ranks of persons: garments also are for defence and protection, and for decency and ornament. Note 2. That though persons of quality are not prohibited to wear such garments, though costly, as become their degree, yet none are to study the external adorning of the body, so much, as to neglect the inner man by good works. Note 3. That all attire, 1. is forbidden, which suspected women use either to provoke to lust in others, or to show inclinations to it themselves. 2. All such attire as, by the richness and costliness of it, shows pride and vanity of spirit, and an ambition to excel others; not but that there may be pride under mean apparel, and oftentimes is. 3. All such attire as is unsuitable either to the time or place of worship. Note 4. That this precept, ought not to be slighted, by women, as of small moment, because the two great apostles, St. Peter, and St. Paul, do both give it in charge unto them. Note lastly, That the men are by no means to look upon themselves as unconcerned in this apostolical precept given to women: it is much more inexcusable in them to affect gaiety and gaudy dress; for it is vain and foolish, troublesome and uneasy, the nurse of idleness, attended with luxury and wantonness, and very often with immodesty and lewdness, and it is the great bane very often of justice and charity. How many are fine and gay, but at the expense, and sometimes at the ruin, of the poor tradesman? And how oft is that spent in vain decking, which ought to be laid out in the poor's clothing?

11 Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection.

12 But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence.

Still our apostle is directing Timothy how persons should and ought to manage themselves in the public assemblies, and particularly how women ought to behave themselves at the time, and in the place of worship; let, says he, the women in your assemblies; "learn in silence, with all subjection" to the better sex; "for I suffer not a woman to teach" publicly, and to "usurp authority over the man," to whom God has given authority over her, but rather according to her duty let her learn in silence. Here note, 1. That it is only women's public teaching that is here forbidden; not their private teaching their children, or servants, or the younger women, or even their husbands themselves upon a fit occasion, Acts xviii. 26. we find Priscilla privately instructing Apollos. Note, 2. That none ought to teach but who have authority, and teaching is exercising that authority, a woman therefore teaching publicly doth usurp an authority not due unto her. Note, 3. There were some women in the Jewish church endowed with extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, and particularly with the gifts of prophesying, who did teach publicly; as Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, and Anna; and it is probable that the speaking of these extraordinary women encouraged others to do the like, whom the apostle here directs his speech against; "I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority, &c."

13 For Adam was first formed, then Eve.

14 And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression.

Here St. Paul offers a double argument to enforce the duty of subjection upon the woman, and to prevent her usurping of authority over the man, namely, because the man was first in the creation; "Adam was first formed, then Eve," and the woman was first in the transgression; "Adam was not deceived," that is, first and immediately deceived, but the woman being deceived was first in the transgression; she was guilty of her own and her husband's transgression, and accordingly, not only by the law of her creation, but as a punishment for her transgression, God has placed her in a state of subjection, and given the man authority over her, which authority she usurps over him, whenever she undertakes to be a public teacher of him: these two considerations doth the apostle make use of, to humble the woman, and to keep her within the sphere of her proper duty.

15 Notwithstanding, she shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith, and charity, and holiness with sobriety.

Our apostle having in the precedent verse acquainted us with the woman's sin, that she "was in the transgression," and first in the transgression, in this verse he informs the woman of a part of her punishment for that her transgression, and that is the severe pain and extreme peril of child-bearing; he acquaints her, 2. With a comfort and support under that punishment, and that is an hope of salvation, "she shall be saved in child-bearing." 3. With the condition upon which that hope of salvation is grounded and bottomed, "If she continues in faith, and charity, and holiness with sobriety." Learn 1. That pain in child bearing is a part of that punishment which was inflicted by God upon the woman for her first sin; and accordingly the woman's sorrow and sensible feeling of the pains of child-birth ought to bring to remembrance her original and first transgression; surely when the woman feels the original punishment, it ought to remind her of her original sin, as a child ought to remember his fault at that very instant when he is under his father's rod. Learn, 2. That the infliction of this punishment (the pains of child-bearing) even unto death, is and shall be no hindrance of the woman's eternal salvation, if there be found with her those holy qualifications and gracious conditions which the gospel requires; partly in regard of the relation which God stands in to her, partly in regard of the covenant which God has made with her; a child is as much a child under the rod as in the bosom; neither the father's stroke, nor the child's grief, can dissolve that relation. Learn 3. That faith and charity, holiness and sobriety, with a perseverance therein, are the great conditions of the gospel upon which the woman's eternal salvation in that hazardous condition doth depend; "she shall be saved in child-bearing, if she continue in faith, and charity, and holiness with sobriety;" the words may also refer to the woman's temporal deliverance in the time of travail, and the sense runs thus: she shall be saved in child-bearing, that is, she shall go through the pains of child-birth with safety if she continue in faith, putting her trust in God for deliverance, in charity exercising compassion to those in the like condition, and in the exercise of temperance, sobriety, and chastity, according to her matrimonial vow.

CHAPTER III.

The design of our apostle in this chapter is to instruct Timothy in one of the most important parts and duties of his office, namely, to take great care whom he did admit into the sacred function. And accordingly he gives him a catalogue of several qualifications, not fewer than sixteen, which ought to be found in the person whom he did ordain for public administration in the church of God. Thus he speaks. ver. 1.

THIS is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work.

Observe here, 1. Our apostle acquaints Timothy with the dignity, honor, and excellency of the sacred function;

He that desireth the office of a bishop, that is, to rule and teach in the church of God, he desireth a good work, that is an honorable employment. As if our apostle had said, "Know, O Timothy, that as to the office of a bishop, whoever desireth it, doth desire a very great and excellent work: it is not a bare name, title, dignity, a plate of honor and command; but a work, a work of vast importance, labor and difficulty: take heed, therefore, whom thou dost admit, and of those that are also admitted into the sacred function, to consider the great weight of that important service, to enterprize it with extraordinary dread and caution, looking upon their office, not with aspiring but tremendous thoughts; for who is sufficient for these things?"

2 A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach.

Here we have St. Paul's positive character of a bishop, and what he ought to be, who is admitted into that high and honorable office in the church of God; he ought to be blameless, a person free from scandal, without any just ground of blame: the life of a bishop should shine so bright that others may not only behold it, but admire it, and guide their lives by the example of it: the husband of one wife: that is, one at a time; not guilty of the sin of having many wives, or of putting away the wife by divorce, as the Jews frequently did for frivolous causes. Here note, 1. The apostle's command (that the bishop be the husband of one wife) doth not oblige him to marry, but it establishes the lawfulness of his marriage, if he sees sufficient reason for it. Nor, 2. Does the apostle here forbid successive marriages, as if when a bishop has buried one wife or more he might not lawfully marry again, for this he elsewhere allows. 1 Cor. 7. 8. from this it may not be in a man's power to abstain; many lose their first, and sometimes their second wives so soon, that were not after-marriages lawful, all the ends of marriage must be frustrated as to them; yet may we suppose from these words, and many others, that St. Paul proposes a greater degree of chastity to church governors than to other persons. Vigilant, very diligent and watchful in the performance of his whole duty, not long absent from his flock, nor negligent when he is amongst them; sober, governing his passions and appetites, reducing those rebellious powers under the dominion of reason and religion; of good behaviour, in his words, in habit and garb, in his deeds and actions, neither proud and supercilious, nor morose and sour, but affable and easy, kind and courteous, of a composed temper and grave behaviour: given to hospitality, not to sensuality; it is not the keeping of a free table, and an open house for all comers, which St. Paul points at, but charity in entertaining strangers, poor christians, that left their country by persecution, or such as travelled upon their lawful affairs from place to place; the free relieving of such as are necessitous, and exposed to want and hardship, is the hospitality pointed at by our apostle, apt to teach, that is, both knowing and willing, able to teach, and forward to it, having both skill and will, ability and dexterity, for that part of his duty, one that is neither ignorant of his duty, nor negligent in the performance of it.

3 Not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous:

The negative character of a bishop now follows, showing what he must not be: Not given to wine; that is, to much wine, no inordinate lover either of wine or strong drink, no wine-bibber, nor sitter at wine in his own house, much less at taverns and public houses; no striker, either with hand or tongue, no quarreller, that cannot keep his hand from hurting, no word striker, no striker with his tongue in passion and anger; a word, we say, wounds deeper than a sword; the ministers of God may wound the consciences of men with the sword of the spirit, but they must not wound the reputations of men with their own wrathful spirits; we must use our tongues rather to heal than wound, or if at any time to wound it must be in order to healing: not greedy of filthy lucre; no inordinate lover of money, which makes a man base and sordid, both in getting, keeping, and spending; but patient, meek and forbearing, not rigidly exacting his due; not acting summo jure, but rather parting with somewhat which in strictness may be his right for peace sake; not a brawler, or contentious person, often engaged in law suits, but of a mild and peaceable disposition; not covetous, nor enslaved to the love of wealth; possess he may the good things of this life, but not be possessed by them.

4 One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity;

5 (For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?)

A bishop being a ruler in the church of God, Timothy is advised to choose such a one to rule in the church that well and wisely governs his own family, having his children in due subjection, and both he and they behaving themselves with becoming gravity; and St. Paul subjoins a reason for this apostolical injunction, arguing from the less to the greater, thus, the church is a large family, the bishop's house a less; the former requires greater skill in governing of it than the latter; if then a man cannot rule a less province, how shall he manage a greater? if he cannot keep up his authority with decency and becoming gravity in his own family, how shall such a one be thought fit to be entrusted with the care of the church of God? Great are the obligations which lie upon the ministers of God, above all men, to guide and govern their own families, to keep their children in due subjection, and their servants in great order; because their family-miscarriages reflect greatly upon their authority and prudence, and the world will pronounce them unfit for rule in the church of God who cannot govern their own house; if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God? Learn hence, That he who knows how to rule his own house well, is in a good posture of spirit for public rule; the same wisdom, justice, and holiness, for kind, but more extensive, acts in either sphere, and will regularly move in both.

6 Not a novice, lest, being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil.

A novice, signifies a young plant ; here a young, raw, unexperienced person : yet not so much young in years as in knowledge : for Timothy himself was very young : not a novice in religion then, not one that is unexperienced in the mysteries of the gospel, undertaking to teach others before he has learnt himself. And the reason for this injunction is weighty ; Lest being puffed up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil, implying, that young, raw and unexperienced persons, when put into public office, are in very great danger of falling into the sin of pride, the devil's sin, and of exposing themselves to condemnation, the devil's punishment, because their knowledge is weaker, and their passions stronger, and their graces feeble, and they want that experience which should consolidate their judgments, are therefore in great danger of self exalting ; for none are so proud and confident as the ignorant and injudicious. Note here, That when St. Paul says, Lest he fall into the condemnation of the devil, it is, as if he had said, "Lest he be condemned for the same sin that the devil was condemned for, which was pride," not that the devil will condemn him for his pride, for the more proud a man is, the more the devil approves him : nor is it the devil's office to condemn, but to execute ; he is the executioner, not the judge ; he will not condemn for sin, but he will eternally torment them whom God condemns.

7 Moreover, he must have a good report of them which are without ; lest he fall into the reproach and the snare of the devil.

Note here, How needful it is for a minister to be of an untainted reputation ; a bishop must be of good report, saith St. Paul ; it is necessary for his own salvation that he be good, and for the salvation of others, that he be accounted so : great is their sin, then, who go about to blast a minister's reputation, because something of reputation is absolutely necessary to render his ministry successful. Note farther, He must have a good report of them that are without, that is, without the church, unbelieving Jews or Gentiles, with whom he formerly conversed ; lest becoming contemptible, and so not able to perform his duty as he should, he gives occasion to the heathen to blaspheme christianity and to reproach him for his former course of life.

8 Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre.

Note here, 1. That there are but two sorts of fixed church-offices mentioned by St. Paul, bishops and deacons : as the church had its own bishop, so likewise their own deacons : these were at first instituted for the service of the poor ; the alms of the church were brought to the altar, the deacons received them, and distributed them among the aged and impotent from house to house : now because they were thus employed, the apostle adviseth them to beware of those faults that are frequently committed in common conversation, as light and vain discourse, saying one thing to one person, and the contrary to another. Let the deacons be grave, not guilty of levity, but serious and composed, men of a modest and becoming carriage, not double-tongued, nor over talkative persons, nor saying one thing to one person, and the contrary to another, according to the place or company they fall into ; not given to much wine ; not the thing, but the excess, is forbidden ; not greedy of filthy lucre, seeking to get wealth by sordid ways and means.

9 Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience.

That is, they must be sound believers, and of an upright life, maintaining truth of doctrine, and soundness of faith, by sincerity of heart and integrity of life.

10 And let these also first be proved ; then let them use the office of a deacon, being found blameless.

Here Timothy is directed not to put any persons suddenly into the office of a deacon, but first to prove them for some considerable time ; and their sufficiency being approved, let them be ordained, and use the office of a deacon.

11 Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things.

In the original it runs, Let the women ; by which is meant either the deacons' wives, or the deaconesses, who were appointed to take care of the poor women, as the deacons were of the men : understand it of both ; these qualifications are very excellent and well becoming of both ; they ought to be grave and sober, not light and airy, not slanderers, not devils, says the original ; the sense is, not railers, nor false accusers, but diligent and faithful in all business, and trusty in all affairs. It is not enough and sufficient that the ministers of the gospel themselves be of a grave and sober conversation, but their wives also must and ought to take especial care that they demean themselves answerable to their place and station, and suitably to the character which their husbands bear ; so must their wives be grave.

12 Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well.

That is, "Let not any such be admitted a deacon who has more wives than one, or that hath injuriously put away one, and married to another ; and let them show, by the good government of their own children and household, that they are fit to govern the church of God." Note here, That the higher offices of the church were usually chosen out of the inferior ; and accordingly, the qualifications for both offices, namely, that of bishops and deacons, are for the greatest part the same, both in this epistle, and in that to Titus.

13 For they that have used the office of a deacon well, purchased to themselves a good degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

That is, "Although the deacons be as servants to the bishops, yet such as use that office well, according to the foregoing rules, by so doing do purchase to themselves a good degree above the vulgar, and also have further hopes of being advanced in the church to higher offices; and when they preach the word (as did Philip and Stephen), they might do it with great boldness, and with expectation of success, living suitably to the qualification of their function; and walking according to the rule of the gospel, which they professed and taught.

14 These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly :

15 But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth.

As if the apostle had said, "I do hope to come to thee very shortly; but if I tarry long, or be prevented at last, as I am uncertain, I write these things to thee, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to converse in the house of God, the church of the living God, in which thou art a pillar and firm buttress of the truth." Some by the pillar here, will understand the church, as being the foundation on which truth is built, and giving it authority; but she is therefore the church of Christ, because she holds the truth, and it is essential to her being to maintain and teach all necessary truths; she holds it forth, and publishes it to the world, sustaining it, and supporting it as a pillar doth the king's proclamation: the truth receives not its authority from the church, but the church receives authority by adhering to the truth. Others, by the pillar, understand Timothy, and that St. Paul is here exhorting, that according to his office, Timothy should be a pillar and buttress of truth in the church. Hence Gal. ii. 2. James, Cephas, and John are said to be pillars there, as is Timothy here; a pillar in the church, signifies a man that is well rooted and grounded, and strong in the faith; this he exhorts Timothy to be. Observe here, 1. The church's surpassing dignity; she is called the house of God, in which he dwells: God is present in all places, even in hell itself, by the immensity of his being; but the church is his palace, the place of his peculiar residence. Observe, 2. The ministers of the church's important duty, namely, as pillars to support, maintain and uphold the divine truth against all those that seek to corrupt and suppress the same. Be thou, O Timothy, in the church of God as the pillar and ground of truth.

16 And without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory,

Our apostle having exhorted Timothy, in the preceding verses, to behave himself worthily in the church of God, and as a pillar, supporting, maintaining, and upholding the truths of God, in this verse he reckons up six principal heads of evangelical truths, which are to be asserted and defended by him; ushering them in with this preface, Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness. Learn, That our holy faith, our christian religion, is a mystery, a great mystery, and unquestionable mystery, a mystery of godliness, a mystery hidden in God, Eph. iii. 9. hidden in Christ, Col. ii. 3. hidden in the scriptures, Rev. iii. 18. hidden in and under the types and shadows of the ceremonial law; nay, hidden even in the gospel itself, for we know but in part: and if christianity be a mystery, then the knowledge of it is the effect of divine revelation and supernatural discovery, not to be known by the light or benefit of nature, but God reveals it to us by his Spirit: Farther, if it be a mystery, then the dispensation of it is a special favor, an arbitrary and voluntary discovery of it, to whom, when, and how far God himself pleases: finally, if it be a mystery, then it is to be apprehended by faith, and not to be fathomed by reason; faith looks at revelation, reason calls for a demonstration; faith embraces like Abraham, what reason laughs at, like Sarah; Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness. This is St. Paul's magnificent preface, which requires not only the assent, but challenges the obedience and adoration of our faith. Observe next, the six principal heads of evangelical truth here reckoned up, for Timothy to study, to preach and defend. 1. God was manifested in the flesh; that is, the second person in the Godhead appeared in our human flesh and nature. Astonishing mystery! That the Creator of the world should become a creature, lodged in a stable, and cradled in a manger! The infinite Deity and finite flesh met in one person, and yet the Godhead not humanized, nor the humanity deified, but both invisibly conjoined; the human nature was united to the Godhead miraculously, assumed integrally, united inseparably. 2. Justified in or by the Spirit; that is, the Spirit was Christ's witness, that he was no impostor or deceiver, but the promised and expected Messiah, working all his miracles by the power of the Spirit, raising himself from the dead, and thereby declaring himself to be the Son of God with power, by the Spirit of holiness; and by sending the Spirit after his ascension into heaven, down upon his disciples here on earth: thus the Spirit justified Christ really and truly to what he professed himself to be, and sealed his doctrine to the world. 3. Seen of angels; they celebrated his birth, and gave notice of it to the world, ministered to him in the wilderness, succoured him in the garden, were present at his resurrection, accompanied him in his ascension: Seen of angels. Lord, what a stupendous sight was this! For man to see an angel is wonderful, but for an angel to see God become man, was soul amazing; they sang their gloria patri at his birth, they beheld and applauded his happy victory over satan, in the desert. Oh! with what eyes did they look upon his bloody sweat in the garden! With what officiousness did they roll away the stone in the morning of the resurrection! And with what universal triumphs and acclamations did they accompany him to his celestial throne! 4. Preached to the Gentiles; the wall of separation between Jew and Gentile being broken down, Christ was by his commissioned apostles, preached to the Gentile world; the Jews were once children, and we dogs; theirs was the bread, ours were the crumbs; but now are we made fellow commoners with them, heirs of the same, partakers of the same glory. 5. Believed on in the world:

Christ came into the world in so despicable a manner, that he was disregarded by the world, who are allured and taken with pomp and outward magnificence: therefore, that any should believe on him in the world, is a just wonder, and a mystery of godliness; though Christ be liberally preached, yet he is sparingly received. Isa liii. 1. Who hath believed our report? Christ is believed on in the world; but, alas! comparatively but by few. Lord, enlarge the number of thy believers, and confirm that number in believing. 6. Received up into glory, where he sits in his glorified humanity, united to his glorious Deity, with all that blood and gore wiped off with which he was besmeared in the day of his passion, and his body shining brighter than ten thousand suns. This body the heavens must contain till the restitution of all things, when he shall come from heaven as he went into heaven, attended with glorious angels, summon the whole host of saints to meet him in the air, that so they may ever be with their Lord. Oh! strengthen our faith in this desirable happiness, and set our souls a-longing for the full fruition and final enjoyment of it. Amen.

CHAPTER IV.

The last verse of the foregoing chapter having fully acquainted us with the great and mysterious doctrines of christianity, namely, That the Son of God was manifested in the flesh, justified in and by the Holy Spirit, seen of angels, preached to the Gentiles, believed on in the world, and at last received up into glory; our apostle comes in this chapter to acquaint Timothy with (that he may forewarn the church of) an apostasy and revolt from the christian faith, though not in all parts of it; yet from several main and fundamental parts of it; withal assuring them, it was no more than what had been long foretold; for the Spirit spake expressly, that in the latter times some should depart, &c. ver. 1.

NOW the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils:

2 Speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their consciences seared with a hot iron;

3 Forbidding to marry; and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth.

As if our apostle had said, "Although the mystery of godliness, the doctrine of christianity, be so clearly revealed, and fully confirmed, yet the spirit of prophecy has very plainly foretold us, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith once embraced by them, either in the whole or in part; turning apostates by giving heed to impostures and doctrines of men, teaching errors suggested by devils, who cover their lies with hypocritical pretences, and are men of hardened hearts, seared consciences, profligate lives; forbidding some, whom they have seduced, to marry, and commanding them to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving by them which do believe and know the truth." Observe here, 1. That the apostasy and defection of a considerable part of the christian church in the latter times was foreseen and foretold very long before it came to pass; by Daniel, say some, chap. ix: 37, 38, &c. by St. Paul, say others, in his second epistle to the Thessalonians; and in his first epistle to Timothy, the Spirit speaketh expressly, that some shall depart from the faith, that is, from the doctrine of the faith received, which we know the church of Rome has most notoriously done. Observe, 2. The cause of this apostasy and defection from christianity, Giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils. Quest. But what is here meant by doctrines of devils? Ans. These (says our reverend Archbishop Tillotson) can be no other doctrines than those tending to idolatry, which the scripture every where doth, in a particular manner, ascribe to the devil, as the inventor and promoter of; therefore he tells us, that, in some ancient copies, the words run thus: In the latter times some shall apostatize from the faith; for they shall worship the dead, having regard to doctrines of devils; so that the particular kind of idolatry into which some part of the christian church should apostatize, is here pointed at, namely, that they should worship souls departed, or the spirits of dead men, which was part of the heathen idolatry, into which the people of Israel did frequently relapse: these departed souls were called demons, and were esteemed a middle sort of divine powers, between the supreme gods and mortal men, whose office it was to be agents and mediators between the gods above, and men below; thus is the holy city trodden down by the Gentiles, that is, overwhelmed with the Gentiles' idolatry. Observe, 3. The persons revolting, who they are foretold to be; not all, but some only: In the latter times, some shall depart from the faith; not the whole visible church, but a very great and considerable part of it. Learn thence, That the true church of Christ was never wholly extinguished, nor the light of the gospel ever quite put out, no not in the greatest darkness that ever was, to overwhelm it; some (only) and not all, shall depart from the faith. Observe, 4. The persons described who should be the occasion of this apostasy and revolt, namely, such as speak lies in hypocrisy, and have seared consciences, that is, such stupid consciences as have lost the sense of good and evil, and do no longer do their office. These lies, which the apostate church of Rome is guilty of, the profound Mr. Mede styles, "Lying miracles, fabulous legends of the acts of saints and sufferings of martyrs, counterfeit writings under the name of the first and best antiquity." Lord! who could have coined or believed such monstrous stuff as the popish legends are fraught with, but such as are cauterized, past all feelings and tenderness both of conscience and sense itself. Observe, 5. The doctrines discovered which these apostates would teach, namely, the forbidding of marriage to some, and enjoining abstinence from some meats as unlawful and unclean to others, both which are called doctrines of devils, that is, wicked and devilish doctrines. Learn thence, That the popish doctrine forbidding marriage, not absolutely to all, but with restriction and limitation to some, to wit, their clergy, and all such as shall enter into holy orders, is a devilish and wicked doctrine; for it forbids that which the word alloweth, nay, in some cases commandeth, Heb. xiii. 4. Marriage is honor- able in all, and the bed undefiled; if honorable in all, then surely lawful for all; under the Old Testament, the prophets, priests, and Levites did marry; under the New Testament the ministers of God have a power to marry; 1. Cor. ix. 5. Have we not power to leal about a sister, a wife? And that they made use of their power, is evident from the following words, as well as other apostles and Cephas. The other wicked doctrine concerning meats is also found in the church of Rome, who by a law do oblige some orders of men, as monks do abstain from certain meats, reducing them thereby from their christian liberty to a conformity to the legal rites, which may well be reckoned as an apostasy from the christian faith: for although St. Paul, Rom. xiv. doth allow the forbearance of some sorts of meats to avoid scandal, yet he doth no where condemn the eating of them as unclean: the doctrine therefore of the church of Rome, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, is wicked and devilish.

4 For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving:

5 For it is sanctified by the word of God, and prayer.

Here our apostle assigns a reason why christians are forbidden, under the gospel, to abstain from particular meats, namely, because the distinction of meats (clean and unclean) is taken away, and every creature of God is good in itself, and clean to us, and nothing to be refused as unlawful or unclean, if it be received thankfully from God's hand; for it is sanctified by the word, that is, by the gospel; it is made clean to us, and lawful for us, that having taken off the difference of meats, and to the pure made all things pure. Note here, 1. The quality of all God's creatures as they come from him, and are given to us, every creature of God is good. Note, 2. The use of God's creatures consisting in their lawfulness unto us, and our liberty unto them, nothing is to be refused; so that there is no sin in the use of them, nor no religion in the forbearing of them, or abstaining from them; this liberty was given us by God, and restored by Christ, therefore we must not suffer our christian liberty to be impeached by Judaism. Note, 3. A condition necessary on our part, lest the creatures, otherwise good and lawful, should become unto us evil and hurtful, and that is thankfulness; If it be received with thanksgiving, with the thankfulness of the heart, expressed by the language of the lips. Note, 4. The way and means by which the creatures become clean and sanctified to us; namely, by the word of God and prayer. 1. By the word of God; here observe, A threefold word of God, by which the creature is sanctified, namely, the word of donation, the word of benediction, and the word of promise. By the first he bestows his creatures upon us, by the second he blesses the creatures to us, and by the third he confirms his blessing in Christ; in whom and by whom, we have a covenant right unto, and a sanctified use of all the mercies which we do enjoy. 2. By prayer, namely, as it obtains from God, first, A right improvement; and secondly, a comfortable enjoyment of all that we do receive: or thus, the creature is sanctified to us by prayer in the procurement of it, in the fruition of it, in the review and recognition of it, and God's mercy in it, with thanksgiving and praise, loving it after God, and for God, and in subordination to God. Thus then is every creature of God good; and nothing to be refused, being sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

6 If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith, and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained.

7 But refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness.

Our apostle proceeds, from this verse, to the end of the chapter, to lay several directions before Timothy with reference to his ministerial office. The first of which is, that he suggests unto, or put the brethren in remembrance of, those things which the apostle had taught him, in order to their preservation from the peril and poison of these impostors: thus doing he would approve himself a good minister of Jesus Christ, and one nourished up with the sincere doctrine of the gospel. Here note, that the ministers of the gospel are, in the first place, ministers or servants of Jesus Christ; secondly, and in subserviency, they are ministers of the church; as a nobleman's servant, employed by him to distribute wages, or appoint work to the inferior servants, is secondarily a minister to the servants, but primarily a servant to his Lord. The second duty that Timothy is exhorted to, is the avoiding and rejecting the doctrines of abstinence from meats and marriage, and to regard them no more than an old woman's tale, and to exercise himself unto real godliness. Note here, something that Timothy must forbear, and something that he must follow after: he must forbear, and refuse profane old wives' fables: if thou wilt not swim down the tide of these apostatizing times, take heed of steering thy course by profane, though ancient customs; refuse them with scorn, and reject them with anger: one way to prevent apostasy is to refuse ungrounded antiquity. That which Timothy is exhorted to follow after, is real godliness; this is his duty, both as a minister, and as a member of Jesus Christ; real godliness ought to be minded as every man's, especially every minister's chief and principal business; religion must be our chief occupation.

8 For bodily exercise profiteth little: but godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

By bodily exercise he meaneth corporal austerities, abstinence from meats and marriage; all the external exercises of religion: these do profit a little, though but a little, in comparison of the profit of godliness. Where note, that fastings, humiliations and watchings, with other bodily exercises, which serve to bring down the pride and wantonness of the body, have their proper and necessary use, and are expressive of a just revenge which a sinner takes upon himself for former excesses; they are, when wisely managed, what God accepts, but the least that God expects from us; Bodily exercise profiteth little. But observe, the universal usefulness of godliness to all the purposes of life: Godliness is profitable to all things. 1. It is profitable to make a man rich, to help him to get and increase an estate; because it makes a man wise and prudent, diligent and industrious, thrifty and frugal. 2. It is profitable to make a man renowned, as well as rich; it is the only way to attain a good name and reputation; the godly man is a worthy and excellent man, and he is an useful and serviceable man, and such do seldom miss of a good reputation in the world; those that want goodness themselves, will yet commend it in others. 3. It is profitable for pleasure, as well as for riches and honor; for a life of religion doth increase the relish and sweetness of all our sensible enjoyments, so far is it from abridging us of any earthly delights: and besides, it adds to us a world of pleasures of its own; thus godliness is profitable unto men in all things, having the promises of happiness both in this life, and that which is to come, annexed to it.

9 This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance:

10 For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.

Note, that this phrase of a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptance, used here, was used before, chap. i. 15. That Christ came into the world to save sinners. Learn thence, that this proposition, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, and this, that such sinners as of ungodly will become godly, and persevere in the practice of godliness, shall be happy in the life that now is, and that which is to come; these two propositions are faithful and remarkable sayings, worthy of the acceptance of all reasonable creatures. Note farther, that the belief of this proposition, that godliness has the promise of this and the next life, will cause all christians, as if did St. Paul, to labor and suffer reproach in the cause of God, and this without weariness and fainting. Note, lastly, the title given to Almighty God, the Saviour of all men, that is the preserver of all men: but especially of all good men, when their temporal preservation conduces most to the advantages of his glory and their good; or if it be understood of eternal salvation, we must take it thus, that he publishes and proclaims, offers and tenders salvation to all men, although believers only are actually saved, because they only accept the offers and conditions of salvation.

11 These things command and teach.

12 Let no man despise thy youth, but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity.

Still our apostle proceeds in farther direction and advice to Timothy, both as to his preaching and practice, both as to his doctrine and conversation. 1. As to his preaching, he requires it to be done with due authority: these things command and teach, that is, these things teach commandingly, and with a necessary authority; the ministers of God speak from God, therefore may command for God. 2. As to his conversation, he exhorts him to exercise such a becoming gravity in his deportment, that though he was very young, none might despise him or his function, because of his youth; where piety and modesty meet in young ministers, it will preserve their youth from contempt; and where levity and vanity are found, it will expose not only youth, but gray hairs also to contempt and scorn. 3. He directs him to be not only a president to all ministers, but a pattern to all believers; be thou an example of believers, and that, 1. In word, or speech; look that thy discourse be wise and instructive, not idle and impertinent, much less frothy and profane, but let something for edification always drop from thy lips. 2. In conversation look that thy gravity be beyond thy years, make up in thy deportment what is wanting in thy age; observe a just equality, neither to be too assuming nor too prostrate, behave not thyself either above or below thyself. 3. In charity. show benevolence, and exercise beneficence towards all mankind, according to thy ability and opportunity: nothing gives a minister a greater advantage for the success of his labors than charitable distributions; this gives us a throne in the hearts of our people, when wisely managed. 4. In spirit, that is, in zeal and warmth of spirit, in fervency of affection, in an active and sprightly zeal for the glory of God and the good of souls, such a zeal as may render thee industrious in feeding, governing, and instructing thy flock. 5. In faith, that is, in fidelity too, and constancy in the true religion, not enduring either to be huffed or wheedled out of the truth; for it is a sacred depositum, an holy treasure, which we must transmit to our posterity, as our forefathers did to us, with their precious blood. 6. In purity, in chastity and cleanness, abstaining from sensual lusts, from wantonness and worldly-mindedness; choose spiritual delights now, for they are the entertainment which we must live upon to eternal ages. By all this we see how much it is in a minister's own power to procure a due esteem of himself, at least to prevent his own contempt, since an holy and exemplary deportment, faithful and constant labors, never fail to do that in some measure: but if we fail here, what other methods soever we use, we shall find God making good his threatening, 1. Sam. ii. 33. that they which despise him, shall be lightly esteemed; nor will any titles, dignities, or preeminences above others, secure the guilty from the efficacy of this curse, which will cleave to their persons, yea, to their memories, like a girdle to their loins.

13 Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine.

14 Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.

St. Paul being uncertain when he should see this young laborer again, adds farther instructions to those already given him. And here, 1. He requires him to give attendance to reading, that is, be diligent in private reading the holy scriptures, to enable him to teach, instruct, and exhort others, what they ought to believe and know, and what they ought to practise and do. Where note, that the illuminations and teachings of the holy Spirit must not take off any ministers from reading and studying the holy scriptures, but we must fit ourselves the better thereby, to exhort, direct, and instruct others. 2. He stirs up and exhorts Timothy, not to neglect, but to excite, to use, and diligently improve those eminent gifts which were given him by prophecy, that is, according to the foregoing prophecies concerning him, and by laying on of the hands of the presbytery, when he was ordained. Where note, that the ceremony of laying on of hands in ordination, is very ancient and apostolical; not accidental or indifferent, but a very necessary rite in the performance of that service: neglect not the gift which was given thee, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. Note, 2. That persons ordained, ought, with great care and diligence, to stir up the gifts of God's holy Spirit conferred upon them; for negligence quenches the Spirit of God in them.

13 Meditate upon these things, give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all.

He exhorted him to read the scriptures before, now to meditate upon what he read. Where note, that if those who were inspired, and divinely qualified, must yet read, meditate, study hard, and employ their whole time to fit themselves for the ministerial work, what shall we think of the ignorance and impudence of our lay-preachers, who, without any such divine qualification, and without any call or commission, without giving themselves wholly to these things, dare presume to teach the scriptures, when they never understood them; nay, can hardly read them! Meditate on these things, and give thyself wholly to them; be in them, says the original, lay out thy whole strength and time in studying God's will, and making known thy people's duty. Three things are here implicitly condemned in persons set apart for the holy function; 1. Sloth and negligence. It is a painful service we are engaged in, and woe unto us if we be slothful in business, if we be sparing of our pains for fear of shortening our days, and hastening our end; verily the lamp of our lives can never burn out better than in lighting others to heaven. 2. Worldly-mindedness, 1. Pet. v. 2. feed the flock, but not for filthy lucre: the spiritual man must not so mind earthly things as to make them his principal aim and scope; for if so, he will act accordingly, and defeat all the ends of his ministry. The apostles had no settled maintenance, but their subsistence to seek; yet were wholly in these things. How much more should we be so now, who have our maintenance legally secured? How should we seek the kingdom of God and the welfare of our people's souls, seeing all other things are added to us, in measure, though not in excess? 3. Incumbrance by worldly business: he that must give himself wholly to these things, what leisure can he find for magistracy, for managing lawsuits, for farming of lands, and for secular concerns: we cannot make a business of two things so widely different from each other. Can we be spiritual persons and yet mere seculars in our thoughts and cares? Well therefore might St. Paul say to Timothy, But thou, O man of God, flee these things, 1. Tim. vi. 11. Observe lastly, the reason which the apostle subjoins why he would have Timothy do all this; that his profiting may appear to all men: he must read, meditate, pray, and study, that he may improve and profit himself; though he was inspired, yet he must not rely upon the spirit's assistance without his own endeavours; and his improvement by study must appear not barely to himself, but to others, to his people as well as himself, yea, to all persons: his growth and improvement by study and exercise must be so conspicuous, that all his flock may bear witness to it, and bless God for it. Meditate on these things, and give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear unto all men.

16 Take heed unto thyself, and unto thy doctrine; and continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee.

As if the apostle had said, "have a special regard to the piety of thy life, and to the purity of thy doctrine, and this continually; so shalt thou do what is in thee, to save both thine own soul, and the souls of all thy people." 1. Take heed unto thyself. Our lives must be such as become ministers of God; and preachers of righteousness: for the eyes of God and the whole world are upon us; the observing eye of God, the censorious and insidious eye of the world, who will charge the miscarriages of a single person upon the whole order, and condemn all for the faults of one: therefore let every one take heed unto himself; the honor of our profession requires it, the conscience of our duty challenges it, a due regard to the glory of God, and our own reputation commands it. 2. Take heed unto thy doctrine, that it be the pure and uncorrupted word of God, expounded agreeably to the sense of the ancient church, and of our own church in particular, which has with the greatest care followed the ancient pattern: many errors are abroad in the world, which have adulterated the truths of the gospel; it is therefore prudential and necessary, that the ministers of God keep at a great distance from every opinion which looks like heretical, and not to come within the reach of suspicion: it is not enough for us to be innocent, unless we appear so. Note farther, the order of the words: St. Paul bids Timothy first to take heed to his life, and next to his doctrine; not first to his doctrine, and then to his life; take heed to thyself and to thy doctrine: because the success of our doctrine depends upon the goodness of our lives; it is this must render our doctrine operative and effectual: this is the principal thing; we must do as well as teach: for who will believe him in the pulpit, who contradicts himself in his conversation? Therefore take heed to thyself and to thy doctrine. Note lastly, the great benefit of this course, and the blessed advantage of it; we shall save ourselves, deliver our own souls by our diligence and care; for the faithful nurse shall be paid, though the child dies at the breast; and not only ourselves, but our people also; them that hear us; that is, "we shall do our utmost, and all that lieth in us, to save the souls that are committed to us, that they may be our crown of rejoicing, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ, at his coming." God will pronounce us pure and innocent from the blood of all men; and if our people perish, their blood will be upon their own heads; which God avert for his mercy's sake. Amen.

CHAPTER V.

REBUKE not an elder, but entreat him as a father, and the younger men, as brethren:

2 The elder women, as mothers; the younger, as sisters, with all purity.

Our apostle here directs Timothy how to manage rightly that great and important duty of ministerial reproof: if aged persons, elders in office, or elders in age, do transgress, they must be rebuked, not magisterially, but fraternally, with humility and gentleness, according to their years: not with austerity and roughness: the elder men as fathers, the elder women as mothers, both with just deference and due respect: the younger also must not be treated with contempt, but with gentleness; the younger men as brethren, the younger women as sisters, both without pride and fierceness, and with all purity; shunning all levity and wantonness, and eschewing all that savoureth of immodesty or unchastity in thought, speech, look, or behaviour. Learn hence, that although the ministers of God must not flatter or favor any person, to the prejudice either of truth or holiness, yet must they put a difference between persons in their reproof; they must not deal with the aged as they deal with the younger, (when we speak reproof, we must also speak respect to the ancient spiritual fathers) no more than natural children must behave themselves proudly against the ancient, and basely against the honorable,

3 Honor widows that are widows indeed.

4 But if any widow have children or nephews, let them learn first to show piety at home, and to requite their parents; for that is good and acceptable before God.

5 Now she that is a widow indeed, and desolate, trusteth in God, and continueth in supplications and prayers night and day.

6 But she that liveth in pleasure, is dead while she liveth.

7 And these things give in charge, that they may be blameless.

Our apostle proceeds to give Timothy directions concerning widows, particularly those who were to be maintained by the church's charity, and to live upon it. Note 1. The persons who were to be relieved and supported by the church's charity, widows indeed; that is, such widows as were desolate, being deprived both of husband and maintenance at once; and having neither children, nor grand-children, nor near relations, in a capacity to relieve them; and they were also such as were resolved to continue in widowhood: these he required should be honored, that is, have respect shown them, maintenance allowed them, employment provided for them, to visit the sick and poor, and give notice of their wants to the church, and to spend their time in the exercise of devotion, trusting in God: continuing in supplication and prayer night and day. Note, 2. that such widows as had children and near relations, were to be taken care for, by them, and not by the church; let them learn to show piety at home, that is, relieve their own relations before they show kindness to strangers, or before the church be burdened with them: where the original word is very emphatical and significant: let them exercise religion and godliness towards their own house; implying, that to extend our charity to our nearest relations is a duty in the first place, and to perform it with cheerfulness is an act of religion and godliness, and that it is in vain to pretend to religion, if we see a relation in want, and are able, but unwilling, to relieve them. Note, 3. The character which St. Paul gave of some widows in his time; they lived in pleasure; with the censure which he passed upon them, namely, that they were dead, whilst they lived: she that liveth in pleasure, that is, licentious, sportingly, wantonly, profanely, to the dishonor of her husband's memory, and her own personal disgrace, she is dead in sin, dead to Christ and his holy religion, whilst she lives in the world; and so is not to be looked upon by the church as a vital member of it, much less to be maintained by the church's charity. This is what St. Paul thought needful to give Timothy in charge concerning widows, that so they might be found blameless, and without scandal to religion.

8 But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

That is, "if any professing christianity, and having ability, provides not for his own kindred, but especially for those of his own house, as parents or children, he liveth so contrary to the christian faith, that in effect he denies it, and is worse than an infidel, who ordinarily take care of their parents, and make provision for their poor relations." The old heathens held this among them as an universal principle of nature. To honor the gods, and provide for their parents; affirming, that no man can do any thing more acceptable to the gods, than by heaping favors upon their parents; and that nothing can be a greater evidence of atheism and impiety, than to neglect and despise them. Learn hence, that it is most unnatural to be hardened against those to whom we stand engaged by near relation or natural bonds; the light of nature teaches infidels much better.

9 Let not a widow be taken into the number, under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man,

10 Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children; if she have lodged strangers; if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work.

Our apostle had given directions concerning such widows as were to be maintained by the church's charity in the preceding verses; he speaks now of such widows as were to be admitted into the church's service, under the name of deaconesses, whose office it was to take care of the aged and impotent, to be stayed monitors to the younger women, to attend poor women in labor, and to assist at the baptism of the female sex. St. Paul advises that none be admitted under threescore years of age, and none that was divorced from one husband and married another; Let not a widow be taken into the number, that is, of church widows or deaconesses, under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man only. Next St. Paul lays down the general and particular qualifications of such widows as should be elected into the church's service: the general qualification is fruitfulness in good works: If she has diligently followed every good work. Where note, it is not her age alone, nor her poverty alone, but her christian behaviour before all, that gave her a right to the church's service and maintenance. The particular qualifications follow: if she has brought up children religiously, if she hath lodged strangers or christian travellers hospitably, if she hath condescended to the meanest offices, not disdaining to wash the very feet of poor christians in their journeying; if according to her ability she has done all the good she possibly could, though much short of what she desired. Note here, That in those hot countries persons travelled on foot, and without shoes, wearing only sandals; and having few or no inns for entertainment, or but little money to defray travelling charges, it was a very great work of pious charity to entertain christian strangers, to receive and lodge them in their houses, to wash and cool, refresh and cleanse, their feet, and to administer to their necessities; such widows as are thus qualified, he directs may be taken into the church's service, and partake of her maintenance.

11 But the younger widows refuse. For when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry;

12 Having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith.

13 And withal, they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also, and busy-bodies, speaking things which they ought not.

14 I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully.

15 For some are already turned aside after satan.

16 If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged; that it may relieve them that are widows indeed.

(No. 63.)

Next, he tells him what sort of widows he would have him refuse and reject, and by no means admit into the number of deaconesses, or the church's servants: namely, the young widows, who were not past child-bearing; and therefore waxing wanton against Christ, would marry: that is, growing weary of the church's service, and despairing of marriage in the church, would revolt from the faith, and marry some infidel out of the church: Having damnation; that is, committing a sin worthy of damnation, and bringing themselves into a damnable condition. Because they renounce their first faith, which they made profession of when they were baptized, turning apostates to please their infidel husbands, which the apostle calls, a turning after satan, ver. 15. to the great scandal of christianity. Observe next, Our apostle shows, that such young widows are usually idle, wandering about from house to house, prying into, and tattling about other folks matters; to avoid all which, he advises the young women, and particularly the younger widows, to marry and serve God in a conjugal relation, bearing and bringing up their children, guiding their families, and giving no occasion to the enemies of religion to reproach either it or themselves. From all which we may note, That celibacy, or single life, is no such state of holiness and perfection as the church of Rome would persuade us: we see here it has its temptations and snares, and those not a few nor small; and that our apostle, in some cases, and to some persons, recommends a married life before it. Observe lastly, for a close of his discourse concerning widows, he advises, That if any christian has any helpless widow of his own family, or amongst his relations, that he relieve and maintain her, if he be able, and not cast her upon the charity of the church, lest there be not a sufficiency to supply the wants of such as are widows indeed, aged and helpless; for any to eat the poor's bread, who are not poor, and to whom it does not belong, is robbery.

17 Let the elders that rule well, be counted worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine.

Our apostle proceeds next to give Timothy directions concerning elders; not old men in years, but elders in office, such as were employed in the governing of the church, and over and above that service, labored even unto weariness in preaching of the word, and expounding the christian doctrine, requiring that double honor be given unto such. Note here, 1. The elders' work and duty declared: To rule well; wisely to preside over, and discreetly to govern, the church of Christ; also to labor in the word and doctrine; to take pains in preaching the gospel upon all occasions; those that are advanced to the highest eminency in the church, will not think themselves above this part of their duty. Note, 2. The honor and respect challenged on their behalf: Double honor is their due; namely, an honor of reverence, and an honor of maintenance, and a double measure of either; some think it an allusion to the first-born, who was the priest of the family, and had a double portion amongst his brethren; the Levites succeeded them, and the ministers of the gospel these; who, when laborious in governing and teaching the church of Christ, deserved more honor and better maintenance than the unkind world is willing to confer upon them; who instead of double honor, sometimes deny them civil respect. Note, 3. In that the apostle styles the ministers' maintenance honor, it follows, that their maintenance is not to be esteemed in the nature of alms, but of a tribute paid by an inferior to a superior: neither is our maintenance mercenary wages, but such as ought to be given as a testimony of honor, as well as in the nature of a reward. As men they are worthy of, let them never fail to receive, double honor, who rule well, and also labor in the word and doctrine.

18 For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn: And, The laborer is worthy of his reward.

These words evidently show, that by honor, in the former verse, is to be understood maintenance: a place is here cited out of Deut. xxv. where the law of Moses forbade the muzzling of the ox that treadeth out the corn, but allowed him feeding all the time of working: in like manner, the labor of the church's guides, gives them a right to the church's maintenance and honor; but such as do not labor, have a right to neither.

19 Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses.

20 Them that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear.

21 I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things, without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality.

Here our apostle directs Timothy how to proceed in church-censures against open offenders: which plainly shows, that there was a right of judging and censuring offenders in Timothy, by virtue of his office. First, then, he begins to acquaint him with his duty in censuring an elder, and advises him never to admit an accusation against such, without the attestation of two or three witnesses. Because, 1. It is the interest of the church of Christ, that the reputation of its ministers be supported. 2. Because prejudiced persons will be ready to accuse without reason. Conscientious ministers shall never want accusers, if false accusers can but find judges that are willing to believe them: therefore, against an elder, receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses. Next he advises him, when there is a just or sufficient cause for censuring an elder, to do it publicly. Them that sin, that is, such elders as sin, and are convicted of it, and so are become scandalous by it, rebuke before all the church, before all the clergy, as in the synod, putting them to public shame, that others may fear to sin, seeing thee to punish so publicly and impartially. Lastly, he concludes his advice with a very solemn charge to Timothy, before God and Christ, and the glorious angels, to observe these rules of justice in ecclesiastical judicature, without preferring one man before another, doing nothing by a partial respect of persons. Learn hence, That so heinous is the sin of unjust and unrighteous judging, especially in ecclesiastical persons, and of such fatal mischief to the church, that all imaginable care and caution ought to be taken to prevent both the sin and the danger of it. I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, that thou observe these things.

22 Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins: keep thyself pure.

A twofold sense and interpretation is given of these words, 1. With reference to ordination, and so they are a caution to the governors of the church, to admit none into the sacred function hastily, rashly, without due examination, and sufficient trial; to which are added words of great terror, neither be partaker of other men's sins; which ought to make a mighty impression on the minds of those in whom the power of ordination is lodged, since the words do plainly import, that such as do ordain any rashly, intitle themselves to all the scandal they give, and are partakers of their guilt. Note here, 1. The nature of the office the ministers of Christ are ordained to; to rule and labor in the word and doctrine. Note, 2. An authority in Timothy to admit persons into this office, by laying on of hands. Note, 3. The great care and caution, the heedfulness and circumspection, necessary in admitting persons to this holy function; Lay hands suddenly on no man; The welfare of the church, the honor of religion, the salvation of men's souls, depend much, very much upon those who are admitted into holy orders. The second interpretation given of these words is, that Timothy is here directed how to carry himself in censuring and absolving penitents: as if St. Paul had said, "When thou hast justly censured an offender, be not too hasty in observing of him, (for this also was done by imposition of hands) till some trial be made of his reformation, lest by so doing thou become guilty of his future faults: but keep thyself pure from all sin; whose office it is to censure and reprove sin in others." In both these senses have these words been understood, Lay hands suddenly on no man; keep thyself pure.

23 Drink no longer water, but use a little wine, for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities.

Note here, 1. There is a lawful use of wine to support nature, not to clog it; to cure infirmities, not to cause them: drink it Timothy might, medicinally, and no doubt for cheerfulness and alacrity, that the body might be more fit and expedite for duty; use a little wine for thy stomach's sake. Note, 2. That our meat and drink should be fitted for the preservation of health, rather than for the gratification of our appetite; the former is christian duty, the latter is brutish sensuality. Note, 3. That the apostles, who had the gift of healing, could not make use of it when and upon whom they pleased; no, not upon themselves, but must help their own infirmities in and by the use of ordinary means. Thus Timothy here, drink no longer water alone, but use a little wine with it for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities thence proceeding.

24 Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after.

25 Likewise also the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise cannot be hid.

St. Paul had just before exhorted Timothy to keep himself pure from other men's sins, whether candidates or penitents, here comes in subsequent advice, in order therunto. As if our apostle had said, Timothy, if thou beest diligent to observe, and not over hasty either in ordaining candidates, or absolving penitents, thou mayest in some measure perceive who are worthy, and who are unworthy. If thou layest thine hands upon those that are actually faulty, thou partakest with them, by being an occasion of their sinning; but if thou canst not discover their faultiness beforehand, though they afterwards prove wicked, it is not thy fault; God will at length detect them, yea, they will discover themselves, and when their faults are manifest, deal with them according to the discipline of the church." Learn hence, 1. That how much soever sinners attempt the hidings, yet cannot they actually hide themselves, or their sinnings, from God's sight and knowledge. They cannot be hid, says St. Paul, though men labor much to hide them: Oh, sinner! there is no way to hide thyself from God: thou mayest by repentance hide thyself from God, in the love, in the favor, in the mercy of God, but from God thou canst not be hid. As the saints' good works are open and manifest in the sight and to the view of God, so they that are otherwise, cannot be hid: where can a sinner be hid from him who is every where? or what thing can be our covering from him, in whose sight all things are open? Lord! what will it avail to hide ourselves from men, when we lie open and manifest to the eye of God? They that are otherwise cannot be hid.

CHAPTER VI.

LET as many servants as are under the yoke, count their masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God, and his doctrine, be not blasphemed.

2 And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort.

Our apostle having, in the preceding chapters instructed Timothy to give the necessary directions for the performance of several relative duties, in this chapter, he particularly directs him to instruct christian servants, to the acceptable performance of that great duty of obedience, which they owe to their respective masters, whether infidels or christians. Christianity frees persons from sinful slavery and bondage, but not from civil servitude and subjection. Religion does not level persons, but allows of an inequality amongst men, superiors and inferiors; and as it gives the former a power to command, so it lays the latter under an obligation to obey. Observe, 1. The general duty required of all servants towards their masters, and that is to give them all the honor and obedience which is due in that relation; let them account their masters worthy of all honor. What masters? 1. Their infidel and unbelieving masters; they are required to carry it dutifully and respectfully towards them. 2. Their believing or christian masters; they should not despise them because they are brethren; for christian brotherhood consists with inequality of place and relation, and with subjection of one person to another; but they ought to serve such masters the more readily and cheerfully, because brethren, beloved of God and partakers of the benefit, namely, of redemption by Christ, and of the sanctifying grace of God. Observe lastly, The grand argument which St. Paul uses to enforce the duty of obedience upon all servants, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed; that is the men of the world will reproach religion, revile christianity, and say that it teaches, or allows at least, that men be stubborn and disobedient: Where note, That the poorest and meanest professor of christianity may do much good or much hurt to religion. Some might be ready to say. "Alas! What credit or discredit can a poor servant do to religion?" Much every way: he may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, Tit. ii. 9. by his christian behaviour; and the name of God, and his doctrine may be blasphemed by him, if he be negligent in his duty: none are so inconsiderable, but they are capable of serving the great ends of religion, and may honor God in some measure: and are capable of being honored by him upon earth, and with him in the highest heavens.

—These things teach and exhort.

3 If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness;

4 He is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions, and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings.

5 Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness. From such withdraw thyself.

Observe here, 1. The solemn charge which the Holy Ghost by St. Paul gives to Timothy, to teach and press these relative duties of servants towards their masters, with great zeal and affectionate earnestness, These things teach and exhort, as if our apostle had said, "They are duties of great moment, therefore teach and press them earnestly." Doubtless there is much of the pleasure and will of God in these commands, and the honor and glory of God is much concerned in them, otherwise, The Spirit of God had never been so earnest in the pressing of them; the power of holiness, in nothing discovers itself more conspicuously, than in the performance of relative duties; we are no more really, than what we are relatively: rational holiness is the brightest ornament of religion. Observe, 2. The high character which St. Paul gives of this doctrine, which urges the practice of these relative duties; he calls what he says and writes about it, wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn thence, that the words written by St. Paul, in this and his other epistles, are the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, that is, words agreeable to his mind and will, written with an eye to his glory, promoting his honor, correspondent with, and suitable to his practice when here on earth. Observe, 3. The odious character wherewith he brands those false, flattering teachers, which preached contrary doctrine to what Jesus Christ by his apostles had delivered: he charges them with pride, ignorance, envy, strife, railing, evil surmising, and with supposing that gain was godliness; that is, their end in professing godliness was this, that they might make gain of it, and get preferment by it, making use of religion only as a block to take horse at: but to make use of religion in policy, for worldly advantage sake, is the way to be damned with a vengeance for religion sake. Observe lastly, St. Paul's advice to Timothy, to withdraw from these men, from such withdraw thyself; hold no communion with them, maintain no disputes with them, for they dote about questions, and strive about words. Note here, from St. Paul's bidding Timothy withdraw himself from them, that it is very evident that he speaks of persons who were then in being; the gnostic heretics according to some, the judaizing teachers, in the opinion of others; that is, they of the circumcision, who taught things which they ought not, for filthy lucre sake. Whoever they were, St. Paul's admonition to Timothy, to withdraw himself from such, teaches us, that heretical seducers are to be shunned and avoided, rather than disputed with, as unfit for our christian communion, and common conversation.

6 But godliness with contentment is great gain.

7 For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out.

8 And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content.

As if the apostle had said, "Although these seducers are for making a gain of godliness, yet we know that godliness is great gain, especially godliness with contentment; with contentment, I say, which it becomes us to have, for we brought nothing into this world with us, and shall carry nothing away with us; having therefore food and raiment, let us be therewith content, and satisfied." Learn hence, 1. That godliness is the sincere practice of the christian religion, so called, because it directeth and prescribeth to us the true and only way of worshipping and serving God. Learn, 2. That some men suit their godliness with their worldly ends, they make a trade and saving bargain of it. Learn 3. That godliness, or the sincere practice of the christian religion, is true gain, great gain, yea, the best gain, both for this world, and that which is to come. Learn, 4. That one great point of godliness, is to be content with what we have, yea, though it be only food and raiment. Contentment is a sedate and quiet temper of mind about outward things: it is the wisdom and will of God not to give to all alike, but to some more, to others less, of these outward comforts; but nothing besides food and raiment is absolutely necessary, a little will suffice a contented mind: he is not rich that has much, but he that has enough: that man is poor who covets more, having food and raiment: &c. Observe, lastly, The apostle's argument to excite and move the christian to this duty of contentment, without enlarging his desires inordinately after the world, and the persisting satisfactions of it; For we brought nothing into the world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out: Where remark, That the note of assurance is fixed rather to our carrying out than to our bringing in: the apostle doth not say, It is certain that we brought nothing into the world, and we shall carry nothing out: but he says, we brought nothing in, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. The note of assurance is applied to the latter; for this reason, I conceive because though all persons come naked, and bring nothing with them into the world, yet abundance is put upon them, and they are born heirs to vast possessions: but it is obvious to every eye, and most indubitably certain, that they carry nothing away with them. Death is called an unclothing; it unclothes the body, disrobing it of all its gaudy and glorious attire; yea, it unclothes the bones; our flesh wears off quickly in the grave; we proverbially say of a rich man, he has left a vast estate, left it behind him, carrying neither a foot of land, nor a farthing of money with him; therefore doth St. Paul add, it is certain we can carry nothing out.

9 But they that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.

Observe here, 1. The parties described, they that will be rich; that is, whether God will or no; their hearts are set upon the world, they feel it coming, and have it they will, if by any means, right or wrong, they can come at it, ask nobody's leave, no not God Almighty's leave, but rich they are resolved to be. Observe, 2. Their danger represented, they fall into temptation and a snare, and many foolish lusts, &c. Learn hence, That a will and resolution to be rich, is the occasion of much mischief to those that cherish and allow it in themselves; a will to be rich, is to make riches our principal business, our main scope, our great work, to pursue the world with the full bent of our will: now the bent of our wills is discovered, first, by intention, secondly, by industrious prosecution; when the mind is wholly intent upon getting wealth, and unwearied industry and endeavour is found in the pursuit of it. Now this is to make a god of the world: for that which is a man's aim, design, and end, is his chief good, and that which is our chiefest good is God; They that will be rich. Learn, 2. That an hot and over-eager pursuit of the world, lays a man open to endless temptations, so that it is not only difficult, but impossible, to keep his innocency; and that being irrecoverably lost, drowns a man in perdition and destruction.

10 For the love of money is the root of all evil: which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

Here we have the nature of covetousness, the evil and sin of covetousness, and the mischief and hurt of it declared. Observe, 1. The nature of it: it is an inordinate love of money, an insatiable desire after wealth. Observe, 2. The evil and sinfulness of it: it is a root of sin, The root of all evil; the fruit of all sin grows from this root, distrustful care, tormenting fear, anger, malice, envy, deceit, oppression, bribery, perjury, vexatious law-suits, and the like: nay farther, covetousness is the root of heresy in judgment: as well as of iniquity in practice, They have erred from the faith; that is, in point of doctrine, as well as in practice: it makes a man believe, as well as act, against the rule of faith, for filthy lucre. Observe, 2. The mischief and hurt of covetousness declared: it pierces, it pierces through with sorrows, yea, with many sorrows. But whom doth it pierce? First, Others; it pierces the poor, the needy, the widow, the fatherless, all that fall within the reach of its griping hand; nay, it doth not spare its own master or slave rather, but pierces him: They pierce themselves through, says the apostle, with many sorrows, with many more, and much worse sorrows, than they pierce others with. Riches ill-gotten, by covetousness or oppression, instead of making their owners heartily merry, make their consciences ache, and give them many a stitch in their side. None can tell what gall and wormwood springs from this bitter root, both to themselves and others: The love of money is the root of all evil; which while some covet after, they err from the faith, piercing themselves through with many sorrows. It is the root of all evil, of sin, and also of trouble and disquiet.

11 But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness.

Observe here, 1. The apostle's compellation, or the title given to Timothy; Thou, O man of God; it is a title borrowed from the Old Testament, where it is frequently given to the prophets, who revealed the mind and will of God to the people. Now by giving it to Timothy, the apostle intimates his duty to him, to condemn the world, and flee the eager pursuit of riches. As if the apostle had said, "O Timothy! Thou art a minister, and man of God, solemnly dedicated to his service, and devoted entirely to his glory; see then that thou abhor and avoid that detestable sin of covetousness. Heavenly truths are the subjects of thy daily study: Oh! let not earthly things be the object of thy chiefest delight and love: but follow after spiritual riches, namely, righteousness and godliness, faith and love, patience and meekness; that godliness which gives contentment with food and raiment, that faith which assures us of a better and more enduring substance, that righteousness of justice which requires us to let every man enjoy his own, that love which makes us willing to distribute, that patience which makes us willing to submit to a low condition, that meekness which suppresses wrath against those that are injurious to us. All these virtues and graces are necessary to thee as a minister of God, they are certainly indications of a mind free from covetousness, and infallible preservations from it."

12 Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses.

This whole verse is an allusion to the Olympic games, particularly to that of racing, where the garland or crown being hung up at the end of the goal, he that came first did lay hold of it, and take it to himself; and because these games were performed in the sight of many spectators, the apostle continues the allusion, and says, Timothy had before many witnesses professed his readiness to suffer for the faith. The sense of the apostle in this advice seems to be this: Fight the good fight of faith; go on by faith to overcome all temptations and difficulties; press toward the mark, till thou lay hold on the prize, which is eternal life; to which spiritual warfare and christian race thou gavest in thy name, when, being baptized and ordained, thou madest a public profession of the faith before many witnesses."

13 I give thee charge in the sight of God who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession;

14 That thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ:

15 Which in his times he shall show, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords:

16 Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto: whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom be honor and power everlasting. Amen.

Observe here, What a solemn adjuration and vehement charge is given to Timothy, by our apostle, to watch and guard against the sin of covetousness, and to avoid the eager pursuit of worldly wealth: I charge thee before God and Christ, that thou keep this commandment spotless and unrebukeable, until the coming of Christ, and mayest be found such at his appearing. Observe, 2. What a glorious display our apostle here makes of the adorable attributes of God: he styles him the God that quickeneth all things: that is, all things that have or shall have life; the blessed and only Potentate, because all power is essential in him, and derived from him; who only hath immortality, that is, an original, primitive, simple, independent, essential immortality, that is, only proper and peculiar to God: he only is essentially and necessarily of himself immortal; dwelling in that light which is inaccessible, and none can approach unto; and whom no man hath seen, nor can see: God is invisible in his essence; he is not to be seen by any mortal eye on earth, the eye of faith sees him only here: nay, he is not to be seen by any glorified eye in heaven, in his divine essence: the nature and essence of God never was seen, nor shall be seen. But we are, by the sight of God in heaven, to understand a more clear and full manifestation of God unto us, even so far as our glorified nature can bear it; it will be abundantly beyond expression, yea, beyond our comprehension. Observe, 3. The testimony which the holy apostle bears to our Lord Jesus Christ when here on earth; that before Pontius Pilate he witnessed a good confession: that is, he did not deny the truth to save his life, but gave all his ministers and people an example of courage and constancy in owning the truth, and sealing it with his blood.

17 Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy;

18 That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate;

19 Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life.

Our apostle having, in a very solemn manner, exhorted Timothy to avoid that dangerous sin of covetousness himself, in the foregoing verses, he doth in these verses require him to lay the same charge upon others, particularly upon worldly rich men; Charge them that are rich. Observe here, 1. Timothy's duty, not barely to exhort and teach, but to charge and command. True, the ministers of Christ are servants to their people; but servants to their souls, not to their wills, much less to their lusts: there is an authority in our office, which impowers us to command for God, as well as to entreat. Observe, 2. The subject of this charge; them that are rich in this world. Mark, No man is forbidden to be rich, nor yet to use such lawful means, by which, through God's blessing thereupon, men may be rich: but rich men need a charge, they want plain dealing from ministers, because they meet with so little of it from other men; for some flatter them, others fear them: God's ministers ought surely to deal faithfully with them. Observe, 3. The charge itself; and this is set down negatively and affirmatively; both, two-fold. 1. The negative matter of the charge, That they be not high-minded: pride of heart and haughtiness of mind and spirit, is one special sin which great men are subject to. When God lifts them up by his providence, they lift up themselves by pride: there is a secret malignity in riches, when they meet with men's corruptions, to lift them up above their due region; though neither the wiser, the holier, the nearer heaven, for all their wealth, nay, perhaps a great deal nearer hell for the abuse of it; yet still the rich think high, look big, breathe scorn, talk with disdain, forgetting that God gives them riches to exalt him, and not themselves. Next part of the negative charge is, That they trust not in uncertain riches: intimating, That creature confidence, or making an idol of wealth, is the dreadful bane and ruin of some rich men: their actions say to the gold, Thou art my hope; and to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence: but the vanity and sinfulness of this appears, by the apostle's calling them, uncertain riches; uncertain in their abode and continuance with us, uncertain in their promises and pretences to us; we expect more from them than ever we find in them. Observe, 4. The positive part of the charge; 1. To trust in God, the living God, a bountiful God: he giveth riches; they buy, they do not give; he giveth all things: all the wealth in the world cannot buy a mouthful of air, or ray of light, if God withholds it. God is the giver of all; he giveth richly all things; the most miserable man cannot number the rich mercies which he doth receive; and he giveth all things richly to enjoy; that is, he gives an heart to take and taste the comfort of what he gives; he gives not only possession, but fruition. Riches can do none of these things; why then should we trust in uncertain riches, and not in the living God? Observe, 5. Another duty exhorted to; and that is to imitate God in the works of bounty; To do good. Rich men are to make their wealth the materials of good works; nay, they must not only do good works, but be rich in good works; as their estate is plentiful, so must their charity be proportionable; they must do it copiously; be rich in good works: they must do it cheerfully, ready to distribute, without grudging, and without delay: they must do it diffusively; willing to communicate, that is, to do as much good to the community as possibly they can, upon principles of humanity, and upon principles of christianity also. Observe, 6. The encouragements given to this duty, 1. Thus to lay out, is to lay up, and that as in a treasury; it is like scattering of seed, in order to an increase and harvest. 2. Thus to lay out upon others, is to lay up for themselves; they have the comfort here, and the reward hereafter. 3. It is to lay up for themselves a foundation: not by way of merit towards God, but by way of evidence in regard of ourselves; a testimony of our reconciliation to, and acceptance with, God. 4. It is a good foundation for the time to come; all our glory, wealth and substance, is no durable foundation; here to-day and gone to-morrow; but good works are a bank in heaven: all is deposited in a safe hand, that we lay out for God. 5. It shall be rewarded with eternal life: Laying up for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold upon eternal life. Now from the whole, learn, 1. That the wisdom of God has seen fit to make a great distinction between men in this world; some are poor, others rich, as God sees best for both. Learn, 2. That some are rich, who are not rich in this world; rich in faith, heirs of a kingdom, yet wandering in deserts, dens, and caves. 3. That there are many who are only rich in this world; look beyond the grave, and they are poor men, miserable men, having great possessions in this world, but no provisions, for the next. Learn, 4. That the great design which all men, especially rich men, should pursue and prosecute in this life, is how they may in this life secure and lay hold of eternal life: blessed be God, it may be laid hold upon; it is worth laying hold upon: it is life; it is eternal life. Quest. But how should we lay hold upon eternal life? Ans. 1. In our judgments; by having them convinced of the transcendent excellency of it, and by having them approve of the strictest conditions upon which it is tendered. 2. In our affections; by strong and vehement desires after eternal life. 3. In our endeavours; by a diligent use of all means in order to the obtaining of it, and particularly by doing good, by being rich in good works, by being ready to distribute, and willing to communicate; for hereby shall we lay up for ourselves a good foundation against the time to come, and at length lay hold on eternal life.

20 O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called :

21 Which some professing, have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with thee. Amen.

Our apostle concludes this epistle to Timothy with a very passionate and pathetic exhortation to him : that he would maintain the purity of the doctrine of the gospel, and preach that to his hearers, avoiding all idle speculations and philosophical niceties, which the heathen philosophers admired, despising, in the mean time, the plainness and simplicity of the gospel : and he tells him farther, that some christians, being taken with this sort of learning, have corrupted christianity, turned heretics, erring concerning the faith ; to prevent which, he begs for Timothy the grace of God, to preserve, sanctify, and save him. Learn hence, That in the first beginnings of christianity, the philosophers, by pretences of great learning, were the greatest despisers and the bitterest enemies of christianity. Secondly, That the generality of them were taken up with mere useless quibbling, striving about words and barren notions, instead of necessary and useful knowledge. Thirdly, That Timothy, and every minister of Christ with him, ought to preach the gospel, without any such human mixtures in the purity and plainness of it ; and the people receive it, with a simplicity of mind, to be guided and directed by it. Lastly, That the sanctifying and establishing grace of God is necessary, and indispensably needful, to preserve both ministers and people steadfast in the faith of the gospel, and to persevere in their obedience to it.

THE

TIMOTHY.

It is generally concluded, that it was not long before St. Paul's death that he wrote this epistle to Timothy; and some think it was the last epistle that ever he wrote; in which he foretells the near approach of his own death and martyrdom, chap. iv. 6. saying, I am ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand.

The design of our apostle in this epistle is twofold: first to forewarn, and thereby fore-arm, his dear son Timothy against those heretics, seducers and false teachers, which were then arising and creeping into the church; and next, to excite him to the utmost care and diligence in the faithful discharge of his office; exhorting him to prepare for sufferings and persecutions, from his own example set before him.

CHAPTER I.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus ;

2 To Timothy my dearly beloved son :
Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord.

In these verses, we have the penman of this epistle described, by his name, Paul ; by his office, an apostle ; by the person that sent him, Jesus Christ ; by the end of his mission to preach, the promise of life ; that is the gospel in which the promise of life eternal is contained. Note here, 1. That it is God's call, and not barely God's permission ; his commanding will, and not barely his permitting will, which must warrant a person's undertaking the sacred office, and prove him a true minister of Jesus Christ ; Paul an apostle by the will of God. Note, 2. That as Adam brought the sentence of death upon us all, and the promise of life is made to us in and through Jesus Christ ; so that promise of life must have ministers to proclaim it, and to preach this promise is their proper work. Observe, 2. The person described, to whom this epistle is directed, and that by his name, Timothy ; by his relation, a son ; by his affection, a beloved son, a dearly beloved son. Some think St. Paul calls him his son, because converted by him to christianity ; others, because more thoroughly instructed, edified, and encouraged by our apostle ; possibly because he was assistant to him, a co-worker and fellow-laborer with him in the work of the gospel, and for that reason most affectionately beloved by him. From whence learn, with what fervor of sincere affection the ministers of Christ should love one another, speak respectfully of each other, secure the reputation one of another, strengthen each other's hands, and encourage one another's hearts in the work of God. We have little love from the world ; Lord ! how sad is it that we should have less one for another ? Behold here how St. Paul's and his assistant Timothy's heart were knit one to another ; like father and son, to the great reputation, as well as successful furtherance, of the gospel. Observe, 3. The apostle's salutation, in form of a prayer ; Grace, mercy, and peace from God our Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord. Learn hence, That all spiritual blessings flow from God as the Father in Christ unto us ; and that no grace, mercy, or peace can be had from God the Father, but in, by, and through our Lord Jesus Christ :

3 I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience,—

But how could Paul, before conversion, be said to serve the God of his forefathers with a pure conscience, when he was a persecutor, and the chief of sinners ? Ans. The meaning is, That he worshipped the same God, and the only true God, which his forefathers worshipped, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob ; and that he worshipped him in sincerity, according to his conscience, and the measures of light then received. Learn hence, That the church before Christ had the same faith, the same object of faith, and worshipped

God, the same God, under the law, with us under the gospel : I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers.

—That without ceasing, I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day ;

Behold here the ministers' duty in a more especial manner, to be much in prayer one for another ; they stand greatly in need of this mutual help to strengthen each other's hands, and encourage one another's hearts in the ways of God : they should therefore, without ceasing, remember one another at the throne of grace,

4 Greatly desiring to see thee, being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy :

Observe here, The vehemency of affection which our apostle expresses towards Timothy ; he desired, greatly desired, to see him, and with the sight of him to be filled with joy. Note, That though we must love all christians, with a sincere love, yet we may love some christians with a more fervent love than others ; choice and useful christians, endearing and endeared friends, may and must be beloved above others : I desire greatly to see thee, &c. Observe farther, St. Paul declares how mindful he was of Timothy's tears ; perhaps a flood of tears were shed at their last parting one from another. The best of men have a propension to weeping, and upon occasion, have shed tears : so had Jacob, Joseph, David, and Christ himself. True goodness promotes compassion ; good men ever have been, and are men of tender compassionate dispositions.

5 When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice : and I am persuaded that in thee also.

This is another reason why St. Paul so earnestly desired a sight of his dear Son Timothy, namely, a remembrance of his faith, as well as of his tears ; which faith is described by the quality of it, unfeigned ; by the effect of it, it dwelt ; by the subjects wherein, in Lois, Eunice, and Timothy ; by the order in which, first, in the grandmother Lois, then in the mother Eunice, and lastly, in the child Timothy. Learn hence, That it is a most desirable and blessed thing when there is a succession of believers in a family, and to see faith transmitted down to posterity, when grandmother, mother, and grandchild, all walk in the truth. Thus here : And whereas Timothy received the advantage of a religious education from those two holy women, Lois, and Eunice, we learn, That God often blesses the labors and examples of holy women, to raise up excellent instruments in his church.

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance, that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee, by the putting on of my hands.

Observe here, 1. St. Paul's care in putting Timothy in remembrance of his duty, though he very well knew it before: Wherefore, I put thee in remembrance. None are so well instructed in their duty, but they may and ought sometimes to be put in remembrance of what their duty is. Note, 2. The duty which St. Paul puts him in remembrance of; namely, to "stir up the gift of God, which was in him, by putting on of the apostle's hands." Where observe, 1. What the gift was which he advises should be stirred up: namely, the Holy Ghost, in its ministerial gifts and sanctifying graces; particularly, a divine power, which disposed and enabled him to teach and live, to act and do, answerably to the duties incumbent upon him as a minister of Jesus Christ. Observe, 2. What care Timothy must take of this gift; namely, to stir it up: the word is a metaphor taken from fire, which, if not stirred up, grows dead, and gives little heat. They that have received much grace, and many gifts from the holy Spirit, may yet be wanting to themselves in stirring them up. This stirring up the gift of God in Timothy, respects either the means that are to be used in order to the duty, such are, prayer, reading, meditation; or the duty itself, which consists in feeding the flock of God, in reforming abuses in the church of God, and in enduring hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. Observe, 3. How this gift was bestowed upon Timothy; namely, by putting on of the apostle's hands, together with the hands of the presbytery, 1 Tim. iv. 14. The authority and power was given by the apostle, the presbytery concurring as his assistants. St. Paul did not lay on hands without the presbytery, much less did the presbytery lay on hands without the apostle, but he and they in conjunction. From the whole, learn, That no persons, especially ministers, ought to suffer the gifts and graces of God's holy Spirit to remain in them unexcited and unstirred up: "Stir up the gift of God that is in thee."

7 For God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

8 Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel, according to the power of God.

Here our apostle exhorts Timothy to an holy courage and undaunted resolution in the execution of his office. As if he had said, "Be not discouraged by persecution: for God hath not given us, his messengers, the spirit of fear, but of courage and fortitude; fearless we are of the frowns of men: also the spirit of love, love to God and the souls of men, which will make the ministers of God indefatigable in their endeavours for the good of souls; likewise the spirit of a sound mind, which enables God's ministers to curb their passions, inordinate lusts, desires, and perturbations of mind; an admirable spirit to know when to be angry and severe, and when to be mild and gentle." Learn hence, That love is the genuine principle of obedience, and ought to be that frame of spirit, that inward affection of mind, from whence all our services to God and our neighbour do proceed. Thus, having fortified Timothy against fear, in the seventh verse, he next fortifies him against shame, in the eighth verse: "Be not thou ashamed of the testimony of our Lord; that is, of giving testimony of the gospel of our Lord, whether by preaching of it, or suffering for it; nor be ashamed of me his prisoner; for I do not suffer as a malefactor; nay, be thou a cheerful partaker of the same sufferings as myself, and for the same cause with myself, according to the power of God; that is, being strengthened with the almighty power of God. Learn hence, That the ministers of the gospel are to take great care that they be always ready to suffer reproach for the gospel, but that they never be a reproach unto the gospel. Suffering for Christ will be sweet, if it be not embittered by sinning against Christ.

9 Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.

10 But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel:

11 Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles.

As if our apostle had said, "To fortify thee against the fear of those persecutions, and to arm thee against the shame of those reproaches, which may probably attend thee in the work of the gospel, consider, that the God whom thou servest in this employment, is he that hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling: called us first, to christianity, and then to his holy function of the ministry; but to neither of them according to the merit of our works; as if we had done any thing to deserve either of these favors at his hands; but according to his own purpose and grace, given us in Christ before the world began;" that is, which from all eternity he decreed and determined to accomplish by Jesus Christ: which gracious purpose of his is now clearly discovered by our Saviour Jesus Christ's coming into the world: "who hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light;" that is, made a fuller and clearer discovery of it by the gospel; to preach which gospel I am a commissioned apostle, and for this I suffer; and God help you, when thereunto called, to suffer with me." Learn hence, 1. That God himself is the author of man's salvation; he hath saved us: That effectual vocation doth accompany salvation; that the christian's calling is an holy calling; that it is also an act of free and gracious favor in God to call; "who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace." Learn farther, That God's purpose or eternal decree to save before all time was manifested by Christ's appearing in time; "But now is made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ." Observe also, The happy effects of Christ's appearing: 1. To abolish death; not to root it at present out of the world, but to take away its dominion, its dread and terror, the whole power and disposal of it, Rev. i. 18. "I am alive, and have the keys of life and death." 2. To bring life and immortality to light; that is, immortal life more clearly manifested and discovered. Note here, 1. That the soul of man is immortal, and that there is another state, an immortal state, which remains for men after this life; otherwise, the justice of God's providence could not be sufficiently vindicated; but upon the supposal of a future state of immortality, it may. An account of the unequal providences of God in this world, is easy to him that believes the certainty of another; as good and evil are at present different in their natures, so shall they be in their rewards. Note, 2. That the greatest discovery that ever was made of life and immortality to lost sinners, is made by Jesus Christ in the gospel. It was discovered, though darkly, to the Old Testament saints; but the discovery made of it by the gospel, as it was an unexpected discovery, a free and gracious discovery, so was it a more clear, more full, and final discovery of it; "Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light, &c."

12 For the which cause I also suffer these things; nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day.

For which cause, that is, "For the sake of the gospel, and not as an evil doer, I suffer patiently all afflictive evils, without either fear or shame, well knowing in whom I repose my faith and hope, my trust and confidence; and firmly believing that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him, my temporal life, yea my eternal life, the life of my soul, my reward in heaven: I have committed all unto, and deposited all in God's hand, and I am sure he is both able and willing, he both can and will keep in safety, that which I have thus committed to him." Note here, 1. That the knowledge of God must precede, or go before faith in God. I know in whom I have believed: Faith sees not him in whom it believeth, but it knows him in whom it believeth. Note, 2. There is no such way to secure the soul, as to commit it into God's hands; the way to make the soul safe, is to commit it to him to keep, and that in the way of well doing.

13 Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love, which is in Christ Jesus.

14 That good thing which was committed unto thee, keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us.

By sound words, we are to understand the doctrine of the gospel; by a form of sound words, the truth and doctrine of the gospel methodically disposed and digested; to hold it fast, is, not to swerve from it in the course of our ministry, but pertinaciously to adhere to it, not parting with it ourselves, nor suffering it to be adulterated and corrupted by others. This form of sound words some take to be the articles of our creed, in the words wherein we now have them, probably, the same in sense, if not in words. This is called, ver. 14. That good thing which was committed to Timothy to keep: meaning, that summary of christian doctrine which was committed to his care and keeping. Learn hence, 1. That evangelical words are sound words: and gospel-truth is of an healing nature. Learn, 2. That a form of sound words, or a methodical system of gospel truths, is very profitable both for ministers and people. Learn, 3. That such a form of sound words is very faithfully to be retained, and very carefully to be kept unto. Learn, 4. That faith and love are the hands whereby we are to hold fast gospel truth; "Hold fast the form of sound words in faith and love, which is in Christ Jesus" Learn, 5. That as christians are to hold these evangelical truths fast in their judgments, so are they to hold them forth in their lives and practices: Keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us; that is, the power and assistance of the Holy Ghost will not be wanting to our endeavours, to help our memory, love, and practice, if we be not wanting to ourselves.

15 This thou knowest, that all they which are in Asia be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

By all in Asia, we are to understand very many, almost all, not every individual person: some think they were teachers in Asia, others that they were private christians; some that they were his companions and followers who, when they saw him imprisoned, deserted and left him; and particularly, Phygellus and Hermogenes. Yet, note here, 1. That he doth not tax them of apostasy from Christ, when he accuses them of forsaking him; it is too harsh to say, that those that forsake a particular ruler of the church, do forsake Christ himself. Note 2. In that he says, All that are in Asia are turned away from me, that sin may, and oftentimes has the major vote on its side, the generality go one way, and usually the wrong way; sinners, like sheep, run after one another: like fish, swim down the stream together.

16 The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain.

17 But when he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me.

18 The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day: and in how many things he ministered unto me at Ephesus, thou knowest very well.

Our apostle having complained of many in Asia forsaking him, in the day of his sufferings, in the foregoing verse; in this, he makes a grateful commemoration of the kindness of Onesiphorus towards him, who refreshed him with his presence and relief, and was not ashamed of his chain, of his imprisonment, as others were. Learn, 1. It is no new thing for the most holy and innocent servants of Christ to suffer hardship, imprisonment, banishment, yea, even death itself, for the sake of Christ; and when they do so, to have friends forsake, and turn their backs upon them. Prosperity affords many friends, more flatterers; but who regards the prisoner in bonds; who cares for looking upon the dial when the sun is off? Learn, 2. That not to be ashamed of the saints in the day of their sufferings, but to own them, and administer to them in such a condition, is a certain sign of a sound and sincere christian. Good Onesiphorus had this, amongst other evidences of his gracious state, that he was not ashamed to own a persecuted Paul in chains. Nay, he searched for the apostle very diligently, and found him; so far was he from hiding his eyes from him, and forsaking him, as the men of Asia did: Observe next, our apostle's fervent and affectionate prayer to God, abundantly to recompense this labor of love in Onesiphorus towards him: First, he begs mercy for his whole household, "The Lord give mercy to the house of Onesiphorus;" Note, 1. How thankful the saints of God are for mercies received from God, by the hands of men. Note, 2. That acts of christian charity to the suffering servants of Christ, do receive a considerable part of their reward, even here, in the hearty and affectionate prayers of the people of God on their behalf. How well did it fare with Onesiphorus and his household upon the score of St. Paul's prayer, "The Lord show mercy to the house of Onesiphorus;" next he prays for Onesiphorus himself, "The Lord grant that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day;" that is, in the great day of judgment. Learn hence, 1. That the holiest of men, and best of saints will stand in need of mercy, much mercy, when they stand before God at the great day. Learn, 2. That the merciful christian, which has here shown mercy to the ministers and members of Jesus Christ, may expect, and shall find mercy in that day, when they stand in need of mercy. They that show mercy in the evil day, shall certainly find mercy in the great day; "The Lord grant that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day."

CHAPTER II.

Our apostle in this chapter first exhorts Timothy, to the practice of several duties belonging to his sacred function; and that by sundry arguments drawn from wrestlers, soldiers and husbandmen, whose laborious industry and indefatigable services he exhorts him to imitate and follow; next he exhorts him from several sins which render the office of a bishop obnoxious to censure, and his person to contempt. Thus he bespeaks him;

THOU therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus.

St. Paul having acquainted Timothy with the hard things which he had suffered for the gospel of Christ, and withal informed him how many had flinched for fear of suffering, forsaking him and the cause of God defended by him; in this verse he exhorts Timothy to courage and holy resolution for Christ; "Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus;" that is, when others show pusillanimity and cowardice, do thou show thyself a strong and valiant man, not being affrighted at the dangers that threaten thee in publishing and defending the gospel of Jesus Christ. Be strong in the grace of Christ; that is, in the gospel of Christ, which contains a discovery of the riches of his grace, or be strong through the influences of the grace of Christ. Note, 1. That as all christians in general, so the ministers of Christ in particular, do need courage, Thou, my son, be strong; nothing he does, but is an act of valor, all duties are attended with difficulties, which put the christian upon disputing every inch of his way; they are only a few gallant spirits that dare take heaven by storm; and the ministers of Christ do meet with more difficulties than other men. Learn, 2. That our strength, both as christians and ministers, lies in Christ and not in ourselves: "Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus;" the strength of every saint, yea, of the whole host of saints, lies in the Lord of hosts.

2 And the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also.

A second charge given to Timothy, is to take special care that the doctrine of the gospel, and the precepts of holy living, which he had heard St. Paul deliver, in the presence of many witnesses, should be handed down and transmitted to men of great fidelity and ability, whom he was to ordain and empower to teach it unto others. Where note, 1. A direction given to the guides and governors of the church, how they ought to manage themselves in the ordination of the ministerial offices: this office is to be committed unto faithful able men; many may be useful in the church, that cannot be excellent, but he that is unfaithful, is only fit to make atheists. Note, 2. That such as have the gospel deposited with them, may and ought to deposit it with others, and they with others, to the end of the world, thereby to prevent all innovations and diversity of opinions in matters of religion: "What thou hast heard, commit to faithful men."

3 Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

4 No man that warreth, entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.

5 And if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully.

6 The husbandman that laboreth, must be first partaker of the fruits.

7 Consider what I say; and the Lord give thee understanding in all things.

Still we find our apostle prosecuting the great and general design of this epistle, which is to direct Timothy in the faithful discharge of his office, as a minister of the gospel, and particularly to prepare for sufferings, and to inure himself to hardship, and to encounter with difficulties and dangers: hence, he compares him to a soldier, to a wrestler, and an husbandman: 1. To a soldier, "endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." Learn hence, That every faithful minister is a spiritual soldier, warring under Jesus Christ, his captain and chief commander: must the soldier be called and do all by commission? so must the minister. Must the soldier be armed, trained up, and disciplined, and made fit for service? so must the minister. Must the soldier shun no dangers, stick at no difficulties, pass through thick and thin? must he use allowed weapons, approved armor of his general's directing, not of his own inventing? all this, must the minister be and do. In a word, must the soldier please him that hath chosen him to be a soldier, and in order thereunto, not entangle himself with the affairs of this life? Such a life of freedom from encumbrance by secular affairs, should the minister of God desire and endeavour after. Soldiers must be as free as may be from distractions; a soldier that fights in fetters, fights thereafter; he must put off his fetters before he puts on his armor; the minister's work lies in the affairs of the other life: Now, he that is entangled in the affairs of this life, will do little about the affairs of the next. He must also please his captain, not please himself, his appetite, his pride, his covetousness, much less must he please the enemy he is to fight against, the devil, the world, and the flesh. Again, 2. The minister here is compared to a wrestler; If a man strive for the mastery; that is, for the prize, the garland, the crown, at the end of the race; he shall be crowned if he strives lawfully, if he runs fairly according to the rules of the game, and perseveres finally till he comes to the end of the goal. Thus must the ministers of the gospel strive for the crown of life, by putting forth all their strength, exerting their utmost endeavours; such as are now wrestlers, shall ere long be conquerors. Lastly, Timothy, and all with him in the work of the gospel, are here compared to husbandmen: as the husbandman must first toil and labor before he can partake of the fruits of the earth, he must plough and sow before he can reap and gather; so must the minister of God, by a laborious diligence, cultivate and improve the people, before he can hope to reap that great fruit and benefit, by gaining and converting of souls to Christ. God will regard no ministers but the laborious, he will never dignify drones in the church triumphant. Farther, by comparing Timothy to an husbandman, he intimates to him his duty, not to be discouraged if he doth not reap fruit presently; the seed sometimes lies under the clods long before it does appear; we must not despair of men too soon. And, lastly, by comparing Timothy to an husbandman, he seems to intimate, that he was to be sustained and maintained by those for whom he labored. Thus having laid Timothy's duty before him, under the metaphor of a soldier, a wrestler, and an husbandman; he counsels him to consider what he had said unto him, and desires of God to give him a right understanding and sound judgment in all things, intimating that they that will have God's word and good counsel blessed by God to their understanding and practice, must ponder upon it, consider of it, and duly apply it to themselves; "Consider what I say, and the Lord give thee understanding in all things."

8 Remember that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead according to my gospel:

9 Wherein I suffer trouble as an evil-doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, exhorted Timothy to patience and constancy under suffering, comes now to direct him as to the matter and subject of his preaching, particularly, that he insist upon the incarnation and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ; Remember that Jesus Christ was the promised Messiah of the seed of David, not of Joseph. Timothy is here called upon to assert the incarnation of Christ, there being some heretics which did very early deny the truth of his human nature, as the Marconites and Manichees; as there were others that denied the reality of his divine nature, particularly Ebion and Cerinthus. Secondly, He calls upon Timothy to preach and press the doctrine of Christ's resurrection also, both because upon that depended the great evidence of his divinity, that he was really God, (his resurrection by his own power declared him to be God, Rom. 1. 4.) and also because upon that depends the consolation and salvation of all believers. Remember, and frequently inculcate, that Christ was raised from the dead, according to my gospel; that is, according to the gospel of Christ preached by me. Christ's incarnation and resurrection, are truths much to be preached and inculcated by ministers, and frequently remembered and thoroughly considered by the people. It follows, "Wherein I suffer trouble as an evil-doer, even unto bonds: but the word of God is not bound: that is, for which gospel, and for preaching which resurrection, I suffer as a criminal and reputed malefactor, yea, I suffer to that degree, that I am bound with chains for preaching Jesus and the resurrection: But the word of God is not bound; though they have restrained me, they cannot restrain that; that is loose and at liberty; when the dispensers of it are in bonds, that has its free course. Learn, That the preachers of the gospel have, from the beginning, met with great persecutions, they have suffered trouble as evil-doers, even unto bonds. Learn, 2. That the persecution of preachers doth not hinder the progress and liberty of the word; when ministers are in prison, the word may have free passage, and holy men rejoice at its liberty, under their own confinement: yea, the providence of God so ordered it, (see Acts the last) that St. Paul, even during his imprisonment, preached the word with all boldness; his confinement had caused the gospel to spread in Rome. Thus God outshoots satan in his own bow: he thinks when he has the ministers of God in prison, he has done his work, but God overrules and causes their imprisonment itself to fall out rather to the furtherance of the gospel; I suffer bonds, says the apostle, but the word of God is not bound.

10 Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sake, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory.

11 It is a faithful saying, For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him.

12 If we suffer, we shall also reign with him: If we deny him, he also will deny us:

13 If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself.

St. Paul having acquainted Timothy in the foregoing verses with his sufferings, even unto bonds, here he lets him understand and know, why, and for whose sake, he did so cheerfully endure all these things, namely, for the elect's sake. Though the rest of the world rejected the gospel, yet the elect would be confirmed by his example, and obtain that salvation which in and through Jesus Christ was offered and tendered to them. Here note, That there is a certain election of God, which hath infallibly chosen to salvation all those who make their calling and election sure, by perseverance in holiness and good works. Note, 2. That the faithful ministers of Christ do think no sufferings too much or too dear, for the sake of God's elect, (for the sake of believing christians, who are a chosen generation) so that their sufferings may but further their eternal glory, happiness and salvation. To encourage yet again to a patient enduring of all sorts of afflictions, he assures Timothy, that if we be rendered conformable to Christ in his sufferings, we shall be also in his glory: If we suffer for him, we shall reign with him: if we be dead with him, dead to sin, and dead to the world, we shall also live with him, in conformity to his resurrection: but if for fear of suffering we disown him, he will also deny us; If we believe not, if we be unfaithful and forsake him, yet he will be true to his word, he will not forsake his own cause, but make good his threatenings, his own veracity stands firm, and is as much engaged to execute the threatening, as to fulfil the promise.

14 Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers.

15 Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth,

Observe here, 1. The excellent advice which St. Paul gives to Timothy, to all the ministers of the church, and to all the christian churches far and near, that they spend not their time in disputes, that they contend not about words, which have no tendency to make men either wiser or better, but serve only to violate the laws of charity, and cause men to wrangle eternally, and persecute one another with hard names and characters of reproach. Here note, 1. What those things are which ought not to be matters of contention among christians; namely, 1. Such things in which we differ from each other, rather in words, than in sense; oft-times opponents mean the same things, but differ only in the way and manner of expression. 2. Such things as tend to little or no profit, either as to edification in faith, in love, or in practical godliness. Observe also, The apostle's argument, why we should not contend about these things; because they tend to beget strife and contention among christians, by dividing them into factions and parties, and also tend to the subversion of the hearers, causing them to doubt of the truth of the faith, about which the contending parties cannot agree; "Charge them, therefore, that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers." Observe next, The solemn charge given to Timothy, as to the matter, manner, and method of his preaching; that the matter of it be the word of truth, the pure word of God, that it be divided rightly, to every one his portion, to every hearer his due, methodizing and distributing truth, as God would have it; terror to whom terror is due, comfort to whom comfort belongs. The original word rendered rightly to divide, some think a sacrificial word, alluding to the right dividing of the sacrifice, which was laid upon the altar, separating the precious from the vile, and severing the parts which were not to be offered from them that were, and cutting out the sacrifice in such manner as all had their share in them. As if St. Paul had said, "Study not for the applause of men, but for the approbation of God, as becometh a good workman, who needeth not to be ashamed of his work, whoever looks upon it; but let thy preaching and living be straight and conformable to the gospel, and thus study to show thyself approved of God." Hence learn, That although curious and unprofitable trifling with words in a pulpit be vain and sinful, yet it is the part of a skilful teacher, to order, methodize, and distribute truth in its proper place, and give every hearer his part and portion.

(No. 64.)

16 But shun profane and vain babblings; for they will increase unto more ungodliness.

17 And their word will eat as doth a canker: Of whom is Hymeneus and Philletus;

18 Who concerning the truth have erred, saying, That the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some.

St. Paul having now finished the exhortatory part of this chapter, and acquainted Timothy what he would have him practise and do, now comes to a dehortation, advising him what he would have him avoid and shun; and here, first, he bids him shun profane and vain babblings; the vain babblings of the heathen philosophers, and the profane notions of heretical and seducing teachers, particularly the Gnostics, the followers of Simon Magnus and Menander, who were guilty of an apostasy from christianity, by turning the resurrection into an allegory; affirming that the resurrection of the soul to piety and virtue, was the only resurrection to be expected, disowning the resurrection of the body, and asserting, that the flesh was unfit to rise. Observe, secondly, The nature of erroneous doctrine declared; it is of a devouring, spreading and destroying nature, their words will eat as doth a gangrene. Quest. How doth a gangrene eat? Ans. It eats speedily, it eats incurably, it eats mortally, as it is well known the gangrene doth. Quest. But what is it that heresies eat? Ans. Faith, peace and godliness; so here they overthrow the faith of some, and increase unto more ungodliness. Quest. How comes it to pass that they so eat. Ans. The spreading and prevailing of heresies, may be ascribed partly to the subtilty and activity of seducers, partly to the curiosity and simplicity of the seduced, and partly to the justice of God, for the manifestation of those that are sincere, and the punishment of those that receive not the truth in the love of it.

19 Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.

As if our apostle had said, "Notwithstanding that Hymeneus and Philetus, with others, are fallen away, nevertheless we know, that the foundation of God, his holy covenant, standeth firm and sure, having a seal annexed to it, (as usually contracts have, whereby two parties do oblige themselves mutually to each other,) which seal on God's part has this impress of inscription, The Lord knoweth them that are his; and on our part is written, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." Learn hence, 1. That the covenant of God made with us in Christ Jesus, is a firm and sure foundation to build our hopes of perseverance and eternal life upon; The foundation of God standeth sure. Learn, 2. That the covenant (according to the nature of all covenants) is conditional; on God's part promising assistance, acceptance, and rewards; on our part, a departing from all iniquity, and an obligation to the love and practice of universal holiness. All that make a profession of christianity ought to take special care that their lives may answer their light, their practices correspond with their profession; christianity being not a speculative science, but a practical art of holy living.

20 But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood, and of earth; and some to honor, and some to dishonor.

21 If a man, therefore, purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work.

Our apostle had told us at ver. 17. and 18, of certain heretics, such as Hymeneus and Philetus, whose doctrines did eat like a canker or gangrene; he tells us here, that it is not to be wondered at, that there should be such persons in the church, because the visible church is God's great house: now it is no uncommon thing in great men's houses, to have vessels of all sorts, some of wood and earth, others of gold and silver, some to honorable uses, and others to dishonorable: in like manner, it is in the church of Christ, there will be a number of orthodox, and also of heterodox christians, hypocrites and sincere christians. He advises Timothy therefore, not to be scandalized at them, but to purge himself from them, to keep himself pure from heresy and impiety; thereby he would manifest himself to be a vessel unto honor, sanctified and meet for the master's use; that is for the service and glory of God, and disposed for every good work. Learn hence, That all christians, but especially the ministers of Christ, ought to be, like the consecrated vessels of the temple, dedicated and set apart for our Lord's especial use and service; we are not only with other christians dedicated by baptism, but consecrated to our solemn ordination; so that there is a sacredness upon our persons: and to prostitute ourselves to any lust, is a greater profanation than Belshazzar was guilty of, when he desecrated the holy vessels of the temple.

22 Flee also youthful lusts: but follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart.

23 But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes.

Still our apostle proceeds in his holy cautionary directions to Timothy, what to avoid, and what to follow. He advises him, 1. to avoid and flee youthful lusts: by which may be understood, not only the lusts of the flesh, but also the lusts and vices of the mind, as ambition and pride, vain-glory and ostentation. Where note, That the flesh, with its affections and lusts, are such dangerous enemies to our holiness and salvation, that the holiest of ministers and best of men have need, very great need, to be warned of them, and cautioned against them; Flee thou, O Timothy, also youthful lusts. 2. He adviseth Timothy also to avoid foolish and unlearned questions, that is controversies and disputes, knowing that such contentious wranglings, do but engender strife. It is not unworthy our observation, that no less than four times in these two epistles, do we meet with this precept from the apostle, to avoid these questions and disputes, and to apply to that which is practical, showing of what great importance it is so to do; and we shall meet with it again in the epistle to Titus, chap. iii. 2. From whence learn, That disputes about matters which only serve to beget strife and contention, but tend little to edification in faith and holiness, are vain talking, unprofitable disputes, and as such to be avoided. Observe next, He directs Timothy what to follow, having shown him what to avoid: namely, to follow after righteousness and faith, peace and charity with all persons, but especially with all our brethren and fellow christians calling on the same Lord, and professing the same faith with us. Where note, That we ought to have charity for, to maintain peace with, and by no means to separate from our communion, any person who serves Christ with a pure heart; Follow says our apostle, charity and peace, with all those that call on the Lord Jesus out of a pure heart.

24 And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient;

25 In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth:

26 And that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.

By the servant of the Lord here, we are to understand all the bishops and governors, the pastors and teachers of the church; by not striving, that they are not to irritate and provoke such as dissent and differ from them; not to strive indecently with the tongue, but by soft and gentle words, by close and hard arguments, endeavour to convince their judgment; for no man that is in an error thinks that he is so; therefore if we go about by violence to rend men's opinions from them, they will but hold them so much the faster; but if we have but so much patience and charity as to unrip their errors by degrees, they will at last fall in pieces of themselves, "The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle to all and patient;" it follows farther, "in meekness instructing, if God, peradventure."—Where note, 1. The duty directed to; and that is, without bitterness and passion, but with great lenity and meekness, to instruct the erroneous, even when they oppose the truth; such especially as do it out of ignorance, and for want of better information, are particularly to be pitied, and patiently borne with, together with those who labor under the prejudices and prepossessions of a contrary education; in meekness instructing those that oppose—Note, 2. The benefit hoped for, and the advantage to be expected, by such meek and gentle methods of instruction, as are here directed to; 1. That Almighty God may peradventure give them repentance, blessing such prudential and pious means for their conversion from error and seduction; and 2. That they may be recovered out of satan's snares and temptations, they being at present captivated by him according to his will. Learn, 1. That if erroneous and misled persons will not bear gentle touching, much less will they yield to sharp invectives, or provoking disputes. Yet, 2. Disputations wisely managed, like defensive wars, are both useful and necessary in defence of the truth, though they do not bring over gainsayers. Learn, 3. That till erroneous and misled persons can be brought by consideration to be agents in recovering themselves, no teaching or disputing will be sufficient and effectual to recover them; "That they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him." Lastly, Error is the devil's snare as well as sin: error is as dangerous as vice: the one is an open road, the other a bye-path, to hell and destruction; consequently such a christian as has a due regard to, and value for, his own salvation, will be as much afraid of erroneous principles as of debauched practices; "That they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will."

CHAPTER III.

Our apostle having, in the two foregoing chapters, forewarned Timothy of those dangerous heretics, and false teachers, which were then arising and creeping into the church, he comes now, by a prophetic instinct, to foretel of greater evils and mischiefs, which should certainly arise towards the end of the world, which he calls the last days and perilous times. The prophetic perdition runs thus:

THIS know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come.

As if the apostle had said, "O my son Timothy, be not thou discouraged; neither let any of thy successors be dismayed, at the sects and schisms, at the heresies and blasphemies, at the vice and impiety, which will be found in and amongst persons in the last days, when, certainly know, that perilous times shall come." Where by the last days, understand all the times from Christ's first coming in the flesh to his second coming to judgment: in the beginning of which times, several sorts of persons, yea, several sects and parties of men arose, to whom the following characters did belong; namely, proud, covetous, boasters, and the like. As the judaizing teachers who urged the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law; also the gnostics, and followers of Simon Magnus, have these characters applied to them in those early days: and it were well if the church of Rome, in these latter days, could clear herself of these characters, which are found upon her, as the marks and badges of an apostate church. Learn hence; 1. That the days we now live in are the last days, and our times the last times. 2. That the last times are and will be, the worst times, perilous times, full of sin, and full of trouble: old age is the dregs of life, the world draws upon its lees, the dregs are apparent; in the last days perilous times shall come.

2 For men shall be lovers of their own-selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy,

3 Without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good,

4 Traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God;

Here our apostle reckons up the several sins, which would abound in these last days, and make the times perilous; persons professing christianity shall appear inordinate self-lovers, insatiably covetous, vain-glorious, boasters, proud, despisers of others, blasphemers of God and Christ, and the holy Spirit, by denying the pre-science and foreknowledge of the former, the divinity and Godhead of the latter. Learn hence, That sins, especially great sins, seldom go single and alone, but commonly generate and beget one another. Thus here, self-love begets covetousness, covetousness pride, and pride blasphemy. Thus men fall from one sin to another, and proceed from one degree of wickedness to another.

5 Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away.

This is the last yet not the least sin of the perilous times: the apostle first tells us what these men have, a form of godliness, that is, a vain empty show of piety and religion, which discovers itself in external devotion, in a profession of the christian faith, in an external show of mortification, in a great zeal for some particular party, or private opinion. 2. What they want, the power of godliness, that is, the truth and sincerity of it, consisting in true love to God and our neighbour. 3. The apostle directs us as to our behaviour towards such men, from these turn away. Learn hence, 1. That a person may go far and advance high in an external profession of piety and religion, and yet have no more than a form of godliness. 2. That notwithstanding this there is such a thing as the internal and inward power, of godliness and religion which few maintain, but most deny. Learn, 3. That christians must shun familiarity with such as have the brand of the foregoing infamous sins upon them, and not hold correspondency with such as are the avowed enemies of Christ and his kingdom.

6 For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women, laden with sins, led away with divers lusts.

7 Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

In these words, our apostle renders a reason why we should turn away from the forementioned sins and sinners, namely, because these heretical and false teachers before characterized, are of an insinuating temper; they vent not their errors openly, but in corners; they creep into houses and there set upon women with their temptations who have less ability to detect them: and first upon women, that they may better win their husbands over to compliance with them; and upon silly women, such as were laden with sins and led away with divers lusts; they make a prey of such women as are weak in their intellectuals, and corrupt and wicked in their morals: which women always pretend to be "learned, but are never able to come to the knowledge of the truth," and consequently, are an easy prey to seducers, and very capable receptive objects for such deceivers to draw away. Learn hence, That seducers observe a method in seducing. They begin with women, weak women, and usually wicked and loose women. Carefully ought that sex to resolve, and shun conversing and disputing with them.

8 Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth; men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith.

Jannes and Jambres were two famous magicians in Egypt, who withstood Moses when he was working miracles before Pharaoh to hinder him from believing; their names are not mentioned in scripture, but taken by St. Paul, either from public tradition, or from some ancient Jewish records. Now, says the apostle, as the magicians resisted Moses, so these heretical seducers resist the truth, making a violent and rancorous opposition against it. Thence learn, That there have been false teachers in all ages, who have with vehemency opposed the truth, and the professors of it: neither the members nor the ministers of Christ shall ever want enemies to war with; whilst the seed of the serpent remains in the world. Observe, 2. The character of these men who resist the truth, they are men of corrupt minds, and reprobate concerning the faith; they have lost all sound judgment and made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. A corrupt head, a corrupt heart, and a vicious life, usually attend and accompany one another; loose principles dispose men to loose and licentious practices; such as are latitudinarians in opinion, are oftentimes so in practice too. An heretical head and an upright heart are incompatible; a good conscience and a true faith, like Hippocrates' twins, live and die together.

9 But they shall proceed no further: for their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as theirs also was.

Here our apostle encourages Timothy, and in him all the succeeding ministers of the gospel, to the end of the world, against all the discouragements which either he or they might meet with from the impostors and seducers of the times, by assuring them of the issue and event of these trials; first, That God will put a bar in their way, that they proceed no farther in their hypocritical and juggling practices. Learn thence, That heretics and seducers are limited and bounded by God: they cannot do all the mischief they would, and they shall not do all they can. Secondly, That God would make their folly and madness manifest to their own confusion: their folly shall be discovered, and then abhorred, as was the folly and madness of Jannes and Jambres. Learn, That God will, in his own time, by the preaching of the word, discover false teachers and their delusions to the world.

10 But thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, patience.

11 Persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra; what persecutions I endured, but out of them all the Lord delivered me.

12 Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.

A special mean is here propounded, how Timothy and his successors may be preserved from the seduction of false teachers, namely, by setting before themselves the example of the great apostle St. Paul; we are more easily led by precedents than by precepts: therefore the apostle propounds his own example as a pattern; Thou hast fully known my doctrine, my manner of life and conversation, my purpose to adhere to my faith in Christ, my long-suffering and patience in undergoing persecution for him at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra, and how God was graciously pleased to deliver me out of all. Learn hence, 1. That younger ministers ought especially to observe the doctrine and conversation of the elder, the pious way and walking of the graver ministers, and must follow them. Aged Paul propounds his virtues to young Timothy for imitation; "thou hast fully known my doctrine and manner of life;" my doctrine to be sound and sincere, my life to be holy and unblameable. Learn, 2. That it is both lawful and laudable, at some times, and upon some occasions, to mention both the grace which God hath wrought in us, and also the sufferings and persecutions which we endure and undergo for him; "thou knowest what persecutions I endured at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra." Learn, 3. That always opposition, and often persecution, attends the preaching of the gospel wherever it goes. St. Paul went to Antioch, from Antioch to Iconium, from Iconium to Lystra, preaching the gospel; but persecution followed him hard at the heels wherever he went; but observe, how the goodness of God accompanied him too; out of them all the Lord delivered me; not only our dangers, but our deliverances also, must be recorded and observed. Observe, farther, how the apostle argues, from his own persecutions in particular, to all the godly's persecution in general; "yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution." Mark, not this or that godly man, but all, every one without exception; the better the men, the sooner persecuted; the devil shoots his arrow at the whitest and fairest mark: again, all that will: he doth not say, all that wish well to godliness, but, all that will, all that are absolutely resolved so to do: and farther, if he will live, if he can or will keep his godliness in his heart, and not discover it in his life, he may escape hatred and persecution: but if he will live religiously, let him look for persecution. Observe, farther, It is said, he that will live godly, and not civilly, but living godlily, exposes to the world's scorn and hatred: in a word, his goodness in Christ Jesus, that is, such godliness as is exerted in the virtue, strength and power of Christ Jesus particularly. Godliness in Christ Jesus is real and true godliness; it is exact godliness, it is an active godliness, it is a prevailing godliness, it is a world condemning godliness; such godliness cannot escape the world's hatred. Learn, that all those that show forth the power of religion in an holy conversation, must certainly look for persecution.

13 But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived.

Our apostle having acquainted us, in the former verse, with the condition of the godly, that they must expect and prepare for persecution, he lets us, in this verse, understand the miserable condition of the wicked, that they wax worse and worse; their proficiency is mere apostasy, they actively deceive others, and are passively deceived themselves by the devil, that lying spirit, that grand impostor. Learn hence, that the prosperous estate of wicked men is much more dangerous and miserable than the afflicted persecuted condition of the godly; the good by persecution grow better, but the wicked by living easy, wax worse and worse.

14 But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned, and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them;

15 And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Several arguments are here made use of by St. Paul, to press Timothy to the duty of perseverance in the doctrine of Christ, contained in the holy scriptures: the first is drawn from the authority of the person from whom he had received that doctrine, to wit, St. Paul himself, an inspired apostle of Jesus Christ. Continue in the things which thou hast learned; that is, from me, and by me, as an authorized apostle. All the servants of God, but especially the ministers of God, must continue constant in the faith, and steadfast in the truth received. The second argument for Timothy's adhering to the doctrine of the scriptures, is drawn from his long acquaintance with the scriptures, even from his childhood, yea, from his infancy; from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, &c. And the argument lies thus: "thou O Timothy, hast learnt the scriptures from thy infancy; now, what a shame would it be for thee, who hast been taught so early the true religion, to turn from it and forsake it; from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, from a suckling, as the word signifies." From whence learn, that it is the duty of parents to instruct their children betimes in the holy and good word of God: we read before of the care that Timothy's mother and grandmother took in that matter. Observe, 2. The title given to the word of God, the holy scriptures; they are holy in their author, holy in their matter, holy in their penman, holy in their end and design, which is to make us holy, John xvii. 17. The word of God is not only pure, but purifying, not only clean, but cleansing. Observe, 3. The high commendation given of the word: it is able to make thee wise unto salvation; no knowledge can bring us to salvation without the knowledge of the holy scriptures; the philosophers will teach you moral wisdom, but not a word of salvation by a Redeemer, without whom our salvation is impossible; therefore it is here added, —wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Jesus Christ. Learn thence, that the holy scriptures, though they instruct us in the way of salvation, yet cannot save us without faith in Christ Jesus.

16 All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness:

17 That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works,

Our apostle closes this chapter with an exhortation to Timothy to persevere in his study of the holy scriptures, by an argument drawn, 1. From the dignity and authority of the scriptures; 2. From their utility; 3. From their perfection, 1. From their dignity and authority, they are given by inspiration of God; that is, they are not the contrivance of any man's wit and fancy, but a revelation of the mind and will of God; and those that wrote them, were excited to it, and assisted in it by the Spirit of God: no part of scripture had either angels or men for its author, but every part of scripture is divinely inspired, or breathed by God, both for matter and order, style and words. A second argument is drawn from the utility and sufficiency of the holy scriptures; they are profitable for doctrine and instruction, teaching us what to know and believe in order to salvation, concerning God, and Christ, and ourselves, &c. for reproof of error, and confutation of false doctrine, for correction of sin and evil manners, for instruction in righteousness, directing us how to lead a righteous and holy life according to the will of God. A third argument is taken from the perfection of them, they are able to make "the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works;" that is, to make the ministers of Christ complete in knowledge, faith, and holiness, every way fitted for their work and duty, as christians and as ministers. Observe here, 1. That the scriptures of the Old Testament, and not of the New, must be the scriptures here intended, they being the only scriptures which Timothy had known from a child; that was before the scriptures of the New Testament were written. Observe, 2. That the apostle doth not say that these scriptures were of themselves sufficient to make Timothy wise unto salvation, but only that with faith in Christ Jesus they were sufficient for that end: much more then must the scriptures both of Old and New Testament together, when accompanied with faith in Jesus Christ, be sufficient for that end. Observe, 3. That the scriptures are a perfect, plain, and sufficient rule in all things necessary to salvation. 1. They are a perfect rule, because the writers of them were divinely inspired, and consequently their writings are infallible. 2. They are a plain rule; otherwise they would be no rule at all, of no more use to direct our faith and practice than a sun-dial in a dark room is to tell us the hour of the day: a rule that is not plain, whatever it may be in itself, is of no use to us till it be made plain. 3. They are a sufficient rule, they are able to make the man of God perfect, and wise to salvation. Here the church of Rome distinguishes and says, the scriptures are sufficient to salvation, but not to instruction; to whom one of the martyrs replied, "if so, God send me the salvation, and you the instruction." It is conceived by some, that this was the last epistle that ever St. Paul wrote; if so, this is the last charge that ever he gave, and concerns us the more to attend the solemnity of it. The chapter before us is St. Paul's cygnea cantio, his last and sweetest song; by a spiritual sagacity he saw his end approaching, and the time of his martyrdom to be at hand; he therefore like a dying man, adjures Timothy in a most awful and tremendous manner, to preach the word with all diligence and care, which he had so highly extolled in the foregoing chapter, as being able to make all persons wise unto salvation.

CHAPTER IV.

I CHARGE thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing, and his kingdom:

2 Preach the word; be instant in season, and out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine.

Observe here, 1. A most solemn adjuration and charge given, "I charge thee before God, and our Lord Jesus Christ," the Judge of quick and dead. Lord! what opiate can stupify the conscience of a minister, that he shall not feel the awful authority of such a charge, or not be awakened by such ardent expressions? How can they appear before the most high and everlasting Judge? What will be a sufficient defence before his enlightened tribunal? If such in the last judgment, who neglected to feed the poor with material bread, shall be placed at Christ's left hand; how can those whose office it is to dispense spiritual bread, if they neglect to do it, escape condemnation? Observe, 2. The subject matter of the charge, to preach according to Christ's commission, Mat. xxviii. 19. Go, preach and baptize; to preach the word, not the fancies and inventions of men, but the wholesome word of God, and the whole word of God, both law and gospel; the one to keep men from presumption, the other from despair, to be instant and active, urgent and zealous in the discharge of this duty, in all the parts of it, in instruction, reprehension, and exhortation; and this with all long-suffering, patience and lenity, undergoing meekly the contradiction of sinners, and the reproaches of men: and for the time to do it, in season, and out of season; that is to take all occasions, and be thankful unto God for all opportunities of preaching his word: the lazy may find a thousand excuses, but willing minds know no difficulties; they consider the price paid for souls, and the account that must be given of them. Observe, 3. The person to whom this charge is given; to Timothy, an ordained person, one set apart for the work: this is not a work common to all, but peculiar to some: God's Timothy's only, who are called and set apart by imposition of hands for the work of the ministry, must preach the word; and such ought to take all occasions, and be very instant in so doing, 1 Cor. ix. 16. "Necessity is laid upon us; yea, woe be unto us if we preach not the gospel."

3 For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine: but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears;

4 And they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables.

Here we have the reason of our apostle's solemn adjuration in the foregoing verses, by which he stirs up Timothy to a careful discharge of his duty; namely, in regard of the apostasy of the times, in which many would grow weary of sound doctrine and follow fables. Here note, 1. The ground of this apostasy, men's hatred of the truth; they will not endure sound doctrine; that is, they will reject and abhor it; they love their lust above God's law, and will not endure to hear it. A second ground of their apostasy, is, a delight in false teachers; they heap up to themselves such as will claw their itching ears, and gratify their wanton desires, and in no wise disturb their lusts. Thirdly, here is the doleful issue and dreadful consequence of this their malicious contempt of the truth: "they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and be turned into fables;" that is, say some, to the fabulous divinity of the Gnostics, made up of Gentilism and Judaism; the fabulous traditions of the Jewish doctors, say others. Learn hence, 1. that christian doctrine is sound doctrine, wholesome words. 2. Unsound persons cannot endure sound doctrine; sore eyes cannot abide the light. 3. That in the last days there shall be many false teachers to claw and gratify itching ears. 4. That the more false teachers do abound, the more careful and industrious should the ministers of Christ be to oppose them, by preaching sound doctrine.

5 But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry.

Behold here a fourfold duty pressed upon Timothy; 1. Watchfulness: watch thou in all things. As if he had said, "false teachers will beset you round on every side; therefore guard and watch every where." 2. Courage; Endure afflictions; he that fears the frowns of men, can never discharge his duty faithfully to God. 3. Fidelity: do the work of an Evangelist; which was an extraordinary, and therefore but a temporary office, to assist the apostles in preaching and publishing the gospel from place to place; they watered what the apostles planted. 4. Sincerity: make full proof of thy ministry; so fulfil all the parts of it, that none may charge thee with the neglect of any part of thy duty: let the world see that thou makest it thine own and only work to win souls. Learn hence, 1. That the apostasy and looseness of the times we live in, must oblige all persons, but especially the ministers of Christ, to watch: who should watch, if not the watchman? Learn hence, 2. That ministers, of all men, need courage: they must inure themselves to endure hardship, and expect hard words, hard dealings, nick-names, and all kind of reproaches; and these must be endured with patience, with courage, and with constancy. Learn, 3. That ministers must make full proof of their ministry; that is, must fully and faithfully discharge all the duties of their calling, not do their duties by halves; but accomplish all the parts of their ministry, strengthening the weak, comforting the afflicted, reducing the wandering, and adorning their doctrine by a pure and unblameable conversation. This is to fulfil our ministry.

6 For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand.

7 I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith:

8 Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.

Our apostle being now come almost to the end of his christian and ministerial race, he first looks downward into his grave with comfort, ver. 6. and sees his death a pleasing sacrifice to God, and a sweet departure to him: I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. Next he looks backward, and reflects upon his well spent life with joy; I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, ver. 7. Last of all he looks upward, and there sees heaven prepared for him, ver. 8. Henceforth is laid up for me a crown of righteousness. Observe, 1. St. Paul's intimation of his death; I am ready to be offered up; a sacrificial word: "I am ready to be poured out as a drink-offering; my death will be a sweet sacrifice to God, my blood being shed for Christ, as the wine was poured out on the meat-offering." Learn hence, that the death of God's ministers, especially of such as die martyrs, is a most pleasing sacrifice unto God: precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of all, but especially of such saints. Observe, 2. St. Paul's narration of his life; I have fought, I have finished, &c. The words run in figures taken from the Olympic games, where were combating, wrestling, running, according to the laws of the games, and judges appointed to declare the victories, and to give them the prize, a crown of garlands. The first metaphor is taken from a soldier, a combatant, a champion; I have fought a good fight. Learn, Every sincere christian, but especially every faithful minister, is a spiritual soldier; their enemies are spiritual, their weapons spiritual, their warfare spiritual, their victory spiritual: they must be men of courage, men of conduct, men that can endure hardship, men of unity and activity among themselves. The second metaphor is taken from a strenuous runner; I have finished my course; "I am come to the period of my days, and to the end of my race;" alluding perhaps to his course of life after his conversion, which was wholly spent in running from place to place to preach the gospel; and now he was come to the last stage or goal at Rome, where he was to receive his garland, his crown of martyrdom. Learn hence, A christian's life is a race, which he must not only cheerfully begin, but perseveringly finish: so says the apostle here, "I, Paul the aged, have fought the good fight, &c. have not only begun, but finished my course." O what a comfort is it to be an old soldier of Jesus Christ! St. Paul is now reckoned to be 61 years of age when he suffered martyrdom; he runs his race patiently, cheerfully, reservedly, and perseveringly. The third metaphor is taken from the depositaries, who faithfully keep things committed to their trust without embezzlement. This depositum, the christian faith, St. Paul had kept; I have kept the faith: he kept, first, the grace of faith, secondly, the doctrine of faith inviolable, endeavouring to transmit it down to posterity, in despite of the legal Jew, or the profane Gentile. Observe, 3. St. Paul's expectation of his reward: henceforth is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, &c. Here note, the reward is a crown of righteousness; because given only to righteous men; the person rewarding, Christ, the righteous Judge; the person rewarded, me, St. Paul himself, and all the faithful that love Christ's appearing. The certainty of the reward; it is laid up, reserved, and kept safe, as an inheritance for a child: the time of the reward: in that day, the great day of the Lord, when he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. Learn hence, 1. That the reward, which God has in hand for his faithful servants, is no less than a crown of glory. 2. That the time when this reward shall be fully and finally dispensed is the great day. 3. It is the property of the godly to look, love, and long for that day.

9 Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me.

10 For Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed unto Thessalonica: Crescens to Galatia, Titus unto Dalmatia, 11 Only Luke is with me. Take Mark and bring him with thee: for he is profitable to me for the ministry.

12 And Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus.

Our apostle comes now, in this second part of the chapter, to treat of some private and personal affairs: and first, he desires Timothy to come speedily to him, having a great desire to see him, and be comforted by him, before he died: the strongest of christians may sometimes be helped by the weaker; a Paul may stand in need of a Timothy: there is not a member in the body, but is some way serviceable to the head. Secondly, he assigns a reason why he did thus desire Timothy's presence, because of Demas and others' absence; Demas had forsaken him, having loved this present world. The best may sometimes be forsaken by their bosom friends; Demas was such to St. Paul, yet left him: for what cause? For the love of the world. This, when it grows inordinate, will cause a man first to forsake his friend, and then his God. Thirdly, Crescens was gone to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia, Tychicus to Ephesus; all of them, no doubt, to spread the gospel, to plant or water the churches. Good men will be doing good wherever they are, wherever they come or go. Only Luke was with him; nothing could separate that good man from him. A faithful friend loveth at all times; yet friendship (ollæ amicitia) will vanish in adversity; but true christian friendship is perpetual; the foundation of it is eternal. Lastly, He desires Timothy to bring Mark with him, not for rest or recreation, because he wanted a companion for his diversion; no, but to assist him in his work: bring Mark: for he is profitable to me for the ministry. It is happy when the ministers of God affect the company, and desire the presence of each other, for spiritual ends and religious purposes.

13 The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments.

St. Paul having desired Timothy's company at Rome, requests him to bring with him such things as he wanted, and stood in present need of. 1. His cloak; probably a garment which in the winter season he might want the warmth and benefit of, especially being in a cold prison. So long as we are upon earth, a prudential care must be taken to preserve our health: when winter approached, St. Paul sent for his winter garment to keep him warm: the body is the soul's organ or instrument by which it acts; therefore, we must do what in us lieth to keep it in tune for the service of the soul. 2. His books; probably the books of the Old Testament; certainly no profane books; he had no leisure for, nor liking to any such. 3. But especially the parchments: these are thought to be note-books of his own collecting, in which he had written several things for the help of his memory, and the benefit of the church. Behold here, 1. An eminent pattern of pious studiousness in St. Paul: he was an aged man, an aged minister, that had already read much; a prisoner, no very proper place for study, were prisons then filled with such brutes as generally now; nay, a dying prisoner, one that looked for death and beheading every day; yet aged Paul, dying Paul, cannot live without his books; he must still be reading, learning, studying the scriptures, especially, which are such a vast deep, as the line of an apostle could not fathom: behold I say a pattern for such ministers as think they know enough, they have studied enough, and are too old to learn; so was not our apostle, when within a few months of his death. 2. Behold here an eminent pattern of pious humility in Timothy, if bishop of Ephesus now, as some affirm, if only a minister of a particular church as others affirm; yet was he undoubtedly a very humble person, otherwise, St. Paul had not desired, and Timothy had certainly disdained to carry this luggage with him to Rome. Pride would have stooped to nothing of this, but thrown all to the dunghill; whereas true humility disposes a man, especially a minister of Christ, to become all things to all men.

14 Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil: the Lord reward him according to his works.

15 Of whom be thou aware also: for he hath greatly withstood our words.

Here our apostle, 1. Complains of the injuries and opposition which he had met with from Alexander the coppersmith, who was before a great professor, but now become a grievous persecutor: he made shipwreck of the faith, 1 Tim. i. 19. which he did before profess; nay, it is thought this man, Acts xix. 33, was near martyrdom, yet afterwards an opposer of the truth. The best things corrupted, become worst, the sweetest wine makes the sharpest vinegar. Be not offended then, if at any time you see professors turn blasphemers; nay, preachers themselves turn persecutors. Observe, 2. An apostolical prediction, rather than a dreadful imprecation, passed upon Alexander; the Lord reward him according to his works. The Lord will reward him according to his works. The apostle by a prophetic spirit, saw what was coming upon him, and foretels his doom. Imprecations against the enemies of the church, if lawful, yet must be cautiously and very rarely used: what we find in scripture looking like such, are rather to be accounted predictions than imprecations. Observe, lastly, the caution given to Timothy to shun him; of whom be thou aware also, for he is an opposer of the truth. Wicked men do not so much oppose the ministers, as the ministry; not so much oppose preachers, as preaching: it is the light of truth which evil-doers hate; because it has a searching, discovering, condemning power. St. Paul doth not complain of Alexander's unkindness towards him, but of his malicious resisting the truth, and hindering the preaching of the gospel; he hath greatly withstood our words.

16 At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me; I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge.

Our apostle here complains of the timorousness of weak christians in their carriage towards him, at his first appearing before Nero the emperor of Rome, or some of his officers; they deserted him, they all 'deserted him, very few durst own him: but this was out of weakness and timorousness, not out of maliciousness, as Alexander in the former verse; therefore, St. Paul prays for them. That God would not lay it to their charge, but pity and pardon their infirmity. Learn hence, How hard it will go with the holiest of saints, if God should lay but one sin, though a sin of infirmity, to their charge; it would sink them to the lowest hell. Lord! how sad must it then be to have the sins of the wicked man's whole life charged upon him! Learn, 2. That the holiest servants of God, in a suffering hour, may and must expect to be left alone, forsaken of all their friends, none daring to open their mouth, and speak a word for them: the apostle met with it here, and a greater than he before him; when Christ was apprehended, all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

17 Notwithstanding, the Lord stood with me and strengthened me; that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.

That is, "Though man forsook me, God stood by me; the Lord Jesus strengthened me, that by me, thus standing up in the defence of the gospel, the preaching of it might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear the defence of it; and thus, for that time, I was delivered out of Nero's hands, that bloody lion's mouth." Learn, 1. that whilst God has any farther work for his servants to do, he will assist and sustain them in despite of all opposition and discouragement whatsoever; though Nero roar, and persecutors rage, and friends desert, yet God will stand by, God will deliver, till his faithful servants have finished their work; The Lord stood by me, and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion, says the holy apostle. See here the certain character of the church's enemies: they are lions; lions for power, lions for policy, lions for terror, lions for cruelty; God sometimes delivers his people, and saves them from, sometimes suffers his dearest children to fall into, the paws, yea, the mouths, of these devouring lions.

18 And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom: to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Mark, he doth not say, the Lord will deliver me from every evil worker, but from every evil work; though he doth not save me from my temporal enemies, blessed be God my spiritual enemies shall never hurt me, neither sin nor satan. Lord! it is a far greater favor to be preserved from sin, than from any temporal affliction that can befall us, yea, than from death itself; The Lord will deliver me from every evil work; yea, farther, He will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom; God has a kingdom, an heavenly kingdom for all his saints, his suffering saints especially; it is prepared for them, they are preparing for it, and they shall be put into the possession of it in due time. He closes with a doxology here: To whom be glory for ever and ever, Amen. As God has prepared an eternal kingdom for his saints, so the desire that God may have glory from them to eternal ages: grace enlargeth the heart towards God, in fervent desires that his glory may be eternized.
(No. 64)

19 Salute Prisca and Aquila, and the household of Onesiphorus.

Observe here, How mindful the apostle is of his absent friends; though he was now in prison, and they a great way from him, yet he sends pious salutations to them. This Prisca or Priscilla, and Aquila, are often remembered by St Paul, he lodged in their house at Corinth: the saints and servants of God forget not one another, when at the ends of the earth.—He salutes also Onesiphorus and his household, wife and children, and servants. Thus do pious governors procure a blessing upon their families as well as upon their persons. Onesiphorus is not only prayed for himself, and saluted singly, but likewise his household also; Salute Prisca and Aquila, and the household of Onesiphorus.

20 Erastus abode at Corinth: but Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick.

Erastus is mentioned, Rom. xvi. 23, as chamberlain of the city of Corinth, one that showed kindness to Paul; he was a great man, the treasurer of the city of Corinth; yet neither his riches, nor his great place, could keep him from loving the apostle and the afflicted church of God. Rarely are great men good, and as rarely are good men great; yet some great men are good, and some good men are great. Lot and Abraham, Job and David were full of riches, yet full of piety, under the Old Testament: so were Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea, and Zaccheus, under the New. Thus God magnifies the power of converting grace.—Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick. This man was a citizen of Ephesus, a disciple and companion of St Paul, Acts xx. whom he was forced to leave sick at Miletum. Note, Strength of grace cannot prevail against bodily weaknesses and diseases; sickness may seize even the best men. Note also, that the apostles had not the gift of healing, when they pleased, but only when God gave it them.

21 Do thy diligence to come before winter, Eubulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren.

Our apostle being greatly desirous to see Timothy before his death, reneweth his request and suit to him to make haste and come before winter: the personal presence of good men is much, very much desired by them, in order to excite and quicken each other. To encourage Timothy to hasten to him, he names several persons of note that were then at Rome, who sent salutations to him, and would rejoice to see him: but where were all these when our apostle was upon his trial? Ans. They all forsook him, and not one of them stood with him. Behold what frailty there may be! and what fear will do, in persons of choice note for eminency and grace in the church of God!

22 The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you. Amen.

The apostle concludes this, like his other epistles, with an apostolical benediction, The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit: as if he had said, "Be not sad at my departure; for, though I must leave thee, yet the Lord will uphold thee by his grace, and be present with thee by the influence of the holy Spirit." The inward presence of Christ with the spirits of his people, directing their spirits in thinking, judging, choosing, and refusing, is a sweet privilege and greatly to be desired. Happy they who have the spirit of Christ perpetually present with them, who so live, that Christ may delight to dwell by his Spirit in them. Grace be with you, that is, with all of you; he doth not say, riches be with you, or honors be with you, or the favor of man be with you, but grace, and the favor of God be with you. God's special favor and distinguishing grace is to be sought by all persons, above and before all things.—Lastly, Our apostle ratifies and seals up all with that concluding particle, Amen; teaching us, that whatever we should pray for, should be rightly understood, firmly believed, and earnestly desired, and heartily consented to: they sin in prayer, who understand not what they pray for, and who do not earnestly desire what they pray for: for in testimony of our desires to be heard, we say, Amen.

THE

EPISTLE OF SAINT PAUL

TO TITUS.

St. Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus, are the church's canons which the Holy Ghost indited very sufficient to their use and end. O how happy had the church been in all ages, if strict canonical obedience had been paid, as well as sworn unto them.

Titus was a Gentile, converted early to Christianity by St. Paul, who having great experience of his piety and prudence, left him in Crete, to govern the church of God in that island.

This epistle to Titus is of the same nature, and wrote with the same design, as those to Timothy, only shorter; because Titus seems to have been the ancients and more experienced person; St. Paul briefly instructs him in all parts of his duty, in electing church governors, in censuring false teachers, in instructing the ancient and younger persons, in pressing upon all persons obedience to magistrates, and a care to maintain good works.

CHAPTER I.

Titus being placed by St. Paul in Crete, St. Paul writes to him how he ought to demean himself there, by appointing in every city bishops or elders, to teach and govern those that were already or should afterwards be converted to the faith of Christ; exhorting him to be very careful to make choice of worthy and fit persons into this high and honorable office, men of sound doctrine, and unblameable lives.

PAUL, a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect, and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness;

2 In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began.

3 But hath in due times manifested his word through preaching, which is committed unto me, according to the commandment of God, our Saviour.

4 To Titus mine own son, after the common faith, grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.

These verses contain the apostle's salutation, and the first part of this chapter; in which, observe, 1. The person saluting, described by his name, Paul; by his general office, a servant of God; by his special office, an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the end of his office to preach the faith, and thereby to promote the faith of God's elect, and to bring persons to the acknowledgment of the doctrine of the gospel, which is truth according to godliness. Learn hence, that the great design and end of preaching the gospel, is, to produce faith in the heart, and holiness or godliness in the life, of those that sit under it; not that common notional, and intellectual faith, which is oftentimes found in unholy persons; but that lively faith, which is elsewhere called The faith of the operation of God, and here, The faith of God's elect; even such a faith as is the parent and principle of obedience. Observe, 2. The apostle declares a farther end of his office, namely, to raise christians up to a lively hope and expectation of that eternal life, which that God, who cannot lie, hath promised before the world began. But how could God then promise, when there was none to promise to? Ans The promise was made to Christ, and in him to all his members: for there was a federal transaction betwixt the Father and the Son from all eternity; the Son promised to give his soul an offering for sin, and the Father engaged that he should see his seed, and the travail of his soul. Observe, 3. How God, who promised us in Christ eternal life, before all time, did accomplish and make good that word in the fulness of time. Verse 3. "He hath in due time manifested his word through preaching;" that is, what God so long ago purposed in himself, and promised to his Son, he hath in the fittest appointed seasons, made manifest by the preaching of the gospel, which is committed to me by the appointment of God and Christ. Learn hence, That the doctrine of salvation is much more clearly revealed to us that live under the gospel, than it was to the fathers of the Old Testament: life and immortality, that is, the clearer knowledge, and more full assurance of eternal life, is now brought about, by the preaching of the gospel. Observe, 4. The person saluted, Titus described by his relation, St. Paul's son in the faith; he begat him by his ministry unto God, was the instrument of his conversion to christianity: his son after the common faith. Where note, that the church hath but one faith, common to all christians, it has one common object of faith, Christ crucified; it has one common end of faith, eternal salvation: this is the end of every believer's faith and hope. Observe, lastly, The salutation itself: "Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour;" that is, all spiritual, temporal, and eternal blessings, I most heartily wish unto you from God the Father, and Jesus Christ our worthy Mediator. Learn hence, that whatever spiritual grace, or temporal blessing we now receive from God, is from him not barely as a Creator, but as a Father, a gracious Father in Christ, in whom he pours forth the immensity of his love upon us, and through whom he conveys all kinds of blessings unto us.

5 For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee.

Observe here, 1. The erection of a power in the person of Titus: I left thee in Crete to ordain elders: "I who am an apostle of Christ, and have received a commission from him thus to do. I left thee, thee who wert so dear to me, so useful to me; yet, for the church's service, did I deny myself and part with thee." Behold here a blessed pattern for our ministerial imitation. St. Paul did, and could, most cheerfully sacrifice all his private advantages, the tenderest and inmost of his affection to the benefit of the church, and the interest of religion; let us go and do likewise. Observe, 2. The end of this institution, or the use and exercise of this power, to order and to ordain, corrupt and constitute; 1. To set in order things that are wanting: the ship of the church is never so well rigged, but something is wanting that might be added: whilst the tabernacle of God sojourns here below, some pin or other will be lacking in it. 2. To ordain elders in every city, such as might govern and teach, and administer to God in holy things; wherever a church is planted, there is an absolute necessity of a settled ministry, and a succession of ministers, without which it is impossible that religion should either prosper or long continue: and care must be taken, that such ministers be duly qualified, and regularly ordained, "I left thee in Crete to ordain elders." Observe, 3. The limitation of these acts, according to the apostle's prescription, as I had appointed thee. Thus must do nothing but according to commission, and by special direction. Where note, that the ordering and governing of the church was not left arbitrary, no, not to Titus himself: but whatever he did, was done by apostolical direction:

"For this cause I left thee in Crete, that thou shouldst ordain elders in every city, as I appointed thee."

6 If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, and accused of riot, or unruly.

7 For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God; not self-willed, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre;

8 But a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate;

9 Holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers.

Here St. Paul gave Titus, as he had before done Timothy, the character of such persons as were to be admitted into the sacred function. The character is two-fold, positive and negative; he shows them both what they should be, and what they should not be. The positive characters of a bishop, yes, of every one that administers to God in holy things, are these: he must be blameless, free from scandal, not blame-worthy, a minister's life should be so bright and shining, that all persons who behold it may admire it and guide their lives by the direction and example of it. The husband of one wife; that is, at once; the apostle's command doth not forbid successive marriages; for this he elsewhere allows; see the note on 1 Tim. iii. 2. Nor does the command oblige him to marry at all, but it establishes the lawfulness of a bishop's marriage, if he sees reason for it; yet, no doubt, by these words, The husband of one wife, St. Paul proposes a greater degree of chastity to church-governors than to other persons. Having faithful children not accused of riot, or unruly Titus must not only look at the person he is to ordain, but to the family and household of the person ordained, that they be well governed, because the honor of religion, and the reputation of the church suffers exceedingly, when any of the bishop's family, his children especially, are riotous and unruly; besides, the world will pronounce them unfit to govern the church of God, that cannot command their own families. As the steward of God; the steward is an appointed and deputed officer, he acts by commission, and distributes his Lord's allowance, according to his Lord's command, and is accountable for all he does; and as he is over the inferior servants, so must he be a pattern and president for them; a steward must be both wise and faithful: A lover of hospitality, sober, temperate; mark, of hospitality, not of luxury and sensuality; as he commands hospitality, so he regulates it too, a lover of hospitality, yet sober and temperate; riotous housekeeping is not hospitality in St. Paul's account, but the liberal and free relieving of such as are in necessities and straits: Holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught. He must be a person well instructed, well settled and confirmed in the faith, of ability to defend the faith, and to stop the mouths of gainsayers:—Just, holy, and a lover of good men, a person of strict holiness and piety towards God, of exact righteousness and justice towards man, and a sincere lover of all good men. These are the positive characters required in a bishop. The negatives follow, and they are five; not self-willed; not so adhering to his own resolutions, that nothing can divorce him from them; he that is of an inflexible will had need be of an infallible judgment; not soon angry, and subject to passion, for he stands in God's place, and ought to resemble God in long-suffering and patience; not given to wine; that is, to much wine, no inordinate lover of it, no sinner at wine, either in his own house or elsewhere; no striker either with the hand, or with the tongue; not given to filthy lucre, seeking to get wealth by sordid ways and means; the sin of covetousness is not so base in any man as in a minister; many are unjustly charged with it, but where it is really found it is a sordid sin. How unfit is he to administer in holy things to God, who prefers the world before God? By making a god of the world we make an idol of God.

10 For there are many unruly and vain talkers, and deceivers, especially they of the circumcision:

11 Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake.

A reason is here subjoined by our apostle, why Titus should take such special care to fill the church with able guides, namely, because there were a multitude of false teachers dispersed abroad, and scattered up and down every where, particularly, the Judaizing doctors, those of the circumcision, mentioned, Acts xv, who would make christianity nothing more than a supplement to the law of Moses. These, he tells Titus, must have their mouths stopped, not by force, for Titus had no power of the sword, but by confutation; he must take care to ordain such as might silence them, though not satisfy them. For, mark the efficacy of error, and the power of seduction, they subvert whole houses, they make proselytes without number. Learn hence, that such is the strength of error, and the weakness and unsteadiness of many christians, that whole households may be subverted by the most gross deceivers. If the apostle's converts were thus easily and universally misled, no wonder if ours be so.

12 One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies.

13 This witness is true: Wherefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith;

14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men that turn from truth.

The next argument Paul makes use of to excite Titus to take great care how he behaved himself at Crete, and what bishops he left there, is drawn from the quality and nature of the people in that island of Crete, where God's providence and the apostle's care had placed him: he tells him that one of their own prophets or poets, Epimenides, had given this character of them. That the Cretians were a lazy and a lying people, ready enough to be misled by the false teachers, particularly the Judaizing doctors, who imposed circumcision and other ceremonial rites upon them, which were now old fables, but tended to pervert men from the truth: therefore, he charges Titus to reprove sharply and cuttingly, that they may be sound in the faith. The word is a metaphor taken from surgeons, who cut out dead flesh to the quick, but it is in order to healing; cutting words have done great cures: many a diseased, festering soul has been made sound both in faith and manners, by severe reprehension. Learn hence, That although generally speaking, we ought to temper our reproofs with much gentleness and meekness, yet there is a time when we must reprove sharply, that men may be sound in the faith. We may, we must speak cutting words, when kind words will not do.

15 Unto the pure all things are pure: But unto them that are defiled, and unbelieving, is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled.—

Here our apostle intimates what those Jewish traditions and fables were, which those judaizing doctors and false teachers would obtrude and impose upon persons at that time, namely, pretences that men were defiled by eating things unclean, by not observing their days, and keeping other ceremonial rites. But, says the apostle, unto the pure all things are pure; that is, to believers who are sanctified by the christian faith, and purified from sin and guilt, all meats, and days, and things of this nature are clean and lawful, and may without sin be used, every creature being sanctified by the word of God and prayer. Here note, The honorable title which a gracious and merciful God puts upon good men, notwithstanding they have much impurity and sin inhering in them, and many sinful weaknesses and infirmities cleaving to them, yet God calls them pure. Unto the pure, &c. they are now initially so, and shall ere long be perfectly so. Note, 2. A privilege purchased for them by the blood of Christ, and that is, the lawful liberty and use of all meats, &c. under the gospel, which were prohibited by, and forbidden under the ceremonial law; unto the pure all things are now pure.

—But unto them that are defiled, and unbelieving, is nothing pure;

Mark, He doth not say, to the defiled all things are unclean, but, nothing is pure; they pollute all they touch: to an unsanctified man nothing is sanctified; whatever he does is unclean, either in the matter, in the manner, or in the end of his doing it; and the reason follows, because their mind and conscience is defiled. No wonder the streams are polluted, when the fountains are poisoned. The mind and conscience are defiled, partly by blindness, partly by stupidity and senselessness.

16 They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

Behold here the dismal character of many hypocritical persons in the Jewish church: they professed the knowledge of God, the true God; but in their works, in their lives and actions they denied him, and so became abominable both to God and man, disobedient to the law, and averse to every good work. Here learn, 1. That hypocrites are generally great professors; they profess great knowledge of God, and great zeal for him. 2. That to deny God is a very heinous sin, and an abominable wickedness: there is a twofold denial of God; first in works, expressly and openly; secondly, in practice, closely and consequentially; "They profess that they know God, but in works they deny him." There may be at once a professing of God, and a denial of him: many a man's practice speaks loud, that there is no God, when he makes a fair confession and profession of him with his mouth and tongue. Learn, 3. That no sorts of persons are so odious to God, and abominable in his sight, as those who make a profession of his holy name and truth, but walk contrary in their lives to that profession.

CHAPTER II.

Our apostle in this chapter directs Titus how to discharge his duty faithfully as a minister of Christ, in preaching the gospel, advising him to instruct all, both young and old, parents and children, masters and servants, in the practice of their relative and respective duties one towards another, that God might be glorified, and religion adorned: and here, first, he instructs him in general to preach to the people wholesome and sound doctrine; and then directs him particularly to apply that doctrine to the several sorts and conditions of men.

BUT speak thou the things which become sound doctrine.

As if our apostle had said, whatever the forementioned judaizing doctors preach, though they dote upon dreams, and feed their hearers with fables, and fancies, to poison and corrupt their souls, and turn them from the truth; be sure that thou carriest thyself as becomes a sound preacher of the gospel, and speak only the things that become sound doctrine: the body may as soon be nourished with carrion, as the soul with rotten and unsound doctrine. Christian doctrine is sound doctrine: and the ministers of Christ, who feed his people, must take care that they bring such wholesome doctrine, to their people, as may contribute greatly to their spiritual health and soundness; "Speak thou the things which become sound doctrine."

2 That the aged men be sober, grave, temperate, sound in faith, in charity, in patience:

By aged men, we may understand all ancient men in general, and church officers in particular, in whom our apos-

He requires and calls for gravity and sobriety in behaviour, temperance in all things, that they be sound in faith, sincere in charity, and constant in patience. Where note, That our apostle exempleth none from the instructions, admonitions, and exhortations of the ministers of God. God's school is as well for the aged as the young, not only for initiating youth, but also for edifying the aged, and building them up in their most holy faith; the aged have but a little time to be in the world, their nature declines, their days are almost ended, they must therefore labor to recompense a decay of nature with increase of grace, the weakness of body with strength of faith: Let the aged men be sound in the faith. Note farther, That sobriety, gravity, temperance, soundness in the faith, eminent charity, and exemplary patience, are the great ornaments of persons in their old age.

3 The aged women likewise, that they be in behaviour as becometh holiness, not false accusers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things;

4 That they may teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children:

5 To be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God be not blasphemed.

Instructions are here given for the aged women, as before for the aged men, that is, for all in general: and such aged women in particular as were deaconesses, or servants to the church, that they being placed in the rank of church officers should act and walk as becometh holy persons employed about holy things; particularly, that their deportment and behaviour be such, both in habit and gesture, as becometh holiness, that they be not false accusers, devils, the original signifies, because false accusing is the devil's work; they that do his work shall bear his name: Not given to much wine; excess in drinking is bad in men, worse in women, worst of all in old women, who ought to be patterns of piety and prudence, of sobriety and temperance, to the younger women; for St. Paul here directs them to teach the younger; that is, by their private admonitions and prudent examples, instruct them to be wise and sober, not light and airy; and to love their husbands and children in a fit and becoming manner, and to show it in their behaviour; discreet and chaste in all their actions, keeping at home and minding the affairs of the family; to be kind and obedient to their husbands, lest the miscarriages of young women should bring reproach upon religion, and the gospel be thought by the men of the world to infuse any thing into them contrary to moral virtue. Learn hence, That the wholesome doctrine of the gospel must be preached and practically applied to women as well as to men, as they cannot, without the danger of damnation, despise or neglect the ministry of the word.

6 Young men likewise exhort to be sober-minded.

Note here, 1. That the ministers of God must apply themselves and their doctrine to the several sexes, ages and conditions of their people; that every person, man and woman, young and old, superior and inferior, may know not only what is lawful, but what is expedient, most becoming their quality, and best becoming their age. Here our apostle directs Titus to exhort first the aged men, next the aged women; now the younger men, that they be sober-minded, settled in the truth, governed by sound judgment, not governed by passion, not led by sense and appetite, not pulled up with proud conceit: where it is observable, that St. Paul's warnings here given in this chapter to the aged men, the aged women, and the younger men, do intimate to us what vices they are that all persons are subject to, and most endangered by; and this is the wise improvement that all should make of it, to watch against the sins of their age and condition, their complexion and constitution, their calling and vocation, every sin that doth so easily beset them, and obstructs and hinders them in their christian course.

7 In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works: In doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity.

8 Sound speech that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you.

St. Paul having directed Titus what doctrine to preach, comes now to instruct him what example to lead: in all things show thyself a pattern of good works; as if he had said, in all the good which thou exhortest thy hearers to, be an eminent pattern of it thyself: that they may see that visibly in thy life, which thou presentest upon them by thy preaching. By piety and good works second thy doctrine; there must be a sweet harmony between a minister's doctrine and his conversation; otherwise he pulls down faster than he builds up: an heterodox conversation will carry an orthodox preacher to hell. He closes this admonition to Titus concerning preaching, with this solemn charge, namely, that his doctrine be sound and profitable, sincere without mixture, grave without levity, sound words, that can never be confuted by gainsayers, which must be expected; but happy will you be if they can have nothing justly to charge your doctrine or conversation with. Learn hence, That the ministers of God have ever had, and must always expect some that will withstand, oppose and gainsay them, as long as there is a devil in the world; and so long as the ministers of God endeavour to batter down the wall of his kingdom, he will raise storms about their ears. Learn, 2. That it is the duty, and must be the care and endeavour of all the ministers of God, to oblige themselves to such an exemplary piety of conversation, as may stop the mouth of slander, that the contrary party may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say against them.

9 Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again;

10 Not purloining, but showing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.

Although Titus, according to some, was a bishop, yea, an archbishop, yet St. Paul exhorts him to look upon the instruction of servants as one part of his charge. Exhort servants; the souls of the poorest slaves, and servants, for whom the Son of God died, must be of precious account with, and be particularly concerned for, by the highest ambassador of Christ: as all souls had an equal price, so must they have an equal care. Observe, 2. The general duty which servants are exhorted to, and that is obedience to their own masters, in all honest and lawful things, whether their masters were pagans or christians; if pagans, not thinking that their christianity freed them from their just commands; if christian masters, not thinking that they had therefore a greater liberty to be saucy with them, or less obedient to them. Observe, 3. The particular duties here pressed upon servants. 1. Not answering again, not crossing or contradicting what they are commanded, not saucily replying when they are reprov'd. 2. Not purloining, that is, not stealing the least thing, nor taking any thing that is their master's, which is not allowed by their consent, but showing all conscionable trustiness, and that great fidelity and honesty may be found with them. Observe, 4. The argument or motive to stir up servants to this conscionable care and conscientious discharge of their duty, "That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things," that is, that they may put honor upon Christ and his holy religion, by beautifying their christian profession by a suitable and becoming conversation. Learn hence, That it is in the power of the poorest and meanest servant to do much good or much hurt to the christian religion: some might be ready to say, Alas! What good or hurt, what credit or discredit can a poor servant do to religion? Much every way: he may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, by his christian behaviour as a servant, and the name of God and his doctrine may be blasphemed by him, if he be negligent in his duty. None are so little and inconsiderable, but they are capable of serving the great ends of religion, capable of doing good service for God on earth, and of being eternally rewarded by God in heaven.

11 For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men.

12 Teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world;

As if the apostle had said, Let all sorts of men, servants and masters, children and parents, old and young, discharge their duties faithfully to God and one another: for the grace of God discovered in the gospel, has appeared to all men, teaching them to deny all doctrines and practices which are ungodly, and all worldly lusts of sensuality, and that we should live soberly, with respect to ourselves, righteously and charitably towards our neighbour, and holily towards God in this present world. Note here, 1. A choice and excellent description of the gospel; it is the grace of God, that is, the doctrine of God's free grace and gratuitous favor declared in Christ to poor sinners. Note, 2. The joyful message which the gospel brings, and that is salvation: the gospel makes a gracious tender of salvation, and that universally to lost and undone sinners. Note, 3. The clear light and evidence that it does hold forth this message in and by; it has appeared or shined forth like the day star, or the rising sun. Note, 4. The extent of its glorious beams, how far they reach, to all indefinitely, The grace of God bringing salvation has appeared to all men; that is, it is tendered to all without restriction or limitation. 1. As to nations, Jew or Gentile; 2. As to persons, rich or poor, bond or free; 3. Without restriction, as to the number and greatness of their sins; 4. Without restriction, in reference to the degree of their graces. Note, 5. The great lesson which the gospel teaches, negative and positive: 1. Negative, To deny ungodliness and worldly lusts; where, by ungodliness, understand all sins committed against the first table; by worldly lusts, all sins committed against the second table; called worldly lusts, because the object of them is worldly things, and because they are the lusts of worldly men. 2. Positive, to live. 1. Soberly; he begins with our duty to ourselves, then to our neighbour, and last of all to God, and so proceeds from the easier to the harder duties: and observe the connexion, soberly and righteously, and godly, not disjunctively; as if to live soberly, righteously, or in pretence godly, were sufficient. A sobriety in speech, in behaviour, in apparel, in eating and drinking, in recreations, and in the enjoyment of lawful satisfactions. 2. Righteously, exercising justice and charity towards our neighbour: he that is uncharitable, is unjust and unrighteous, and the unrighteous shall no more enter into the kingdom of God, than the unholy: and all a person's pretences to godliness are but hypocrisy, without righteousness towards our neighbour. 3. Godly; Godliness has an internal and external part; the internal and inward part of godliness consists in a right knowledge of him, in a fervent love unto him, in an entire trust and confidence in him, in a holy fear to offend him, in subjecting our wills entirely to him, in holy longings for the fruition and enjoyment of him. The external and outward part of godliness consists in adoration and bodily worship; this is due to God from us; he was the Creator of the body as well as of the soul, the Redeemer of the body as well as of the soul, and will glorify the body as well as the soul; therefore are we to glorify God with our bodies, and with our spirits, which are the Lord's. Note, 6. The time when, and the place where this lesson is to be learnt, in this present world. Here is the place, and now is the time when this duty of living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, is to be performed by us. Learn, That a sober, righteous and godly life, in this present world, is absolutely necessary in order to our obtaining the happiness and glory of the world to come. Inference: If so, what a cheat doth that man put upon his soul, who trusts to a death-bed repentance? Be it never so sincere, how can it be said to be a living soberly, righteously and godly in this world, when just stepping into eternity?

13 Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ:

Observe here, 1. The character given of that reward which the gospel promises to them that live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; this is described

1. By its futurity, it is hope, something expected, and to come; 2. By its transcendency, it is a blessed hope. Learn, That the christian's hope (or the good things hoped for) is laid up, not in this world but in the other; because this world, and this present state, is not capable of that happiness which the christian hopes for. It is too great, it is too good for earth, it is laid up in heaven. Observe, 2 The time and season when this glorious reward and blessed hope shall be dispensed and given forth unto the godly, and that is, at the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Where note, A threefold description of Christ. 1. By the immensity of his Deity, he is the great God. 2. By the graciousness of his office, our Saviour. 3. By the glory of his advent, or appearance, "looking for the glorious appearance of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Observe, 3. The christian's duty, with reference and relation to this reward, and to the appearance of Christ, when it shall be dispensed and given forth, namely, to look and long for that joyful hour. Learn, That the great duty incumbent on all the people of God, is to be continually looking and longing for, hoping and expecting of, the coming and appearance of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; looking for the blessed hope, &c.

14 Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

Observe here, 1. The way and manner how Christ came to be our Saviour, He gave himself for us. Note, 1. The giver, Christ, he gave. 2 The gift, himself. 3. The persons for whom he gave himself, for us. Learn, 1. That all that Jesus Christ suffered, he did sustain and undergo freely and voluntarily. 2. That that which Christ gave for our redemption, was himself. 3. That it was especially for his church, that he gave himself, who gave himself for us. Observe, 2. The great ends for which Christ gave himself for his church, and they are two: 1. To redeem them from all iniquity. 2. To purify them a peculiar people to himself. 1. To redeem them from iniquity; redemption supposes a thralldom and bondage; redemption from iniquity supposes a thralldom and bondage to sin and iniquity: our Redeemer therefrom is Jesus Christ, and by dying for us, he did, and only could redeem us: "He gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity." 2. Another end of Christ's redeeming us, is to purify us to himself a peculiar people. Here note, That as redemption did presuppose a bondage, so purification, supposes an uncleanness, that is, sin. Note, 2. That Christ's redeemed people are a purified people, and a peculiar people, possessed by the Spirit of Christ, with a zeal for good works. Note, 3 That it was not only for us that Christ redeemed and purified us a peculiar people to himself, but ultimately for himself, and for his own and his Father's glory and complacency; that he might purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

15 These things speak and exhort, and rebuke with all authority. Let no man despise thee.

As if he had said, Let these necessary practical truths be the subject-matter of thy preaching, and according to the authority of thy office rebuke gainsayers, and let thy doctrine and behaviour in wisdom and gravity be such, as may keep and preserve thee from all contempt. The ministers of Christ are to take especial care that they neither expose their persons nor their office, by any indecencies to contempt; Let no man despise thee.

CHAPTER III.

In the former chapters our apostle instructed Titus, that he should, in the exercise of his ministry, propound the several offices and duties of christianity unto several estates and conditions of persons; to men and women, to young and old; that so they might be good in all relations, and live religiously in every capacity.

Now in this concluding chapter of his epistle, he directs Titus to preach and press more general duties which concern all mankind, as, to be ready to every good work, to speak evil of no man; to show meekness to all men, to be careful to maintain good works; because the false apostles, instead of pressing the necessity of a good life, did amuse the people with idle notions, foolish questions, and endless disputes. Accordingly, St. Paul doth thus bespeak him:

PUT them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready to every good work.

Observe here, That in those early days of christianity, great scandal was brought upon religion by the undutiful carriage of servants and subjects towards their masters and magistrates; and this upon a false notion of christian liberty, advanced and propagated by the false apostles, Judaizing teachers, and gnostic libertines: whereupon he requires Titus to put christians in mind of their duty in that particular, and to inculcate it earnestly upon them, that the christian religion might not be slandered upon this account. "Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers." Learn hence, That the duty of subjection to governors and government, and of obedience to magistrates and rulers, is of very great importance, and ought to be enforced and frequently inculcated upon the people by the ministers of God; because by nature all men desire liberty, and to cast off the yoke of God: every one would rule and govern, although the duty of subjection be much the easier duty. 2. From St. Paul's pressing Titus to preach up the doctrine of obedience and subjection to governors and government, learn, that there is no such way and method to bring the world to live regularly under government, like planting the gospel among them, and making them subject to our Lord Jesus Christ.

2 To speak evil of no man, to be no brawlers, but gentle, showing all meekness unto all men.

Calumny and evil-speaking has been a reigning vice in all ages, and a greater guilt is contracted by it than men apprehend: every man ought to be as just to his neigh-hour's reputation as his own? If what we report of another we know to be false, it is downright lying; if what we report of others we believe to be false, it is slander; if what evil we report of others be really true, and we know it to be so, yet it is defamation, and contrary to that charity and goodness which christianity requires; for to divulge the faults of others, though they be really guilty of them, without necessity, is certainly a sin, and included in this apostolical prohibition: to think and speak evil of others, is not only a bad thing but a sign of a bad man; and in many cases it is as great charity to conceal an evil we hear of our neighbour, as it is to relieve him in his distress. The next exhortation is, to be no brawlers; in the original, no fighters! that is neither with tongue nor hand, but meek and gentle, putting up a double wrong, rather than revenging a single injury, using all meekness towards all men. Meekness pacifies wrath, and conquers animosity to a wonder, making him tame and gentle, who by opposition is furious and implacable; the hardest flint is sooner broken upon a pillow or cushion that gently yieldeth, than upon a bar of iron that furiously resisteth.

3 For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another.

Here we have a very weighty reason laid down by our apostle, why christians should be found in the practice of the forementioned virtues of equity and lenity, of patience and charity, of meekness and long-suffering one towards another; namely, because before their conversion they themselves lived in the practices of the forementioned vices as well as others, we ourselves also were foolish, disobedient, &c. that is, the servants of sin, and slaves to our lusts, suffering wrath to rest in our bosoms till it boiled up to revenge; having formerly, therefore, been such ourselves, we ought to pity rather than spurn at those that are so still. No argument will more effectually incline and dispose us to pity the miscarriages of others, than the consideration, that we ourselves are prone unto, and have heretofore been guilty of the same, or the like provocations ourselves.

4 But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared,

5 Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;

6 Which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

As if our apostle had said, though in our heathenish and unconverted state, we were as bad and vile as any, yet no sooner did the loving-kindness of God to fallen man appear, by the illumination of the gospel, and the communication of his grace, not for any good works or deserts of ours, but of mere mercy and free goodness, he saved us from that state of sin and misery by regeneration, signified and sealed in baptism, and by renewing of the Holy Ghost, which holy Spirit was poured forth in an extraordinary measure upon us (according to promise) after Christ's resurrection. Here observe, how every person in the Trinity acts distinctly in the work of our salvation: 1. The fountal cause, the spring and source of our happiness, lies in the kindness and love of God the Father. 2. The meritorious and procuring cause of the application of this love, is Jesus Christ, in the work of redemption and mediation. 3. The immediate and efficient cause of the communication of that love of God the Father, procured through the mediation of Christ the Son, is the holy Spirit in the work of regeneration.

(No. 65.)

—Which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

7 That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life;

That is, which holy Spirit was in its gifts and graces plentifully poured forth upon us, and dwelleth in us, not essentially, but energetically, illuminating, guiding, strengthening and confirming of us: and the end of God herein, is, that being justified by his grace, that is, by faith in his Son, we should be made heirs of eternal life, according to the hope which the promises of God have given us thereof. Learn hence, 1. That all the grace which is so plentifully poured forth upon believers, is by the means and mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn, 2. That justification being a sinner's absolution from guilt and punishment by the satisfaction of Christ the Redeemer, is yet an act of special grace, and free favor in God, that being justified by his grace. Learn, 3. that it is the blessed privilege of all justified persons, that they are now heirs to, and ere long shall be possessors of eternal life; they shall ere long have in hand, what now they possess in hope; being justified by grace, we are heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

8 This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works, these things are good and profitable unto men.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, spoken of justification by grace without works of righteousness, doth here immediately give a strict and solemn charge to Titus, to press the necessity of good works, upon those who did believe and embrace the gospel, on purpose to prevent all mistake and abuse of the doctrine of justification by faith, and free grace and mercy of God in Jesus Christ; intimating, that they who are justified by the faith of the gospel should be so far from thinking themselves hereby excused from good works, that they ought, upon that account, to be the more careful to maintain and practise them, because by the very profession of the christian faith and religion, they have solemnly engaged themselves so to do. Observe here,

1. That the great design of christianity, and the end of God in the revelation of the gospel was to reform the lives and manners of men, and to oblige all persons both to be good, and to do good. Learn, 2. From the apostle's vehement asseveration, this is a faithful saying, and his solemn charge, these things I will that thou affirm constantly; that there have been persons in all ages, who have exalted the virtue of faith, if not intentionally, yet indiscreetly, to the prejudice and neglect of a good life. As if by a mere speculative belief and profession of christianity, men were discharged from the practice of moral duties. God grant that the decried morality of some persons may be an integral part of my religion. Learn, 3. That though good works are not necessary before justification to bring us into a justified state, yet are they necessary after justification in order to our continuance in that state:—Not by works of righteousness which we have done, that is, before faith: but he doth not exclude the works of righteousness in the least, that they should hereafter do, by virtue of the new nature given to them, from being conditions of their future happiness. As morality doth not make faith useless, so neither doth faith bring any excuse for immorality. Learn, 4. That it is not sufficient that believers do good works, but they must maintain good works; the word signifies they must be patterns and precedents, they must be eminent and excelling in good works: and let their faith be never so excellent, if they do not add to their faith, virtue, it is but fancy, a strong faith built upon a weak foundation.

9 But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.

We have the same charge given to Timothy, 1 Epist. i. 4. See the note upon it. And learn hence, that disputes about matters, which only serve to beget strife and contention, and tend little to our edification in faith and holiness, are vain talk and unprofitable disputes, to be declined and avoided by all wise and serious christians; avoid foolish questions, for they are unprofitable and vain.

10 A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject:

11 Knowing that he who is such, is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself.

As if the apostle had said, avoid and shun, and refuse communion with him that doth obstinately persist in dangerous errors and heresies, and accordingly let him be excommunicated. Learn hence, 1. Who is an heretic in the apostle's sense, even he who is perverted from the true faith, and holds opinions which subvert the foundations of it; and one who is condemned in his own conscience, and sins against his own convictions: for the apostle here bids Titus not inform him of his errors, but admonish him of his faults; which shows, that the crime lay not in his head, in his understanding, but in his will and affections: for no man, who acts according to his judgment and conscience, how erroneous soever, is self-condemned in that action. Learn, 2. That even heretics themselves ought to be tenderly and lovingly dealt with, so long as there is any hope that they may be gained or won. Learn, 3. That the charity of the church, in her censure of excommunication, aims rather at the cutting off of errors than of persons.

12 When I shall send Artemas unto thee, or Tychicus, be diligent to come unto me at Nicopolis: for I have determined there to winter.

Our apostle having finished all such common precepts as respected the whole church in Crete, he now passeth to such private affairs as did more particularly respect the person of Titus and himself. First, he desires Titus to come to him to Nicopolis from Crete, but not before he had sent thither Artemas or Tychicus to officiate in his place: wonderful care of the holy apostle! And a mighty concern for the welfare of all the churches! St. Paul very well knew how fatal and dangerous it might be to the churches to be left destitute of their spiritual guides, though for a very small time. St. Paul knew the malice of the devil, the subtilty of seducers, and the weakness of christians' faith, too well, to give all, or any of them, advantages of doing mischief in the absence of Titus from them.

13 Bring Zenas the lawyer and Apollos on their journey diligently, that nothing be wanting unto them.

Here we have a second private affair which is given in charge to Titus, namely, that he help forward on their journey Zenas and Apollos, both apostolic men; the former an expounder of the law of Moses, the other an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures; both these cleaved to St. Paul, and therefore were worthily to be respected by Titus, whom the apostle therefore bids him be kind and courteous to, and help them forward in their journey. Learn thence, that christianity is no enemy to, but a great promoter of all offices of humanity and civil courtesy towards all persons, towards strangers particularly, towards good men especially. Observe next, St. Paul desires Titus to take care that those servants of God be so supplied, that they lack nothing: such as are engaged in the Lord's work must be carefully provided for, and care taken that they lack nothing.

14 And let ours also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful.

Let ours, that is, either 1. Those of our order, the ministers of the gospel, or those that are our converts, such as are christians, let them study to excel in good works, be diligent in the labors of their calling, that they may have wherewith to supply the necessities of others, to the intent that they may not appear unfruitful. Learn hence, that as christianity is no barren and fruitless profession, but all persons professing religion ought to take care, that good works may accompany their faith; so the ministers of Christ in special ought to be careful herein, and by no means to bind that duty upon others which they do not practise themselves, they must by charity and good works, second their doctrine, and so win persons to a love of religion.

13 All that are with me salute thee.—

By these words St. Paul gives Titus to understand that all the christians that were then with him did embrace him, with an endearing and loving affection, and would have their mindfulness of him witnessed by a kind and familiar salutation. These salutations had more in them than humanity, civility, and common courtesy; they were attestations of a truly christian love and brotherly affection, of one member of Christ towards another for grace's sake.

—Greet them that love us in the faith.

That is, as christians, as brethren, and fellow-members in Christ, verus amicus qui vere et in Deo diligit. Grace binds man to man in the strongest and most indissoluble bonds and ties.

—Grace be with you all Amen.

This is the salutation of St. Paul, always written with his own hand, in all his epistles; although the epistles themselves were writ by others. he did it to prevent counterfeits, that no spurious writings might be obtruded upon the church; and whereas he says, Grace be with you all, it plainly intimates, that although this epistle be written by name to Titus, that yet it was intended for the benefit and advantage of the whole church.

THE

EPISTLE OF SAINT PAUL

PHILEMON.

This epistle was writ to a particular person, and upon a particular occasion. The person was Philemon, an eminent officer of the church of Colosse; and, as some say, successor to Timothy, as bishop of Ephesus. The occasion this: Onesimus a naughty servant, running away from his master Philemon, and carrying away probably something of his master's substance with him, by the providence of God comes to Rome, where St. Paul was now a prisoner and preacher in bonds: God blessed the apostle's ministry for the conversion of this fugitive, who was brought to a true knowledge of Jesus Christ, and after his conversion, for a time, administered to St. Paul in prison; but the apostle understanding that he was another man's servant, and particularly his dear friend Philemon's, sends him back to his master, earnestly desiring him to pardon him, and to receive him into favor.

PAUL, a prisoner of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother, unto Philemon our dearly beloved, and fellow-laborer.

2 And to our beloved Appia, and Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to the church in thy house:

3 Grace to you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. The writer of this epistle described by his name, Paul; by his condition, a prisoner of Jesus Christ; by his office, a laborer, a soldier, a fellow-laborer, and a fellow-soldier with Philemon and Archippus. Where note, That to be a laborer, a soldier and a prisoner for Jesus Christ, are the titles that St. Paul glories in, and not in worldly dignities, Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ; yet was

Paul a prisoner in libera custodia, not so closely confined, but he had pen, ink, and paper; God gave Paul then, as Joseph before, favor in the sight of the keeper of the prison: let persecutors send their saints to prison, God can provide a keeper for their turn. Happy was it for thee, Onesimus, that Paul was sent to gaol; his imprisonment was the happy occasion of thy spiritual liberty. Observe, 2. The persons to whom the epistle is directed; first, and eminently to Philemon the master, and to Appia the mistress of the family, in which, and with whom Onesimus had dwelt, but was now run from. St. Paul writes to both, judging the mistress' consent necessary for taking this fugitive back into her family, as well as the master's: intimating thereby, that although the husband, by the ordinance and appointment of God, has the highest place, the first and chief power in the government of the family, yet the wife being given him of God, as an assistant and fellow helper in government, her subordinate authority given her by God is to be owned and acknowledged. Next, this epistle is directed to Archippus, who dwelt with, or near Philemon: him he calls his fellow-soldier, and Philemon his fellow-laborer. Where note, that the ministers of the gospel are compared to soldiers: they have enemies to encounter and conflict with, satan's temptations, the world's persecutions, sinner's corrupt lusts and affections. Let the ministers of God then reckon beforehand upon a toilsome and troublesome life; if they resolve to be faithful, the devil will plant all his artillery against them. Last of all, the epistle is directed to the church in Philemon's house; by which some understand the company of christians that met together at his house to worship God; for christians then had not liberty publicly to perform that duty. Others understand it of Philemon's own family, which speaks at once Philemon's privilege and duty, that he had such a well ordered family, that it was a little church; that is, it was a lively image and representation of the church, both in its doctrine and worship.

4 I thank my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers.

Observe here, our apostle's holy insinuation and pious wisdom; that he might make a more easy way for his petition, he labors to possess Philemon with an opinion of his endeared affection towards him, and of his continual prayers even by name for him; "I thank my God, making mention of thee in my prayers." Where note, that St. Paul did, and we may make particular mention of persons and churches in our daily prayers to Almighty God; I make mention of thee always in my prayers.

5 Hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and toward all saints;

6 That the communication of thy faith may become effectual, by the acknowledging of every good thing which is in you in Christ Jesus.

7 For we have great joy and consolation in thy love; because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother.

Our apostle having discovered to Philemon his fervent prayers for him, next makes mention of the excellent graces which were so orient and shining in him, namely, his faith and his love; his faith in Christ produced love to him and to all saints; not to a party of christians only; hearing of thy love and faith toward the Lord Jesus, and in him toward all the saints. The saints are to be loved next to Christ, and in and for Christ. Observe next, St. Paul prays that Philemon's faith and love might be made manifest to be effectual by producing all sorts of good fruits in him and by him: that the communication of thy faith may become effectual. Observe, lastly, the great joy and consolation which the apostle had in the operativeness of Philemon's faith and love, whereby the bowels of the saints were greatly refreshed. Learn hence, that administering to the necessities of the saints, and relieving the bowels of the distressed members of Jesus Christ, is a blessed evidence of the sincerity of our love to Christ and christians: there is a frozen charity and a lip love found among many professors, whom Christ will disown at the great day; but such as, by offices of kindness, performed with a tender and pitiful heart, do refresh the bowels of the saints. Christ reckons it as done unto himself, whatever is done to those his suffering members, Mat. xxv. and God himself is thereby refreshed, Phil. iv. 18, "An odor of a sweet smell, and a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God." Note, lastly, What the condition of the holiest and best of God's servants in the world has been, is, and may be, namely, such, that their bowels may stand in need of refreshing, whilst the wicked are fat, fresh, and flourishing; but, blessed be God, if his children miss of refreshment from men, their time of refreshing will come from the presence of the Lord.

8 Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ, to enjoin thee that which is convenient.

9 Yet for love's sake, I rather beseech thee, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ.

10 I beseech thee for my son Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds:

11 Which in time past was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me:

Observe here, the marvellous condescending humility of our apostle in these expressions: as an apostle, he was the highest ruler and officer in the church of God, and had the fullest authority and power that a person could have upon earth, to command, require, and enjoin Philemon to the practice of his duty; but he tells them, though he might be bold to enjoin, yet he rather chose to beseech; for love's sake I rather beseech thee. Learn hence, that church rulers and governors, although they have a commanding power and authority, which upon occasion they may and must make use of, yet they should choose much rather in love to intreat, hoping that will work more kindly and effectually upon the minds of persons. Observe, 2. The argument

St. Paul uses as a ground of intreaty, I Paul desire and beseech thee, I Paul the aged, I Paul a prisoner. Note, He urges his years as an argument for granting his request; that he was aged, and an aged minister of Christ: if honor be due to an aged person walking in the way of righteousness, much more is it so to an aged minister, grey headed in the service of Christ, and having faithfully discharged his duty there. He also urges his sufferings as well as his years: I Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ. The sufferings of Christ's ministers in the cause of God should by no means lessen and diminish, but rather augment and increase that reverence, regard and respect which is deservedly due and payable unto them. Observe, 3. The person whom he thus intercedes with affection for; Onesimus, whom he calls his son begotten in his bonds; that is, his spiritual son, converted to christianity by his ministry, when he was in prison. We note, That endearing love, and that fervent affection which the ministers of Christ bear to their converts, to such as they have gained unto Christ: it equals, nay, perhaps exceeds the natural affections of parents towards their own children. Note also, who they are that best deserve the name of fathers in the church, verily those that have begot most spiritual children unto God; such as can say, "Lord, here am I, and the children which thou hast given me." Nevertheless, for our comfort, God will, at the reckoning day, account and treat such as spiritual fathers, who have been faithful, though unsuccessful in the work of Christ, because they have cast forth the prolific seed of the gospel: therefore the cause of sterility and spiritual barrenness cannot be imputed to them, they having exerted and put forth their best endeavours. Note also, The high honor which God confers upon his faithful ministers; the scriptures allow them, though but instruments, what is properly attributed to God himself, namely, to beget spiritual children; this is God's work: Of his own will begat he us. James i. 18. God allows that to be in an inferior sense attributed to the ministry, which is strictly applicable only to himself. Observe, 4. How the apostle wisely answers the objections which Philemon might make against his request, of receiving Onesimus, that he had been vile, fugitive, a thief, what not! St. Paul implicitly owns all that, yet with a softening distinction, he was unprofitable in times past, but now profiteth both thee and me. Now St. Paul pre-occupating and answering this objection before Philemon made it, shows how hard it is for the best men to forgive and forget injuries done unto them, especially by their relations, those in their own families, whether children or servants. Note also, The character given of Onesimus before conversion, he was unprofitable. Lord, what an useless unprofitable creature is an unsanctified and unconverted sinner! Unprofitable to God, unprofitable to others, unprofitable to his own soul; but by conversion he becomes universally useful and profitable to all about him, but especially to himself; others may have the benefit of our estate, our parts and gifts, but we ourselves shall have the chief benefit, comfort, and advantage of our own grace.

12 Whom I have sent again: thou therefore receive him that is mine own bowels.

13 Whom I would have retained with me, that in thy stead he might have ministered unto me in the bond of the gospel.

14 But without thy mind would I do nothing; that thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but willingly.

Here are several arguments used by our apostle, why Philemon should receive Onesimus into his service again. 1. Because St. Paul had sent him for that end, a long and tedious journey from Rome to Colosse, and because he came with the apostle's commendatory letters, and in his name. We are not easily to reject those that come to us countenanced and encouraged with the commendations of the reverend and faithful ministers of God. In the close of the first argument, at the foot of the twelfth verse, observe the endearing title he gives Onesimus, he calls him his own bowels; receive him that is my own bowels. O Lord! certainly there is no stronger love, nor more endearing and endeared affection between any relations upon earth, than between the ministers of the gospel and such of their beloved people whom they have been happily instrumental to beget unto thyself. How inexpressibly dear is the soul of a poor servant to a faithful minister of Christ, and how lovely when once converted? Receive him, for he is as dear to me as if he had proceeded out of my own bowels. Again, Another argument is this; St. Paul sends him, because he was another's servant, even of Philemon his friend, and being very serviceable to the apostle, he would have gladly detained him; but could not satisfy himself to do it without Philemon's consent. Masters have such a right in their servants, and such a right unto their service, that they are not to be disposed of, without their own consent. St. Paul, though he wanted, yet would not detain Onesimus, though a fugitive servant, without Philemon's knowledge: christian religion is no destroyer, but an establisher of civil rights. Onesimus' conversion to christianity, gave him no manumission and liberty from Philemon's service, and accordingly our apostle remits and sends him back to his old master Philemon.

15 For perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldst receive him for ever;

16 Not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, especially to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the flesh, and in the Lord?

Here our apostle answers an objection which possibly Philemon might make: Thus, "Onesimus ran away from me, What reason have I to receive him again?" The apostle seems thus to reply upon it: if his departing from thee was so managed by the wise and merciful providence of God, that it might be an occasion of thy receiving him again for ever, then for all his departure thou oughtest to receive him. But verily thus it is, the wisdom of God has thus overruled the matter; he went from thee a fugitive, thievish and purloining; but he returns a convert, a christian, a brother in the faith, and as such to be entertained by thee, being doubly related to thee, both as a servant, and as a fellow-member of Christ. Observe here, 1. The large extent, and next the overruling power of the divine providence: its extent, it reaches not only to kingdoms and nations, but to families and persons, even to poor bond-slaves; a fugitive runs not from his service, but the providence of God eyes and observes it, nay, wisely and mercifully overrules it. Oh! the depth of divine knowledge and wisdom, the providence of God concerns itself, and has a hand in those actions of men which are sinful, without any blemish to his holiness; he concurs to the act, but not to the laxity and disorder of the action; he that rides a lame horse, is the cause of his going, but not of his halting. Observe, 2. The privilege of our spiritual conjunction in Christ, above any other civil conjunction. The former lasts for ever, the latter but for a short time; the relation between husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, alas, it is but for a moment. Death will soon dissolve all civil relations: but the spiritual relation and conjunction being effected, by the bond of the spirit, is indissoluble, it is for ever. Death itself cannot dissolve it, yea, it knits the knot faster: He departed for a season, that thou shouldest receive him for ever. Observe, 3. That although christianity doth not take away the degrees of persons, and the civil differences between man and man, yet it maketh us all equal and fellow-brethren in Christ. Receive him, now, not barely as a servant, but above a servant, as a brother in Christ; you and he are now brethren by grace. Learn hence, That religious servants are more than ordinary servants, they are brethren in Christ; and when humility, fidelity, and prudence are found with them, as they are more than ordinary servants, so God expects that we should give them more than ordinary respect, and we sin in denying it. O servants, would you have high respect showed to you? Become then first humble servants to Jesus Christ, and then faithful and prudent servants where God has placed you, and you shall never want respect either from God or men; for them that honor God, he will honor.

17 If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself.

19 If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account.

19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it; albeit I do not say to thee, how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides.

Observe here, 1. Another argument wherewith St. Paul doth press Philemon to receive Onesimus, and it is drawn from a partnership and communion with him in the faith; if we are partners, and have communion and fellowship one with another, as christians, comply with my desires herein. Learn hence, That there is a communion, a fellowship, a partnership between christians, and this communion which is between saints, should make saints respect one another, "If thou count me a partner, receive him; yea receive him as myself;" a very high expression, still discovering that affectionate tenderness which St. Paul bare to this new convert. Observe, 2. Another objection answered; Philemon might say, "How can I receive him that has wronged me, robbed me, and run away from me? sure it is enough to pardon him; must I receive him too?" Our apostle implicitly grants, that there was a debt due from Onesimus to Philemon; "If he has wronged," that is, granting that he has done it. Where note, Religion destroys no man's property, nor does communion of saints make a community of goods; otherwise from this community, Onesimus, or St. Paul for him, might have pleaded an immunity, both from restitution or punishment; St. Paul acknowledges, not denies the debt. But observe farther, He takes it upon himself; Put it on my account; I will repay it. It is not then unlawful in itself, for one person to become bound and surety for another: yea, it is a work of mercy, which not only may be done, but sometimes must be done, but always with due caution and consideration. Observe, 3. The wonderful modesty of the apostle in mentioning his own praises and commendations, I say, not that thou owest to me even thine own self, implying what great things he had done for Philemon in his conversion, so great as made Philemon a debtor, not only of his own goods but of himself too: however, the apostle only glances at it modestly, and that upon a just and great occasion too; I do not say, (though I might have said it) that thou owest to me even thine own self besides.

20 Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee. in the Lord: refresh my bowels in the Lord.

21 Having confidence in thy obedience, I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say.

22 But withal prepare me also a lodging. For I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you.

Observe, 1. A pathetic repetition of our apostle's former petition, with the force and strength of a fresh and additional argument. Thus, "O my brother, that which revives me in a prison, and refreshes my bowels now I am in bonds, that assuredly thou oughtest to do; but thy remitting and receiving Onesimus will thus refresh me, therefore do it." Learn thence, That whatever christians know will rejoice the hearts, and revive the spirits of one another, ought in mutual condescension and kindness to be performed towards each other upon their mutual requests. How unnatural is it for one member to vex and grieve another? As unbecoming is it in the body spiritual, as it is in the body natural; brother, let me have joy in the Lord, refresh my bowels in the Lord. Observe, 2. Our apostle's holy confidence in Philemon's obedience and compliance: having confidence in thy obedience, I know thou wilt do more than I say. See here what credit and honor, conscience and obedience puts upon a man; Philemon's good conscience occasioned St. Paul's confidence: it is a special honor when the general course of man's life is so steady, so uniform and even, that either our ministers or pious friends dare to be confident in us, vouch for us, and engage for our obedience and compliance with whatever becomes us. Observe, 3. St. Paul having finished his request for Onesimus, speaks one word for himself, namely, that a lodging might be prepared for him, hoping it seems, for a deliverance out of prison, by the help of the church's prayers, Prepare me a lodging. Religion is no enemy to hospitality: nay, it requires it and encourages to it, Rom. xii. 13. Heb. xiii. 2. It is a duty incumbent upon all, but especially ministers; but an unkind world takes care that some have scarce bread sufficient for their families, much less have any ability for hospitality, or indeed for those necessary acts of charity which are required by God, and expected by man, to render their labors amongst their people both acceptable and successful. The ministers of God when they ask bread of some, they give them a stone, and when they demand their dues of others, they sting like a scorpion: but blessed be God, it is not thus universally. Note, lastly, What it was St. Paul grounded his expectation of deliverance upon, namely, the help and benefit of the church's prayers, I trust through your prayers I shall be given unto you. Learn, That our deliverance from trouble is to be expected and sought by the means of the prayers of such as fear God; yet mark, though prayer obtains much, yet it merits nothing at God's hand, I trust through your prayers I shall be given, that is, freely given unto you: though we obtain blessings by prayer, yet not for the merit of our prayers. If mercy were due to us, thankfulness were not due to God.

23 There salute thee Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus;
